FBIS FOREIGN BROADCAST INFORMATION SERVICE

NOTE

JPRS publications contain information primarily from foreign newspapers, periodicals and books, but also from news agency transmissions and broadcasts. Materials from foreign-language sources are translated; those from English-language sources are transcribed or reprinted, with the original phrasing and other characteristics retained.

Headlines, editorial reports, and material enclosed in brackets [] are supplied by JPRS. Processing indicators such as [Text] or [Excerpt] in the first line of each item, or following the last line of a brief, indicate how the original information was processed. Where no processing indicator is given, the information was summarized or extracted.

Unfamiliar names rendered phonetically or transliterated are enclosed in parentheses. Words or names preceded by a question mark and enclosed in parentheses were not clear in the original but have been supplied as appropriate in context. Other unattributed parenthetical notes within the body of an item originate with the source. Times within items are as given by source.

The contents of this publication in no way represent the policies, views or attitudes of the U.S. Government.

PROCUREMENT OF PUBLICATIONS

JPRS publications may be ordered from the National Technical Information Service, Springfield, Virginia 22161. In ordering, it is recommended that the JPRS number, title, date and author, if applicable, of publication be cited.

Current JPRS publications are announced in Government Reports Announcements issued semi-monthly by the National Technical Information Service, and are listed in the Monthly Catalog of U.S. Government Publications issued by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402.

Indexes to this report (by keyword, author, personal names, title and series) are available from Bell & Howell, Old Mansfield Road, Wooster, Ohio 44691.

Correspondence pertaining to matters other than procurement may be addressed to Joint Publications Research Service, 1000 North Glebe Road, Arlington, Virginia 22201.

ETHIOPIA AIDS DJIBOUTI DROUGHT VICTIMS

Djibouti LA NATION DJIBOUTI in French 21 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] Acting in his capacity as chairman of the National Committee for Assistance to Refugees and Disaster Victims, Minister of Interior Idriss Farah Abaneh has officially accepted 2,000 tons of durra [sorghum] from Argaw Kabtamu, acting charge d'affaires at the Ethiopian Embassy in Djibouti. The durra is a gift from the provisional military government of socialist Ethiopia to the inhabitants of regions hit by drought.

The ceremony took place on Sunday 17 August in the compound housing the National Office for Assistance to Refugees and Disaster Victims (ONARST) in Djibouti.

In delivering the gift, Argaw said in a short address that "this modest aid symbolizes the friendly and fraternal ties that unite our two countries. It also expresses Ethiopia's desire to see a strengthening between the two brother countries of relations of cooperation and neighborliness in every area."

He continued, "Although Ethiopia is not a rich country, it wishes to share the little it has with its Djibouti brothers."

For his part, the minister of interior said that nearly 130,000 persons are affected by the drought in the Republic of Djibouti, and he emphasized that this aid "will support in large measure the efforts by the Djibouti Government, which, with the help of the international community and brother countries, is trying to bring the situation under control."

Here is the complete text of his speech.

"Mr Ambassador,

"Gentlemen,

"I take great pleasure in officially accepting the food aid that the brother government of socialist Ethiopia has just given to my country to enable it to meet the critical situation caused by the drought that has prevailed in our region for 2 years.

"This gesture, Mr Ambassador, made despite the similar difficulties you are experiencing in your own country, is the noblest testimony to fellow feeling for the Republic of Djibouti and the most eloquent demonstration of the good neighbor policy and that of fraternal cooperation between our two countries.

"The gift of 2,000 tons of durra that we have just received will support in large measure the efforts by the Djibouti Government, which, with the help of the international community and brother countries, is trying to bring the situation under control.

"Nearly 130,000 persons are affected by the drought and in need of assistance in our interior districts. A good number of them have lost all their livestock; the others are fighting a harsh battle to save what little they have left. Hunger and thirst are a constant threat to them.

"My government has made every effort to prevent events from taking a tragic turn. No effort has been spared to mobilize all our domestic resources.

"That is why we fully appreciate this token of fraternal friendship that your country has just provided with respect to our inhabitants affected by this natural disaster, and I can assure you that they will be the only ones to benefit from this aid.

"In conclusion, Your Excellency, I ask you to speak for my government and its people in expressing all our gratitude to the brother people of socialist Ethiopia and their government."

DISILLUSIONMENT OF WHITE ZIMBABWEANS IN SA

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Aug 80 pp 24-25

[Article by Marion Duncan (who emigrated from Rhodesia recently and is now a reporter on The Star)]

[Text] For we're all Rhodesians and We'll fight through thick and thin, We'll keep our land a free land, stop the enemy coming in;
We'll keep them north of the Zambezi, till that river's running dry,
And this mighty land will prosper for Rhodesians never die.

Patriotic song by Clem Tholet, son-in-law of former Rhodesian Prime Minister Mr Ian Smith.

White Rhodesians--the "old soldiers" of the sub-continent in more ways than one--are fast fading away from Zimbabwe and flooding into South Africa.

The old war, the new war (burgeoning in pockets, constant radical anti-white diatribe, widespread Africanisation, a revamped medical system and overcrowded government education are combining to unsettle the remaining whites and drain yet more of them southwards.

Not so long ago the road to the Republic was the humorous subject of slang and nicknames: "The chicken run," the "yellow road," the "Beit Bridge 500," "taking the gap," "gapping it," and--more recently--the "Comrades' Marathon" and the "Banana Split" (after President Canaan Banana).

Now it is not so funny.

Nearly 50 000 people left Rhodesia between January 1977 and April this year (the month of the newly named nation's independence): 25 225--or 52,4 percent--have settled in South Africa.

Remarkable

Rhodesia has long been one of the main sources for immigrants to the Republic, occupying one of the top three slots in the statistical tables for the past 10 years.

Which is nothing short of remarkable for a tiny country whose total white population never (even in the heavy days of Federation) much exceeded 300 000.

Throughout the downturn decade of the seventies the only things that escalated were the never-declared war and inflation. The number of whites dwindled to 230 000 and further.

The month of June this year could still show a net loss to Zimbabwe of 719 whites--an improvement on the previous month, when the loss was 1 094.

In the first six months of this year Zimbabwe/Rhodesian statistics showed a net loss to the country of 4 450 whites.

But the actual emigration figures only tell a small part of the story.

The whole tragic truth lies in the tens of thousands of applications cluttering the offices of the South African Diplomatic Mission in Salisbury and the Department of the Interior in Pretoria--so many that the mission recently called for, and was granted, additional staff to cope.

Anxious

Sources in Salisbury said in June that 44 000 families had applied for permanent residence in South Africa--and that still more applications poured in after each anti-white radio and television commentary.

Rumours of the mission closing down caused lengthy queues of anxious applicants, and blocked the switchboard with pleading calls for advice: "Should I leave now?" "What happens to my papers if the mission closes?" "Will South Africa close the borders when the mission is thrown out?"

And when the order to close finally came last month, anxiety verged on hysteria.

Mission sources said the reaction was "frightening"--hundreds of whites appealed for application forms (which are not handed over unless the applicant can prove he has a permanent job offer in South Africa).

Said one staff member: "It was enough to make you cry. Heaven knows how many people begged--actually begged--for forms, and we had to turn them down.

"We could only recommend that they go down on holiday and try to find work, then come back and apply for permanent residence.

"It's the only way, unless they happen to have lived permanently in South Africa before. But there are very few like that left now."

And that is the essence of the first problem facing whites who want to get from Zimbabwe to the golden South: the bureaucratic barrier.

There are dozens of forms demanding everything from parents' personal particulars to personal history, including such cute little requirements as a full list of every address where one has lived since the age of 16, total educational and employment experience and whether or not parent, grandparents or other remote member of the family has ever been mad of a communist.

There are affidavits to provide, declarations to be sworn, documents to be witnessed. And all original certificates of birth and marriage are demanded: copies are not accepted (which creates a problem when one's file goes missing, as has happened so many times.)

When all that is completed and returned, there follows a wait of six months to a year.

A desperate applicant, who came to South Africa on holiday in a determined attempt to persuade Pretoria to speed up said: "Most of my mates are in this position.

"After spending money to come down here to get a job — because South African companies don't reply to written applications — our prospective employers are expected to keep positions open for anything up to a year.

"What boss will do that? But if we lose the job before we start, we lose our right to apply for residence.

"I've spent most of the last five years in uniform. I went into the army right out of school for two years' national service — which messed up my apprenticeship plans — and for the last three years I've been in the bush for at least six months a year.

"I thought me and my mates were fighting as much for South Africa as for Rhodesia. It was their terrs we were slotting (killing) as well as ours.

"But we don't get much thanks for it. I mean, I'm not running away or anything. Rhodesia has gone — it was killed. There is nothing in Zimbabwe for me."

Transfer

When permanent residence is eventually granted there comes the second obstacle: Money. Emigrants are only allowed ZD1 000 (R1 220) a family or ZD500 (R610) for a single person. Subtracted from that is the dollar equivalent of any foreign currency taken for any holiday within the previous nine months.

I have personally known families of four and five leave Zimbabwe with ZD100 (R122) to ZD150 (R183) in their pockets.

And few South African companies provide or pay for accommodation for new immigrants, unless they are on transfer within the same organisation.

The stories of the struggle for survival in South Africa are better told in the new settlers' own words.

Mr Teddy J. "I arrived here in January. I am an artisan. Me and my wife and two kids — one is eight and one is 11 — crossed the border with ZD800 (R975). We'd sold our car in Bulawayo to get the money to pay for our furniture to be stored and sent down.

"We went into a hotel in the Hillbrow area — a really rotten place but it was all we could afford. I had to start work straight away, so my wife looked for a place to live, trailing the kids with her.

"We couldn't find an unfurnished flat big enough anywhere in the city area. Houses were far too expensive to rent. So I had to go and ask my new boss for a loan to buy a house.

Hostility

"I got it, eventually, and we got a small place. By this time I'd had to borrow more money from my boss just to feed the family.

"All this time we were running into an absolute wall of hostility. We've been called refugees, cowards, deserters. We've been accused of taking jobs away from South Africans. We've been insulted. We've even been accused of letting South Africa down because we 'surrendered' when Rhodesia became Zimbabwe.

"Then I found out, quite accidentally, that my salary was R800 a month less than a South African artisan with the same firm who has less experience than me. I'm being exploited because I came from Rhodesia. But what can I do?

"I owe my boss so much money that I can't leave and get a higher paid job, and he's not likely to raise my salary until I've paid him back — which will take God knows how long.

"We're battling. The house cost a bloody fortune, transport is killing. My wife's been forced out to work because we can't survive on my salary alone. The kids are unhappy because of the change in our lifestyle and because they can't understand the lack of money.

"We left Zimbabwe because of our kids. We weren't going to let them grow up in a country where they're called white pigs over the radio and TV.

"I was in uniform. I fought in the bush and I've killed a few tears.

Lifetime

"I didn't run away. We were practically forced out — after a lifetime — because of the anti-white feeling that has been created, even though it was never there before.

"Now I'm a poor white, and likely to get poorer. Thank you South Africa, for sweet nothing. I had to take the first job offer I got just to get down here, and now I'm treated like dirt."

Mr Harry P: "I'm in commerce and I've been in South Africa since December with my wife and three children, aged three, five and 10.

"We took the decision to move because of our children, because we saw no future for them in Zimbabwe.

"At a conservative estimate, I would say that it has cost me nearly R1 500 just to get a permanent residence permit for this country, not to mention the cost of the move itself.

"I had to come down on holiday three times in six months just to find a job. My letters were never answered. Then it took eight months for our papers to come through, and I had to come down again to talk my employer into holding the job open.

Exchange

"Every time I approached the Diplomatic Mission in Salisbury to ask about our applications I was met with rudeness. Three times they suddenly demanded other forms and affidavits, out of the blue. It nearly drove us mad. We were getting desperate.

"Then, when the permits were granted, we had a rush to get exchange control. We left Zimbabwe Rhodesia (as it was then) with $200 (R244), and we were nabbed for duty on the car at the border, which we had been told by the Salisbury mission would not happen.

"We got into Johannesburg broke, barely able to afford hamburgers for the family.

"Next day I went straight to my new company and asked for a loan, which they were decent enough to grant. Then came the search for a place to live, which was indescribable.

"What is the matter with this place? Rents are ridiculous, purchase prices are phenomenal — the whole real estate business seems to have taken leave of its senses.

"We ended up in an appalling area, had to borrow more money for the first month's rent and were forced into the realisation that my wife would have to work.

'Lepers'

"We nearly killed ourselves to find a decent nursery school, which cost the earth and was miles away. We have transport problems because my wife works across the city from me.

"And on top of all that — as if it wasn't enough — we're treated like lepers. We've been blamed for everything that's wrong with South Africa, from the race problems to unemployment to shortage of accommodation.

"Quite frankly, I blame South Africa for everything that's wrong with Zimbabwe. Vorster forced us into agreeing to Kissinger; he forced us to release detainees; he literally forced us into one-man-one-vote majority rule then dumped us.

"The people here are totally ignorant about Rhodesia. They don't know that people like me — 35 years old — spent months of each year in uniform in the bush, risking our lives fighting terrorists that were as much South Africa's as ours. We don't expect to be showered with thanks, but we do expect to be accepted into society here and given a chance.

"We've taken a drop in living standards. We're in debt. We're unhappy. But we're prepared to stick it out and work for the future of this country.

"Doesn't that matter? It doesn't seem so."

Betrayal

These two stories are common, average. A lot of white ex-Rhodesians are worse off; a few — very few — are better off.

Of 60 families interviewed, all are in financial trouble and all are bitterly disillusioned with South Africa and its people. They feel resented and resentful, distrusted and distrustful.

Many have given up lifetimes of effort and achievement in Rhodesia, leaving their country with a feeling of betrayal and sorrowful hopelessness.

They have left behind dead friends and relatives, killed in the war. They have left behind homes and hopes, splintered ideals and vanished ambitions.

"We thought it could work, because there was never any real racial hatred in Rhodesia."

"We wanted to try, because I was born there and my children were born there, but it's no good — it's just not there any more."

Unwelcome

"My husband was killed in the war. As a widow I was only allowed to take out 500 dollars. My pension is next to nothing. I am alone, and people don't want to know me because I'm a white Rhodesian. They seem to think I'm looking for charity."

"We're being exploited — used as underpaid skilled labour because employers here know we have no freedom of choice when we've come from Rhodesia."

"We're English-speaking non-Afrikaners, and we're treated like dirt by the authorities and by the people."

"My country was taken away from me. Now where do I go? I'm not welcome here."

"We wanted to stay, but the new government is whipping up so much anti-white feeling that it's impossible. Every day there's a swipe at us on radio and the TV; blacks are being taught to hate us and everything we tried to do for them. All the goodwill there was — and there was plenty between the races — is over."

And so they come — and continue to come — "down South" because it's still Africa and they still love the continent.

Those born in Britain and those from Europe will tell you that they are aliens in their own lands, strangers to their own people. "Rhodesia was my home."

Nostalgia

They are unfashionable because they are politically and personally embarrassing, reminders of a war against the world that was lost and is therefore very non-U.

So they leave home, with their green-and-white flags and their bullet pens and their camouflage floppy hats and their nostalgia for people and places now dead.

White Rhodesians have become today's lost tribe of Africa.

A young man with one leg — he lost the other in a landmine blast in a remote tribal trust land — said: "Where the hell do I pitch my tent now? All I want is a chance.

"Don't I deserve one?"

NOTE: The words "Rhodesia" and "Rhodesian" have been used wherever they occur in direct quotes, or to refer to the country as it was before independence. "Zimbabwe" refers to the post-April 18, 1980 period.

CENTRAL AFRICA AIMS TO LURE MORE TOURISTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 13

[Text] "THERE are no robots in Botswana. I can walk anywhere," said Botswana's senior tourist officer, Mr Johan Baijens, indicating one of the lures for foreign visitors to his country.

Mr Baijens was speaking in a seminar on tourism at the economic resources conference. He stressed the "great potential we have (in Central African countries) to make people happy, because there is not much happiness in the world and that is what people want."

Botswana was "small, but beautiful" and its population dispersed. "There has never been a political prisoner in Botswana," he said, alluding to the country's stability, which made it ideal for tourists.

Besides the Okavango delta was not a swamp, he declared. "You can drink water from the delta. So you can take 'swamp' out of your dictionary."

The principal secretary from the Malawian Ministry of Trade, Industry and Tourism, Mr P. M. Mbisa, was eager to start the Central African package deal. The attraction of a clean, lake, friendly people and a pleasant physical and political climate could make Malawi an ideal resting place during a tour.

"Ownership of national parks will belong to the Government, but if you want to start a safari camp or build a hotel we will help you," he said, referring to the shortage of accommodation in Malawi.

A similar dearth existed in Zambia, according to Zambian Tourist Officer, Mrs J. Chikwenda. She said the tourist board in Zambia was aiming at the higher income groups.

Visitors were mainly in the stop-over and excursion categories. Lusaka needed 1 300 more beds to cater for the proposed tourist expansion.

Tanzania could offer safaris not available in countries further south and they had long, white beaches. Tanzania's Director of Tourism, Mr W. Fikirini, said that a promotion campaign had been started to establish hotels, increase and widen the coverage of internal air services and to correct some unfavourable publicity about Tanzania's ability to cope with the tourist.

TANZANIA SEEKS TRANSPORT LINK WITH ZIMBABWE

[Article by Tim Chigodo]

[Text]

A SENIOR Tanzanian civil servant has called for the development of transport links between that country and Zimbabwe.

Mr Bismark Mwansasu is principal secretary in the Tanzanian Ministry of Trade and has been in the country for a week leading a six-man trade delegation.

In an interview, he said the lack of transport was likely to hamper trade between the two countries. "We have to make firm transport arrangements before anything can start moving."

There were no road or rail links between Zimbabwe and Tanzania. "The only link is by air and this is very expensive for trade," he said. At the moment, Tanzania Airways flies once a week from Dar es salaam to Salisbury.

Road and rail services ended in Lusaka, Mr Mwansasu said, and these were provided by the jointly owned Zambia-Tanzania Road Services and the Tanzania-Zambia Railway Authority (TAZARA).

Mr Mwansasu indicated that TAZARA might have to be used through Zambia for carrying goods between Zimbabwe and Tanzania.

The possibility of using the sea route to Beira in Mozambique would also be explored by the two governments.

Arrangements have also to be made for banking facilities to pay for goods. "These will have to be arranged between our two reserve banks."

Tanzania is not a member of the five-nation group now involved in transport and telecommunication development in central and southern Africa. The countries are Malawi, Zaire, Mozambique, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

Representatives from the five governments have already held talks and have drawn up a working programme. The first conference was held in Zaire at which Zimbabwe was represented by the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe.

Tanzania would like to strengthen her economic ties with Zimbabwe for the benefit of the people of the two countries, Mr Mwansasu said. Zimbabwe was well developed and had much to offer to other developing countries in technology.

He had been very impressed by the commercial and the agricultural sectors of the economy. "We would like to get most of our imports from here because Zimbabwe provides us with a cheaper source."

Tanzania was importing items from overseas ranging from coke to handhoes and these could be obtained from Zimbabwe.

Zimbabwean businessmen have been invited to visit Tanzania to tour various industries and agricultural projects.

REPORT ON TRADE UNIONS IN BLACK AFRICA

Paris LE MOIS EN AFRIQUE in French Apr-May 80 pp 22-26

[Article by Yves Person--passages between slantlines originally published in italics]

[Text] African trade unions sometimes still appear to be excessive, at first glance, like in Tunisia in 1978, but in the continent as a whole, which is not yet completely liberated politically, one is struck rather by their inertia and relative silence, whereas at the height of the anti-colonial struggle, at the end of the fifties, they played a major and sometimes preponderant role in African liberation.

The first point to observe is that the trade unions in Africa came into being through a European graft and not through an evolution of African societies. They are part of the massive influx of technologies and practices, or economic and political ideas, which Europe during the colonial era imposed on the subject continent. However this innovation from abroad is going to be grafted on overturned and dominated societies, in historical circumstances quite different from those of the Europe of the 19th Century, to such an extent that the diverse and shifting reality which will come out of it will be considerably different from the initial model. There is still often a tendency to imagine Africa as a passive receptacle of foreign ideas, while in fact its peoples have never ceased proving their initiative and have greatly transformed and assimilated what they were unable to reject.

I am going to describe briefly the stages in the development of trade unions in Africa, and the distinctive characteristics they have developed. I will be speaking mainly of Black Africa, even though the latter may have once shared with Mediterranean Africa a common colonial condition. This explains certain similarities in the development of the trade unions, but those of the Maghreb were marked early on by a very strong tie to the nationalist movements and the Muslim reawakening, to such an extent that the historical sifnificance [of syndicalism in the two regions] is not the same. They [the Mediterranean African trade unions] will, however, furnish several examples, and comparison of the two geo-political regions is by all means necessary.

Trade unions in Africa thus appeared with the development of a wage-earning class, itself the result of the establishment of state colonial systems, urbanization, and industrialization. It is the trade unions, I say, and not socialism, which itself will come from Europe later on, transmitted by the only truly "revolutionary" class which history thus far has produced, namely, the intellectual small bourgeoisie. The appearance of this class in Africa and the role it is going to play in the trade unions explain the frequent but not inevitable affinities uniting the two phenomena, but these two will nonetheless remain distinct.

Wage laborers themselves, throughout the whole world, are reformist, for they only have one life and, rather than awaiting the advent of the absolute they prefer to improve their lot immediately, by limiting the exploitation and oppression of which they are aware. After spontaneous and futile revolts, they organize tehmselves and form trade unions. This is indeed what happened in Africa as in Europe, with a time-lag of less than a century, but in quite different circumstances. At the mid-point of the 20th Century Africa is in reality a world under domination, and the pattern for its trade unions will quickly be furnished, and already to a considerable degree, with its doctrine, its strategy, and its ideologies, by the dominant society itself. It will have to adapt itself, however, to a very special environment.

I cannot, in so brief a time, give you a complete picture, even a succinct one, of African trade unionism. It has developed everywhere in tandem with the economic and social destruction provoked by colonization, and thus in quite a variety of ways in the different regions.

Almost everywhere, the first wage-earners were peasants driven by want and coming to make a little money in town as migrant workers. Returning home whenever possible and lacking any qualifications, it was hardly possible to unionize them. Moreover the colonial power was against it, although to varying degrees.

We must distinguish from the start those regions peopled by white colonies from those which experienced only classical domination. In the first, economic development was rapid and premature, but the first syndicalism which developed was white syndicalism. The establishment of the "Color Bar" in the framework of a system of racial domination is going, by contrast, to impede or at least retard the formation of black syndicalism. This is the case, notably, in South Africa, Rhodesia (Zimbabwe), and Zambia. The mining industry experienced a precocious expansion, in the 19th Century, and exceptional economic development will be the consequences.

In the other regions, syndicalism will obviously be black, but it will make its appearance earlier or later according to the rapidity of economic development and social differentiation, on the one hand, and the severity of colonial domination on the other. In Central and East Africa, it will be quite slow to develop everywhere except in Kenya. Practically nonexistent in Portugese territory or Ethiopia, it will by contrast spring up quickly in West Africa, especially in Senegal, Sierra Leone, Ghana, and Nigeria.

It goes without saying that the wage-earning class is formed before the trade unions. The first struggles, largely spontaneous, occur outside the unions, like the great strike at Copperbeet in Zambia in 1934, when the mines had only been open for three years. It is then a protest against the sudden increase in the head tax, aimed at mobilizing more labor cheaply. One cay say as much for the first great strike of black miners in South Africa, in 1920. In West Africa, without going back to the 19th Century, major strikes, before the existence of any trade union, took place, above all on the railroads (Sierra Leone 1919 and 1926, Nigeria 1925, Thies 1925) and in the mines (Gold Coast 1930).

Almost everywhere, the first workers' organizations are ethnic associations which by their solidarity enable [their members] to survive the accidents and misfortune not covered by any social security. The secondary foremen—the /Boss Boys/ in the Zambian mines--are also called upon to represent the workers in their charge. Tontines and mutual aid associations also appear between the two world wars.

But which are the workers, then, who spontaneously begin to organize? As in Europe, it is neither the most miserable nor the least educated.

At the start, the Africans are torn from the traditional village society by forced labor, then by indirect coercion through taxes, and, in the mining zones of the south, through the stimulus of powerful recruiting networks. The unskilled manpower thus mobilized is subjected, with no protection, to a pitiless exploitation, sometimes in the confines of veritable concentration camps, like the /Compounds/ of South Africa, and the first type of associations is all they will know. Throughout the entire zone of white colonization, extensive efforts will be made to preserve the mobile character of this labor, by preventing it from returning to the family, and by providing constant rotation. The /Color Bar/ will be imposed to keep it from acquiring professional training. In such conditions, a trade-union type organization[is] practically impossible.

The wage-earners who are going to organize themselves will thus be of a different type. It will be those who will have been most harshly subjected to the European culture shock, that is to say, the auxiliaries of the state and the colonial society: low-ranking employees (clerks, teachers, hospital attendants), commercial agents, in short the basic ingredients of an intellectual small bourgeoisie, detached to a degree from the traditional culture. They will then be the first workers to get some professional training, and thereby these "blue-collars" are rather close to the "white-collars" who are above them. Beyond this training factor, the relationship of these men to geography will play a decisive role. Thus the geographic concentration of the mining industries on the one hand, and the means of transport on the other, will work to permit more establishment of contacts, and open minds to movements in the outside world. Aside from the functionaries and miners, the first organized workers will be the seamen, dock-workers, and railway workers. Their role will be decisive throughout Black Africa.

It remains to be said that the organizing of these workers, few in number and dispersed, subjected to the arbitrary actions of colonial domination, or to oppression, or, even worse, to the racist systems of the south, could not but be difficult. Its beginnings will come slowly. They will be conditioned, at the start, by a factor which is going to play a major role in African trade-unionism: political changes in the colonial countries.

Here we are touching on a crucial point. The African trade-unions are from the start going to be highly politicized, although this feature is less fully developed in Black Africa than in the Maghreb. This is all the more remarkable in that these trade unions are going to be organized at the initiative and after the pattern of the labor groups from the colonial homelands which profess, at least in theory, the ideal of an apolitical syndicalism devoting itself to improving wages and working conditions, and leaving to political parties [matters of] social reform or revolution.

Frankly, everyone knows quite well that this apoliticism, theoretical even in Europe, is only a fiction. The Leninist theory of the trade union as the "driving belt" of the party is represented, even though unavowed, by the CGT [General Confederation of Labor] in France, and has efficiently provided for the total subjection of the working class in the countries wearing the socialist label. But, finally, everyone knows that the /Labor Party/ is the product of the /Trade Unions/ which constitute its power, and that the German and Scandinavian social-democrat parties would not exist without the powerful syndicates that support them. Even in France, the anarchist-syndicalist tradition which triumphed in 1905 with the Amiens Charter expressed above all the decision to substitute a decisive social struggle, thus one ultimately political [in nature], for a dishonest, futile, and ineffective game of parties. And it has been well forgotten since then. The case of American labor unions is itself atypical: it is known that the Democratic Party owes most of its victories to them. In France, only F.O. [Workers Force] really affects to be apolitical, and reproaches the CFDT [French Democratic Confederation of Labor], not to speak of the CGT, for going astray. However, the socialist influence remains preponderant there, and that of the Trotskyites tangible. Besides, the history of decolonization reveals strange attitudes among all these organizations.

One will not, however, be surprised to discover that the labor missionaries who are going to preach the good word in Africa starting in 1945-

1947 will almost always preach a non-political doctrine that they rarely practice at home, and they will easily wax indignant when seeing their black disciples go astray.

In fact, only the political constraint of the colonial regime could retard the birth of African syndicalism once a wage-earning class of the modern type emerged, a class of which it was the natural complement. The Portugese dictatorship came to an end on just this. The ideal of colonization, like all despotism, is to be able to deal only with isolated and passive individuals, deprived of the ties of culture and conviviality which could give them the collective basis for resistance. From which [arises] the determination, quite pronounced among the more important of them, such as the French, to destroy the African languages and cultures.

From which [arises] a natural rejection before a phenomenon of mobilization such as trade-unionism. The colonial power will not give up its opposition, until such a time as the evolution of the working class will make it truly impossible.

It will then concede [the legitimacy of] the trade unions, but will also implement numerous precautions to prevent them from combining with any political opposition movement, out of fear that the latter should gain too much power.

Great Britain, though relatively open and progressive, did not entirely escape this narrow-minded machievellianism. The British, however, in 1930 admitted, in a celebrated circular credited to the Labor colonial minister, the famous Sidney Webb (later Lord Passfield), founder of the /Fabian Socieity,/ the principle of the right to organize, as that of the preponderance [sic] of African interests in East and Central Africa. Though several trade unions appeared at that time in Sierra Leone, Gold Coast, and Nigeria, no federation was established, and the phenomenon remained limited despite major social movements. It is a remarkable fact that in was when war came that in 1940, Great Britain wrote into the /Colonial Development and Welfare Act (CDWA),/ passed in anticipation of a large campaign of investment in its African colonies, a clause subjecting these activities to the existence of a social settlement including freedom to organize. The same year Michael Imoudu creates the Nigerian railway workers union. Starting in 1942, it will be the first labor group for uniting dispersed efforts.

Though some might dispute the statement, it is clear that Great Britain placed the freedom to organize in the proper context of the ideal of progress which, it claimed, its mission was to impose on Africa. Obviously this could not be applied to the colonies with large white settlements, or in South Africa, already a /dominion/, that is, in fact an independent state.

The French case is more clear. Before 1936, colonial constraint in French Africa is complete, and economic development remains very limited, except in Senegal. Nevertheless there are professional associations of African functionaries or workers (teachers, railway workers) who are already preparing the groundwork. But with the advent of the Popular Front, Senegal experiences an extraordinary ferment, and the trade unions are legitimized by a decree of February 1937. Not of course without tight restrictions: only workers literate in French can organize, and the administration must strictly control their management. From then on the trade unions keep increasing in number, riding a powerful wave of successful strikes which greatly improve workers' conditions and, most importantly, lead to a remarkable awakening of conscience. But in 1938 there is a relapse. The strike of railway workers in Thies in September ends tragically, and is exploited by the right, thanks to Galndou Diouf, to take things in hand. With the war, then the advent of the Vichy regime, all the gains made will be suppressed in 1940, and will only be regained little by little, from 1943 to 1945. To a lesser degree, similar movements can be observed in Madagascar, the Ivory Coast, and Dahomey.

At the end of World War II, French Africa, with the exception of Senegal, thus appears quite backward by comparison to British Africa. Henceforth, in labor matters, it is going to pursue a rather different path.

The decisive period in fact is theone extending from 1944 or 1945 to 1957-58. This is the time when French Africa is committed both to the path of economic development, through FIDES [Investment Fund for Economic and Social Development], which is going to overturn the social structure, and on the path of a renewed colonization which is conceived as perpetual. Unexpectedly, these reforms are going to begin the process of decolonization, because of the global context, pressures from the United States and the USSR at the UN, and above all [because of] the British model. For this latter begins to move quite rapidly, without much hesitation, toward faster and faster political decolonization in West Africa, while the colonists in East and Central Africa attempt to turn th eprocess to their profit. From the start, all the trade unions will remain beset by weakness in numbers, even relative to the number of wage-earning workers, by great instability in membership, and by constant financial problems due to the difficulty of collecting membership dues.

The composition of the trade unions varies a great deal from country to country. Manual laborers, railway workers or dock workers, played a major role in countries like Senegal, Guinea, Ghana, Nigeria, Cameroon, or even Sudan and Zambia. But in the countries with little development, like French Sudan (Mali), Upper Volta, or even Congo-Brazzaville, the unionists will mostly be functionaries or employees in businesses.

As it became impossible to resist the formation of trade unions, at least without dictatorial power, the colonial authorities found themselves facing a dilemma. They could either insist that the trade unions remain absolutely non-political, in hopes of thereby impeding the strengthening of the nationalist opposition, or on the contrary denounce any major strike as political in order to better fight it. Though dangerous, this latter position was more frequently taken because the colonial state was almost everywhere the biggest employer, and it was often the state against which the strikers were fighting.

In reality, the conditions of the workers were too obviously tied to the colonial order for politicization not to make itself felt, thought not as quickly at the start in Black Africa as in North Africa. And above all, unevenly, according to the country and the confederations. Thus F.O. is going to bear right to the end a suicidal attachment to the colonial order, all the while disguising this position under the pretext of no politics.

This said, the traditions of the colonial motherlands being quite different, the modalities were very different in English and French Africa.

Among the British, where the movement in Nigeria is already well under way in 1942, /Labor Services/ were set up in all the territories, and the British TUC [Trade Unions Council] starting in 1945 sends experienced organizers to assist the Africans to organize. But here, in the British tradition, there is no centralization, or rather, there is no affiliation with the British confederation. The workers are urged to establish small shop units, and staying out of politics is emphasized. Then one portion, often a rather small one, of these labor groups, joins together to form in each country a TUC which affiliates itself directly to an international [labor organization]. Given that apoliticism rules out theoretical and ideological debates, there can logically be only one TUC per country, and the international with which it affiliates is naturally the FSM (WETU) [World Federation of Trade Unions] based in Prague up to 1948 or 1949, then the CISL (ICFTU) [International Confederation of Free Trade Unions] based in Brussels afterward. It is only in Nigeria that an early politicization in a very divided country will bring the breakup of the national TUC ostensibly over the issue of international affiliation.

In certain countries, such as Kenya, the organization of trade unions into a TUC, begun in 1947, will be delayed by the government for political reasons. In the racist-dominated countries such as South Africa and Rhodesia, the black unions and their federations will not be recognized, and [racially] mixed unions will be prohibited, after 1925.

Within the anglophone domain the basic fact remains that there did not exist any organic link between the colonial TUC's and those of the metropolitan capital: autonomy was built in at the start. Moreover, labor unity within countries was the norm from the start. Finally, in several countries, notably Nigeria, Sudan, and Zambia, the organized cadres were manual laborers, highly skilled, and not functionaries and minor intellectuals as in the Francophone countries. As a result they are going to be excluded from the apparatus of the state at independence, which will predispose them to autonomy, when they are not brutalized into submission.

In the francophone domain, what is striking, on the contrary, is the bureaucratic centralization by which the colonial confederations are from the start subjected to those in the capital, and the [degree to which] ideological rivalry is an impediment to labor unity. Insoluble problems, and a constant struggle over international affiliation, will result from this.

The labor missionaries who arrive in 1945 quickly establish a strict hierarchy among the labor groups set up, /on the one hand,/ as locak, territorial, or federal unions (AOF, AEF) [French West Africa, French Equatorial Africa] affiliated with metropolitan confederations, and only through them [linked] to an international, and /on the other hand/ as professional federations themselves subject to the territorial or at least the federal union, like the AOF railway workers. Starting in 1945 therefore two networks of unions appear, that of the CGT and that of the CFTC [expansion unknown] (in Muslim countries the letter C no longer signifies Christian but Believer [Fr. "Croyant"]). The latter will be of importance in Senegal, Guinea, Ivoery Coast, Dahomey, and especially in Cameroon, AEF, and Madagascar. In 1947, when it holds the African convention in Dakar, the CGT sets up two coordination committees, one for AOF-Togo, the other for AEF-Cameroon. But at the end of the year, the withdrawal of the socialists puts an end to a labor unity at their expense, which the cold war made ridiculous.

Thus appears CFT-F.O. in the capital. In 1949, the latter makes a big effort to establish itself, but its efforts are rarely successful: it hardly succeeds except among certain functionaries and, above all in Senegal, among the famous "natives." In 1955, on the eve of great and fearful events, the CGT had 50 percent of the organized francophone laborers, CFTC had 18 percent and F.O. 10 percent. The other unions, notably the powerful federation of railway workers of AOF, remained autonomous.

This federation had at first been with CGT. But it believed it was not supported by the metropolitan conferation at the time of the great strike from November 1947 to March 1948 described in Sembene Ousmane's novel, "les Bouts de Bois de Dieu." While its militans were inspired by African psychological, political, and wage concerns, it allowed itself to be pulled by the CGT into the great political strike at the end of 1947 called by the Communist Party. But its own strike had lasted interminably, all the way to March 1948, and ended in a semi-defeat, made up for, really, by a quite strong raising of the level of awareness. The railway workers however felt themselves exploited, manipulated, and abandoned by the French CGT, which explains their decision to disaffiliate, taken at the end of the strike. Their federation would remain in this position up to the formation of UGTAN [General Union of Workers of Black Africa].

I cannot go into specifics for the social struggles, often very lively, that occur starting in 1947 and will in fact go on all the way to independence. Up to the end of 1952, struggle centers on the campaign for the Overseas Labor Code, which was in fact secured by decree in November 1947, when minister Coste Floret, thanks to a virtual falsification of public documents, succeeds in jeopardizing everything. The great waves of strikes in 1947, then in 1952, and 1953, were of crucial importance. The "70-Day Strike" from September to November 1953 in Guinea brought Sekou Toure into the limelight and gave momentum to the PDG-RDA [Democratic Party of Guinea-African Democratic Rally], which was quite weak up till then. In this typical case, it is the labor group which has practically created the party. This example shows how politicization occurs. The social struggle gets substantial results during this time. IN AOF, on average, wages increase by 87 percent from 1949 to 1952. Through application of the Overseas Labor Code, the work week is decreased from 50 to 40 hours in December 1952. Union membership, small up to then, expands at a remakrable pace. In Guinea, the CGT goes from 4,000 members in 1953 to 55,000 in 1955.

The alliance of CGT-RDA in 1946 brought strength to a nationalism which was still embryonic. The colonial authorities, who were not deceived showed their hostility right away to this faction. In the Ivory Coast, the CGT bears the direct fire of the attack led against the PDCI-RDA [Democratic Party of the Ivory Coast] which is going to culminate in 1948 to 1950. The administration sometimes thought it useful to support workers with religious affiliation, in hopes of pitting them against the radical nationalists. This was notably the case in Cameroon, Brazzaville, and Madagascar. But this failed for, everywhere, these labor groups, once constituted, showed the greatest vigor and joined up with nationalism. The role of Gilbert Pongault in the French Congo is well known, if not well studied.

The colonial state is thus the absolute enemy, and demands do not have to be reasonable: there is a balance of power, and it is a question of getting the maximum possible. The union, however, can feign being nonpolitical, which is purest fiction, in order to avoid bearing the weight of repression which comes down on the nationalists. The case is clear in the Ivory Coast, Madagascar, Cameroon, and, in the anglophone area, in Kenya and Chana. The situation becomes more complicated where there exist several African parties, as in Senegal, Cameroon, Nigeria, and Zambia. Generally there results from this a new division of the labor movement which facilitates the interest of the colonial power.

In this period, up to 1957-1958, an essential role is played by the international labor groups. Since 1947 decolonization is being played out in the context of the cold war, to the great frustration of the colonial powers, who see these two protagonists, the United States and the USSR, trying to outdo each other in anticolonialism to expand their [number of] clients.

Up to 1948, the FSM/WFTU [World Federation of Trade Unions] contains the great majority of organized workers around the world, outside of the American AFC [expansion unknown] and the Christians. It is a strange alliance, between the bureaucratic state apparatuses of the socialist countries, the French CGT which still held socialists and communists, under the obvious control of the latter, the Scandinavian labor unions, the British trade unions, and the American CIO. Leadership is divided at the time between a British president, Arthur Deakin, and a French secretary general, the communist Louis Saillant.

Up to 1947 these strange allies share a common determination to keep control of the new African unions by separating them from the nationalists not under their control. We know how Saillant engineered the rejection of the membership of the UGTT [Tunisian General Federation of Labor], too closely tied to the Neo-Destour, and [how he] did not hesitate to describe as a demographic prevocation the general strike of 1947. Benoit Frachon will be his constant assistant in this task: he will not hesitate to accuse the UGTT publicly of being the "instrument of imperialism," and to give primacy to USTT [Federation of Labor Unions of Tunisia], a small insignificant group which, however, is dominated by European communists. We also know how the development of specific unions will be retarded in Algeria. The clear idea before 1947, and which the PCF [French Communist Party] will not really abandon before 1958, is that the national liberation of the colonial peoples can only come after the socialist revolution brought about by French workers, and under their control. To reverse the order is to be suspected of excessive nationalism. Meanwhile, one must thus be content with social struggles. Time does not matter for the Church: go into the kingdom of heaven and all the rest will be added unto you. The break with the FDA had its origins in such a doctrine.

Starting in 1949, FSM-WFTU is no more than a rump where, except for the eastern countries, one can find only unions tightly controlled by communists. This is the case with the CGT, and it is through the latter's intermediation that FSM watches over its African subsidiaries. The president of the unions of French Sudan (Mali), Abdoullaye Diallo of Guinea, quite close to the communists, has been vice-president of the FSM since 1949. Now the withdrawal of the RDA, in 1950, upset the French communists and this explains the suicidal obstinancy with which they will oppose direct African membership in FSM. The French CGT fears losing control of their development if it does not impose itself as an intermediary. Diallo will maintain this to the end, which will quickly bring him into conflict with Sekou Toure, whose intervention is going to open up a new era: that of labor Pan-Africanism, which will completely destroy the influence of the Prague International in Black Africa.

Starting in 1949, from its headquarters in Brussels, the CISL-ICFTU is working to bring together the non-communist unionists to confront the Soviet menace. It thus tries to unite the greatest possible number of Africans. In fact, all of the anglophone TUC's, other than the Imoudu faction in Nigeria, but including the Ghana-TUC closely tied to the revolutionary nationalists of Nkrumah, join up at Brussels. In the francophone world, by contrast, success is meager: it is limited to small F.O. cells already discredited by their pro-French attitude.

Within the "free" international, a strange battle will be joined. Without being a tool of the Americans, the CISL-ICFTU submits more and more to the influence of the CIO--reunited in 1953 with the AFL. The latter, obviously, acts, not at the orders, but in concert, with the Department of State and the CIA. It is a question of protecting the union movement from communism and Africa from Soviet influence. For this, the American unionists think there is no better way than to encourage the anti-colonial struggle, and to put in place moderate African states. This assistance to the black nationalist movements is greeted with consternation by the TUC's, which assert that Great Britain must remain in control of a movement toward independence, which, moreover, it accepts, and above all [greeted with consertnation] by the CGT-F.O., which will hold on fiercely to the idea of a permanent imperial France. However, the Americans bringing the money, their policy will consistently prevail, despite violent French recriminations at each Congress.

In 1953, the ICFTU establishes a regional office in Accra, where it consolidates its foundations with Pan-African nationalism. It is in Accra that in 1957 it holds its first regional conference under the chairmanship of Tettegah, and Nkrumah there makes a memorable speech. The unions affiliated with Brussels give shelter to the nationalists persecuted by the colonial power, for example in Kenya, in Tunisia, and in Zambia. Affiliated with Prague they would not have been able to play this role.

For the first time, around 1959-1960, this policy will look like it is paying off, and there will be a general feeling that CISL-ICFTU is largely achieving acceptance by Africa, including revolutionary Ghana, while the Stalinist dream of hierarchical control, to which the FSM clings, will lead to nearly total ruin.

RDA's break with the PC [Communist Party] heralds, in fact, with a five-year lead-time, that of the African CGT's with the metropolitan and international confederation. Sekou Toure is going to be the instrument of this rupture. Considered by the colonial authorities as a dangerous communist, this man of limited theoretical training is soon going to demonstrate that he is above all a radical African nationalist. And that he admirably embodies the tendancy of African unions to personalize power to an extreme, which is useful to charismatic leaders. Among the latter one can point to John Tettegah in Ghana, Michael Imoudu in Nigeria, Tom Mboya in Kenya, Lawrence Katilungu in Zambia, and Joseph Nkomo in Zimbabwe. One could also mention Ferhad Hached in Tunisia and Mahjoub ben Seddik in Morocco.

Born in 1922 at Faranah in a strong Muslim environment, dismissed from the Conakry technical college in 1937 following a hunger strike, Sekou Toure works as an employee in a business while pursuing his studies by correspondence, and he passes the clerks' competition of the postal, telephone and telegraph service. He is the ideal picture of the petty bourgeois intellectual. In 1945, as secretary general of the PTT union, he is involved in the formation of the Territorial UNION CGT, then, at the end of 1946 in the formation of the RDA. Having become a treasury agent, he is dismissed for political activities. His biography is rather murky from 1946 to 1948. He travelled to Paris several times and visited Prague, but it is doubtful he pursued any course of study for any length of time at the FSM school in the Czech capital. Only he could tell us, and he is still extremely discreet about this period of his life. In 1948, he becomes secretary general of the CGT of Guinea, then in 1950 of the Coordination Committee CGT of AOF, and finally in 1952 of the PDG [Democratic Party of Guinea], at this time still miniscule. The 70-day strike, from September to November 1953, brings extraordinary prestige to the leader, the union, and the party. By 1956, Sekou Toure will have made the PDG, often forcibly, the dominant party throughout Guinea. As we know, after an almost complete electoral triumph, he will become vice-president of the government of the loi-cadre [translation unknown] in April 1957, and he has never been out of power since.

Under the influence of Nkrumah, but also by virtue of the innate logic of nationalism, Sekou Toure chafes under the domination of the French CGT which supports his rival, Diallo Abdoulaye, whome the CGT believes to be more malleable. In February 1956, the Coordination Committee CGT, meeting in Dakar, decides to break its affiliation with the French confederation by establishing the CGTA [General Confederation of African Workers]. Sekou Toure is joined by some of the Senegalese with Diallo Seydou, but Abdoulaye Diallo, with Camille Gris of the Ivory Coast and some of the Senegalese with Alioune Cisse oppose him. However, in all quarters to some degree, unions side with him, even if need be against their own confederate leadership, to such an extent that in November 1957 at Cotonou, the CGTA gives way to UGTAN [General Union of Workers of Black Africa]. This latter unites the majority of unions in French West Africa, including the railway workers, but excluding the Christians and F.O. These latter then also establish autonomous African federations, without disaffiliating themselves from their corresponding international. UGTAN, by contrast, declares its break tone, Sekou Toure asserts that African unions should only join African internationals. A month later, in 1957, the constituting convention of the All-African Peoples Organization [OPAP-AAPO] at Accra adopts the same position. In 1959, the Ghana TUC, for its part, will withdraw from CISL-ICFTU.

UGTAN of course responded to the nationalist and Pan-Africanist radicalism which engulfed the continent during these years of rapid political decolonization. There was a failure, however, resulting from the evident hegemony of the Guinean section, identified with one man. Now after 1957 this man is but one chief of state among others, yet redoubtable because of the prestige he acquired, by his "No" in the referendum of September 1958. The other states are then going to demand that their unions break with this "foreign" international, about the same time thatthe RDA breaks up. This will be done in the Ivory Coast after the strike of functionaries in September 1959, and in Senegal after the partial and ephemeral Union of the confederations in 1962. This same year, Camille Gris, now becomes a minister in Abidjan, will be convicted in the flurry of conspiracies fabricated at this time to clam the effervescence of the country. In Conakry, Sekou Toure will draw the conclusions by nationalizing what remained of UGTAN.

By 1960, almost all of West Africa has thus achieved international sovereignty, and almost all of East and Central Africa will follow before 1964. All the new states, with their employers' and workers' organizations, then obtain the supreme consecration of their sovereignty: they are admitted to the International Labor Organization in Beneva.

We then enter into a new period in the life of the African unions. Henceforth they have to organize themselves and define their role in the framework of politically independent states, except in the far south still dominated by the racist system.

Then, with a speed varying from country to country, we see the same tendencies triumph little by little throughout Black Africa.

Everywhere the unions are asked to organize strictly within the framework of each state. With these limits, one tends rather quickly to achieve labor unity, as international affiliations are forbidden or tightly controlled. Finally, the activity of the unions is more or less strictly limited, according to the nature of the political regime of the given country. Never was the politicization of the life of the unions as evident, even if ideology denies it, but the revolutionary freedom they turned against the enemy colonial state is henceforth denied them by the national state. They dare not, any more, overtly oppose the state, even when it is controlled by social forces contrary to those they represent.

Several situations can be distinguished, but it is a remarkable fact that they cannot be defined by the diverse characteristics of the unions, but rather by those of the parties.

1. In countries where political diversity subsists, even is there is a dominant party, there is also labor diversity, even if the governments try to impose a more or less artificial unity. This is the case, for example, in huge Nigeria, where the rivalry between the "socializing" unions of Imoudu and his "reformist" competitors, those linked to various large regional parties, lasted up to the beginning of the Civil War in 1967. After that, which ended in 1970, labor activity has not had much momentum. In 1978, precisely because of government pressure, labor unity is still not achieved; a fifth confederation has even just been established.

It happens the same way in Sengal where, however, after the serious Crisis of May 1968, the government believed it succeeded, in 1969, in imposing unity under the chairmanship of Doudou Ngom (CNTS [National Confederation of Workers of Senegal]). The latter proved to be illusory, and the present political pluralism impedes a resumption of the effort. (CNTS + UTLS [Union of Free Workers of Senegal] + SUDES [Sole Democratic Trade Union of Senegalese Teachers]). President Senghor, moreover, has openly disavowed it.

In cases of this type, it is obvious that some labor freedom subsists. If a confederation is supported by the government and the dominant party, this often serves only to reinforce the prestige of its rivals among the workers. Because of this, whatever legal restrictions there may be, it is impossible to avoid all labor conflicts, and wage-earners thus retain a real power of pressure and negotiation.

2. In countries with only one party, we must distinguish between elitist and mass parties.

(a) The first in general profess a liberal type of economic ideology, and are dominated by social groups (planters, small industrials, middle-class) hostile or stand-offish with regard to the unions. The latter are then tightly regulated and subjected to the state, on which they will have only small influence or none at all. Labor unity is strictly imposed, obligatory membership with payroll [dues] deductions /(check off)/ is frequent, and no social agitation is tolerated. So the unions lose all prestige with the worker's, who are forbidden to organize outside them. Thus no outlet is possible for social tensions, and violent and uncontrollable explosions are possible.

We can put into this category Ivory Coast from 1959 on, Kenya since 1965, and Zaire since 1967.

(b) Relations between unions and mass parties are much more diverse.

In certain cases, the party is in some sense an offspring of the unions, but the latter are, to turn the tables, entirely controlled by it. This is the case for example in Guinea, at least since the teachers' strike in November 1961 was broken. In this country, the party being extremely totalitarian and stratified, no form of freedom exists for the workers. This was also, in a lesser degree, the case with Ghana under Nkrumah. But this time, the party not being truly totalitarian, the unions were not able to forestall the spontaneous social movements which contributed to the fall of the regime.

Subsequently, the unions largely regained their freedom with respect to the civilian and military regimes which succeeded it. They succeeded in reconstituting a unitary confederation, the Ghana-TUC, in 1971, after the fall of Busia who had dissolved it, but this [organization], in line with British tradition, is not a loose federation. It is evidently not linked to the government.

In other cases, the unions, while still being closely tied to the party, have kept their autonomy and have even succeeded, for some years, in dominating it and imposing their will on it, often in an irresponsible way, thanks to support from a chief of state desirious of setting two groups of his partisans against each other. The most remarkable example of this situation was that of Mali under the last years of Modibo Keita, especially from 1964 to 1968. One can think also of the Sierra Leone of Siaka Stevens since 1969, although there the ties between union and government are much less close.

(c) Finally, when the one party maintains a healthy dose of internal democracy, the unions retain great freedom of action if they agree to confine themselves within certain limits. They can then substantially influence the government. This is the case for example of Tanzania and Zambia. The latter's situation is all the more remarkable because a serious conflict was ended in 1965 by defeat of the miners' union, which holds a lock on the economy, and by its subordination to the party. Kaunda's profoundly democratic tendencies have prevented him from abusing his victory. The sole confederation (ZCTU) [Zambian Congress of Trade Unions], though laregely autonomous, does not seem, moreover, to be satisfied with its relations with the government.

They are asked, first, to prove their national loyalty, that is, to confine themselves to the borders of the state and not to search for common slogans or even ideologies abroad. This means that the international policy of the state in question has long since settled the problem of international affiliations. The great era of world or even Pan-African unionism, which dominated the period from 1945 to 1960, has thus been ended by a shipwreck on the reefs of government micro-nationalism.

I am going to say a few words about this, in order not to have to return to it.

In 1959-1960, after the collapse of UGTAN, most of the francophone unions had no more international affiliation. Except in Cameroon, the FSM-WFTU no longer had any position in Africa. Its total and definitive failure contrasted with the apparent triumph of CISL-ICFTU, despite the unsettling withdrawal of Ghana at the end of 1959. It is in November 1960, at its regional conference in Tunis, that the CISL created a regional bureau, AFRO [African Regional Organization], while it had already established at Kampala a large labor college in 1957. Its principal support in Black Africa came from the unions in Kenya, then led by the renowned Tom Mboya.

But this triumph was only apparent. All its African affiliates were in fact turned toward nationalism and Pan-Africanism. Those of East and Central Africa, struggling in countries not yet independent, wanted substantial aid as their states achieved independence. American influence and the specter of the CIA made this affiliation worrisome as soon as they were no longer needed in the anticolonial struggle. Thus, from 1963 to 1965, CISL/ICFTU successively lost Algeria, Morocco, Tanganyika, and finally, in a terrible blow, Kenya and Zambia. Tom Mboya was then a minister of his successors at the head of the KLF [Kenya Labor Federation] opposed him. Brussels now held only Tunisia, part of Cameroon and Uganda (the latter only up to 1969). The collapse was almost as complete as that of the FSM 10 years ago. George Meany drew the inferences, vehemently condemning the bureaucratism of the international, at the meeting of its executive board in March 1965, and announcing that the Americans would pay nothing more.

Thus the political liberation of Africa was consecrated by pushing its unionism to the sidelines of the worldwide movement, and by its break-up into two factions.

This labor divisiveness, however, appeared to be in contradiction to the ideal of African unity, which the chiefs of state [publicly] embraced, the better to disguise their strangling of it in practice. Nevertheless, however, contrary were their economic policies, they all desired tight control over the sole unions, without having to account to internationals burdened with democratic prejudices. The ideal was obviously a unitary African international, but one wherein "progressives" and "moderates" would be balanced and would join together to bring to heel unions which agitated too much. In this perspective, the struggle of ATUC-CAS for freedom of affiliation lost its significance.

It was not, however, until 1972 that a preparatory committee was established at Addis Ababa with the aim of merging the two organizations. ATUC's negligence led to the almost unanimous adoption of by-laws inspired by the AATUF-FSPA. The principle of disaffiliation was left to be decided later, but the tide was going in that direction. It is finally in April 1973, at the urging of the OAU, that a unitary international, OATUU-OUSA (Organization of African Trade Union Unity), was finally established. Its headquarters wre set in Addis Ababa, and its chose as president Lansina Sylla of Guinea, and as secretary general Dennis Akumu of Kenya. The first was replaced by Nefishi of Libya, at the second congress, in Tripoli in April 1976. The next congress will take place in 1980.

The significance of the new organization appeared clear when it gave unresearved support to the Tunisian government in the grave labor crisis of January 1980.

The significance of the new organization appeared clear when it gave unreserved support to the Tunisian government in the grave labor crisis of January 1980.

In fact, the OATUU-OUSA is basing its action on two important principles. The first, disaffiliation from any non-African international, is not yet mandatory, only strongly recommended, but it is not the most. More disturbing is the determination to achieve only one confederation for each state, which wrecks the hopes of the men in power, and gravely threatens trade union democracy. Now here is the main point, on which Dennis Akumu ceaselessly harps, making matters worse, one might add, in places such as Liberia, Sierra Leone, and Lesotho.

Beyond this general tendency toward breaking with other internationals and retiring behind the borders of each state, African unionism in the independent states found itself confronted by a general revision of the rules of the social game. Although conditions may vary to extremes, the tendencies have been everywhere the same.

Everywhere, unions have been sternly reminded that they represented minority groups that were relatively privileged, and that it would be scandalous for them to attempt to extend these privileges even further, while the great mass of workers, and peasants, remained condemned to the state of the wretched of the earth and even saw their situation worsening.

This manner of talk was hard to swallow, and it was not always accepted, for it often came from political circles whose commitment to austerity and honesty were to say the least questionable. The refusal of the unions has brought periods of great instability in certain countries, such as Dahomey from 1959 to 1972, and Zambia from 1963 to 1965. These crisis are finally brought to as end by the victory of the political powers, and the bringing to heel of the unions.

Whatever ideology the African states acknowledge, they all reiterate to the unions that their demands must be limited so as not to harm economic growth and, especially in countries with liberal ideology, not to bring about the flight of that foreign investment on which so much hope is resting. It must not be forgotten that, in most of the countries, the state remains the biggest employer. It is thus both judge and party [to the suit]: the main strikes may be directed against it.

Increasingly tight restrictions limit the right to strike and finally subordinate it to advance authorization from the political authorities. Not only must one not impede production, or frighten investment, but above all one must avoid disorders which would risk provoking uncontrollable reactions in the common people, which the leaders feel more and more to be foreign and threatening: barbarism, the enemy within. Now it is not something with which one can negotiate, with its passions and its apparent irrationality, if one is locked into a purely productivist perspective and in the ideology of a unilinear evolution of human society. If the aim is to show that Africans can do as well as Europeans, and catch up to the latter by following the same road, these people must be uprooted and crushed, in order to achieve the basic accumulation of capital pooled in Great Britain or France in the 18th and 19th Centuries, and in the USSR in the 20th Century. Quite a number of African states would endorse this program without too much pain, those which re-established under the name of human development what had been suppressed in 1946 when called forced labor.

But then it is clear that it is not a question of trade union freedon or democracy, much less of self-management or autonomy of worker communities. It is a question of setting inplace the apparatus of appression, sonetimes worse than that of the colonial era, by having to rely, like [that era], on external force to subdue the desperate reactions of the people from the Americans in order to liberate themselves and wanted to avoid any sterile compromise with the Soviet bloc. Their affiliation was thus born more of opportunism than of conviction. In fact, AFRO did not get on its feet really, and was suspended in 1965 by the international for its poor management. Re-established in 1972, much weakened in numbers, it only concerned itself with organizing the struggle against the disaffiliation policy, whcih henceforth the OAU was largely supporting, while promoting the new international, OUSA (OATUU) [Organization of African Trade Union Unity].

This latter is the ambiguous product of another battle.

When a divided Africa was preparing to move, not without pain, toward a compromise, by cerating the OAU, in 1963 at Addis Ababa, the labor movement was not immune from this tendency. The radical nationalists were at that time zlined with Ghana, Guinea, and Mali, as well as with Morocco where the quite markedly leftist unions still remained on good terms with the royal government, which had not forgotten their decisive role in the struggle for independence. To counter CISL/ICFTU, they had convoked at Lagos in November 1959 a preparatory conference on African labor unity. There resulted the formation, in May 1961, at Casablanca, of the FSPA-AATUF (All African Trade Union Federation). But only the African unions described as "progressive" (Casablanca group) were there.* The Religious Workers had refused to join up, and the friends of Tom Mboya had broken at the last moment, because of the prohibition against double affiliation, which would have obliged them to break with CISL-ICFTU, whose political and financial support remained vital.

These dissidents found themselves in January 1962 in Dakar, where they establsihed a rival international, the CSA-ATUC (African Trade Union Confederation). This latter permitted double affiliation, allowing many of its members to remain faithful to the Brussels international.

The two organizations, however, were vastly different.

The FSPA-AATUF having chosen Ben Seddik as president and Tettegah as secretary general, it installed its headquarters in Accra, and enjoyed considerable financial aid from Nkrumah. He did not hide his intention of subordinating his organization to Ghana's Pan-African policy, and he launched himself, with a burst of activity, into the attack against the rival organization. The fall of Nkruman in January 1966 was at the time a veritable catastrophe. The new secretary general, Famady Sissoko of Mali, had to move the headquarters to Tanzania, where it fell into a certain inactivity. Now the ATUC-CSA, with Tlili the Tunisian as president and Guinean exile David Soumah as secretary general, could not expect such support from "moderate" states, who often distrusted all labor activity. It therefore fell largely into torpor and but poorly resisted the calls for unity that the OAU soon made.

The formation of the Dakar international had been a triumph for the CISL-ICFTU, but this success was only apparent. Now provided with their own organization, the "moderate" African unions felt themselves much less attracted by Brussels.

The unions are thus little by little deprived of all freedom of action. In many cases, whereever their cadres were not manual laborers, they have been seriously weakened by the departure of their best leaders to the other side, as ministers or high officials. Besides, it is no longer possible for a charismatic figure like the great labor leaders of the fifties, the Sekou Toures, John Tettegahs, Tom Mboyas, and Lawrence Katilungus, to be allowed to rise up in the face of a President with more or less monarchical pretensions.

This is where we are now. This situation is neither bright nor encouraging. If we wish to peer a bit into the future, we must start from the evidence that the evolution of African trade unionism cannot take place outside that of the overall societies, and is particularly dependent on the future of democracy.

The latter now seems thoroughly compromised. It is sacrificed on the altar of development and national construction. Now that is a pregnant term. Development and national construction can only be real if founded on the organic nature of the African peoples, that is, on liberating the initiative of the local communities, emerging into forms of self-administration, which constitute the most radical ideal of democracy, and of a socialism which is more than just a word to mask centralized bureaucratic tyranny. In other words the rule of the intellectual petty bourgeois, even if its members describe themselves as "organic intellectuals."

From this standpoint, for example, the single party could never be an ideal to pursue as the Malagasies are presently proclaiming in their misguided state, but only a temporary expedient, to get through a difficult period. This seems obvious to me, for example, in the case of a country seriously threatened like Burundi. Even in this case, it cannot be excused unless it allows the greatest internal democracy and respect for the most divergent factions. What Julius Nyerere tried to do in Tanzania but, it seems, without too much success.

I would say as much for the unions. The mandatory single union is an evil: it can only be an expedient and not an ideal. It assumes in any case that the greatest internal democracy obtains. The workers should be free to join, to designate their representatives before different bodies, and to express their demands. These being sectoral, clearly the political authority will have to arbitrate; but its intervention should only occur at that stage.

It is thus of significance that the new international, OATUU-OUSA, so closely tied to the OAU, should be given the mission to press everywhere for the single confederation, to the point of excluding from its bodies countries which have not achieved it. By all means, a single confederation linked to a single party should at the very least be autonomous, and influential enough to direct the policy of this party toward the aspirations of its members. If not, the latter will not accord it any respect, and will drop out of it if they are not required to be formal members, and will build up an anger ready to explode. In such a case, the union becomes totally useless. It would be better to suppress it than to let it indulge in the hypocritical ritual of congresses, conferences and motions.

Wage-earners are growing in number quite rapidly now in Africa, but not to the point that the social groups represented but unions should soon cease to be minorities. Further, the aim of socialism is precisely the abolition of the wage-earning class, thus of exploitation. If this perhaps appears utopian in the short term, it at least vindicates the concept of self-management, which aims at another kind of social relationship. Organizations representing such a sector will not be trade unions per se, and they should extend to the whole of the peasantry. Their meeting face to face with the ordinary trade unions should bring the latter out of their isolation, and enable them to escape the reproach of sectoral egoism which is raised against them and which they should take with utmost seriousness in the African context.

In any case, if one stayed with the OATUU-OUSA model, which so many African leaders ignorantly hold up as an ideal, namely the ideal of the single and mandatory union, entirely controlled from higher up, thus allowing strikes to be prevented, worker productivity to be increased, and worker demands diminished, let us admit forthwith that it would be better to suppress them. The government's appointed agents can transmit its orders perfectly well by themselves. It is obvious that it is not the unions' role to see to the building of the nation, which moreover needs to be defined, or even economic development, but, in the framework of a system controlled by the wage-earners, to compensate for the inferior position of workers in the relations of production.

Even from the point of view of development, and in a productivist ideology, they are useful to prevent managers from yielding to expedience and to provide an outlet for worker frustrations, to avoid a build-up of anger which could end in an outbreak of violent strikes and actions. These latter would in reality be much more deleterious than a slowdown in the rate of accumulation of basic capital, that admirable goal which many African states openly embrace, and for which they proclaim themselves ready to sacrifice everything.

What can be said in conclusion?

A recent phenomenon, not yet involving more than a small part of the population, African unions are like the continent itself, which is trying to rebuild its identity without being able to break with a global system which wanted to despoil it. Their situation is characteristic of countries where, to follow Gramsci's terminology, one is surprised to observe that the distinction between political society and polite society is belied by the facts. These two categories are in fact inseparable, limited to a small minority. By contrast, the immense majority is cast out of polite society, into a status of non-existence, an object of exploitation in the name of an abstract vision of the nation, which is defined without any connection to the social and cultural reality of the people. An uneasy elite, and more and more cut off from the masses, is searching in vain [ways] to control the latter and moves ineluctably toward centralist and authoritarian solutions. In absense of regulation and counterweight, the worst despotisms are free to emerge.

Now up to the present African unionism has only represented a fraction of this elite, or at least has only been led, basically, by a fraction. It is alien to the most oppressed and poorest elements which constitute the mass of the population, but which are also the bearers of African identity and among whom are the only forces which could permit real development.

Thus their profoundly contradictory situation is explained. Powerful agents of national liberation, the African unions do not represent the mass of the workers, and the demands of the wage-earners often seem the expression of the egoism of a privileged minority. This explains the fact that their adversary function is not easily accepted and how they have at last been brought to heel by the independent states, despite the great power which they demonstrated during the preceding period.

But the advocacy function, which they hardly perform anymore, remains a necessity. It is the sina qua non of the development in Africa of an organic democracy, without which neither African identity nor real development is possible.

The free competition of unions cannot, however, be found or developed unless the peoples of Africa succeed in breaking with the mechanical imitation, which besides is impossible, of political models which are already bankrupt in Europe, in order to achieve an organic democracy which will return power and initiative to their peoples. The profound restructuring of rural African societies, taking care not to destroy them, starting at the local communities, could then support a limited and balanced urbanization and industrialization. In such a context, trade unionism could become a mass phenomenon and play a role in the establishment of equilibrium and checks and balances without which no democratic future, no real development, is possible. And this is not a question, I believe, of fantasies tied to the European tradition or to certain circumstances, but of universal ideas tied to human nature

Otherwise, the unions have no other future than that of being a driving belt of the state, and an organization of surveillance and repression of the workers in support of a productivist logic of human exploitation. They will then be swept away once this particular historical stage will have passed, as I think cannot fail to happen.

INDEPENDENCE OF FRANCOPHONE AFRICA EXAMINED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 pp 1644-1647

[Article by Alex Rondos: "How Independent Is Francophone Africa After 20 Years?"]

[Text] This year is the 20th anniversary of independence of all of France's former colonies with the exception of Guinea. During the next four months we will be publishing a series of occasional articles dealing with different aspects of Francophone Africa.

The first consists of a review article, the first part of which appears this week, by Alex Rondos, which considers some aspects of Francophone Africa, the relationship between France and its former colonies and the prospects for the future.

DISCUSSION about the development of France's former colonies since independence has been bedevilled by a paradox which has been aggravated by the limited attention which has been paid to the subject. Though all these countries opted for independence as individual territories 20 years ago, they continue to show sufficient elements in their development to justify their being referred to collectively, though somewhat misleadingly, as Francophone Africa.

Why misleadingly? A brief phrase in last year's budget report of the French Ministry of Co-operation should illustrate the central issue. In describing the geographical distribution of French aid, it defined Francophone Africa as those countries in which at least 3 per cent of the population have as their main language French. One can travel without interruption from Tangier to Libreville, by way N'Djamena and Bangui, without ever having to go into a territory whose politically dominant group is not French-speaking.

It is the language of power; of power bequeathed, on strict conditions, by France. The conditions were accepted by African élites as part of a deal that would ensure their security in political power. The language represents a culture that is alien to the majority of the populations but which continues to be considered as the offical language. In another generation there will be thousands more young people who will be proficient in French, because without it, and whatever nationalist rhetoric they are served, they know that advancement will be denied them, and advancement consists of a niche in the bureaucracies of Francophone Africa. One is faced therefore with a complex issue; France did not impose the language after independence; it was willingly adopted by independent nations. Language, along with rule by a single party or the military, has become the instrument for unity in the nation. Those who control the instruments have proved to be the social groups which inherited the machinery of state at independence from France.

Unity and diversity

There are other instruments which France bequeathed to the nationalist leaders of each territory to facilitate their consolidation of power and which in return ensured France a pre-eminent, almost exclusive role. If language provided the cultural link, it was reinforced by a series of institutional ties both bilaterally between France and the territory and among all the territories all of which have been cemented by the support of France. Twenty years after independence, President Senghor is in the process of creating a Francophone Commonwealth whose geographical foundation is in Africa, and whose raison d'être are the numerous knots by which these countries have been tied by France to each other and to France.

Two books* which have appeared recently deal with the problem of unity, without ever really facing the major issue of why this notion of unity has existed in the first place. They illustrate the paradox mentioned earlier of unity contending with diversity. However, on reading them, one is struck by the absence of any thorough analysis of the French role both in the period leading up to decolonisation and in the subsequent two decades. In fact this paradox could be resolved by accepting, as some are very reluctant to do, the fact that the continuity of French presence in most sectors has conditioned the development of all these countries. It is still within the framework of the French influence (which might be consciously or, as is often the case, unconsciously operated) that the embryonic signs of diversity and autonomy are seen. I would go further by suggesting that the existence of this framework has delayed the emergence of that autonomy and could seriously compromise it because it has gone so far in consolidating the positions of those élites who are the instruments of and operators of that relationship between France and Africa. In other words, independence has to be redefined while one establishes the precise nature of where decisions are taken concerning the development of France's former colonies.

Economic and social

This, inevitably takes one back to the period leading up immediately to independence. The story of politics in French-speaking Africa has been well told in English already (by Ruth Schachter Morgenthau and Edward Mortimer). It is one of the "balkanisation" of Francophone Africa. The reasons were economic (Ivory Coast refused to become the milch cow of the AOF; Dahomey nestling near the Nigerian giant resented the idea of dikatas emanating from a distant federal capital in Darak; the Mossi agitated for their own territory) and also social in that ethnic conflict often occured in the mines in Guinea, against Togolese and Voltaics in Ivory Coast, over the blacks of Southern Mauritania. There were, in addition, personal ambitions. Why become a small fish in the very large pond of the proposed federated community of states when one could be the big fish in the small territorial pond? The results were territories shorn of competent trained people to run them, but controlled by élites which had established themselves, with the ultimate approval of the French authorities — Hamani Diori eventually came to power in Niger, for instance, after the elections were rigged against Djibo Bakary.

These élites were in desperate need of some security in the knowledge that they were acquiring responsibility for economies that were vulnerable monocultures which until independence had the guarantee of the French market. Now it was continuity with France on conditions or the frightening plunge into the world market. Only Guinea opted out, though its subsequent experience as a country that is still dependent on the unprocessed export of its iron and bauxite and is led by an élite which controls the state apparatus has rendered it effectively little different to most of the other states.

Central theme of objections

Those who have argued against the balkanisation, President Senghor being the most prominent among them — and de Benoist takes up their arguments — have had two central themes to their objections; it was said by some that with independence to all the 14 territories one would have "African governments running European administrations", while others said that at least a federated community would be able to take advantage of the complementarity of economic development in each territory.

Instead 14 territories engaged in a series of separate negotiations with France in the months leading up to mid-1960 which culminated in a mass of comprehensive co-operation agreements in the fields of economic affairs, education, culture, defence, communications, civic status and property rights.

General de Gaulle, summing up that year and the result of the agreements which were the condition for independence, puts it eloquently: "Between France, on the one hand, and a sizeable part of Africa on the other, an assemblage of men, teritories and resources was built up whose common language was French; which in terms of currency constituted the franc zone, in which goods of every kind were exchanged on a preferential basis; in which there was regular consultation on political and diplomatic matters; in which each was pledged to help the other in case of danger; in which sea and air transport and the telegraph, the telephone and radio networks were co-ordinated; in which every citizen, wherever he came from and wherever he went, knew and felt himself, far from being a stranger, to be welcome, esteemed and to a large extent at home."

It meant the constitution of a network of links, whose foundation would be the franc zone, which is itself places serious constraints on the monetary independence of the member states — in almost any other context the franc zone may have been welcomed but between Paris and its ex-colonies it raises the ugly question: whither decolonisation? It has also created the conditions for privileged trading ties between France and these countries, favouring of French capital and dependence on foreign capital, initially overwhelmingly French, for investment in development and reinforced the relative power of the French enterprises already in existence, and the continuation of dependence on export commodities to the international market.

The African corollary is captured in the title of one of Biarnes' chapters: "The irresistable rise of the bourgeoisie."

Houphouët on "How to lose Africa"

ACCORDING to President Houphouët Boigny, the West is about to "lose Africa". In a remarkably vigorous interview with the editor of the French weekly Paris-Match, the Ivorian leader expressed not only his fears about the Soviet role in Africa, but also of the shortsightedness of the West in its dealings with Africa.

That Africa might become the stage for a military confrontation between the West and the Soviet Union is not a realistic proposition in his view. It is the diverging interpretation of détente which worries the President. In the East, he suggests, détente is a means not an end. The conflict that will take place in Africa will be an economic one; "that is to say the real battleground will be the supply of raw materials, of which Europe is bereft". The Soviet Union, according to President Houphouët-Boigny, will achieve its end by preventing the delivery of raw materials to Europe from its principal source, Africa. "The Russian objective is to prevent countries in which it has a foothold, through Cuba, from delivering raw materials to Europe." They will achieve this by destroying stability in countries — he used Angola, Ethiopia and Congo as examples — by inflicting a form of "organised poverty". If Communist influence expands and if Africa is unable to deliver its raw materials to Europe, "Russia will paralyse Europe without firing a shot".

As to what the West could do to redress matters, the President was bitterly critical of the way in which the West treats its friends. The worst error of the West has been in not paying the right price for raw materials from "friendly countries" which are attached to the West by culture, language and liberal economies".

Falling price of cocoa

The best example of this is to be found in the treatment of Ivory Coast by what he considers to be the speculation in New York and London in cocoa, the price of which has declined from over £3,000 a tonne in July, 1977, to less than £1,000 today. Instead of following the inflationary trend in the international economy, prices for agricultural products are falling, and there is not even a guaranteed price for the current season, the President observed. "The prices of our vital exports are at the mercy of the caprice of the brokers. Europe is gambling with the lives of our peasants without realising that it is gambling at the same time with its own destiny." The decline in the price of raw materials has also affected minerals, and yet the President notes bitterly that "mineral prices fall, but steel prices do not fall".

It is this sort of egoistic policy, the President maintains, which will impoverish and destabilise Europe's "best friend, Ivory Coast".

Reiterating the point that the West's worst enemy was its many commodity exchanges which speculate on raw materials and destabilise African economies for whose products that is no real guaranteed minimum price, the President added that he believed that the reason for the fall in prices was that lies had been disseminated to justify a further decline in prices — allegations there had been overproduction. This, he says, is not true. Brazil, about to overtake Ivory Coast as the world's leading producer, uses half of its production for domestic consumption, and he noted that other countries had already been obliged to sell ahead a year's production, because they have no other recourse.

The overall result leads President Houphouët-Boigny to a damning conclusion: "The incomprehension of international capitalism vis-à-vis Africa and the Russian wish to destabilise these states will have the same result: permanent revolution and generalised misery. Who will have won? The result is not flattering to the West and our youth is beginning to wonder if you [the West] are going to continue to sacrifice their interests."

The President had another complaint. The West has helped in the installation of industry in Africa, but refuses to import the products. "It only wants to buy our raw materials." The attack went on to a third point: against the "dishonesty of some companies". He was referring to the crippling costs imposed by the construction of the sugar processing plants in the north of Ivory Coast. They overcharged, according to the President, to the tune of 34bn. CFA francs. The only unit to have proved cost effective was that constructed by the French at Borotou, he said.

His basic message was that the West must change its economic policies towards Africa. This will be possible when the West appreciates "that the best weapon against adventures is not the despatch of aircraft and troops; it is in facilitating the happiness of people." Europe "must get a grip of itself because what is happening at the moment is sad. Europe still has things to offer to the world. One day Europe must be proud of its African daughter, as England today is proud of the United States."

President Houphouët-Boigny has never been one to mince his words, and there are many who might disagree with his view of the commodity and futures market. There was a slight hint that he might consider withdrawal from the commodity market when he contested the consumer opinion that the cocoa crop could not be stored for long in the humidity of the tropics. He noted, ominously, that Ivory Coast had the means now to store its crop for long periods.

His most important message, however, at which some other African leaders might baulk, but which they cannot ignore, coming as it does from a leader of his international prestige, is that there is not "one world" but "two worlds" today: the East and the West. It is quite clear which he has opted for.

Perfidious Albion rides again

IT SEEMS THAT in some French circles it is believed that perfidious Albion is at it again. A long article by Figaro's correspondent in Uganda suggests that the French mission there, which included some military observers, is being sabotaged by the reaction in London, Dar es Salaam and Nairobi. Somehow the World Service of the BBC seems to be the target of this criticism. The journalist suggests that French doctors and other helpers who listen to the World Service have been horrified at the interpretation of the French offer of assistance as an ambition to extend French influence in Uganda. The article suggests that this is the "spirit of Fashoda".

Having heard one of the BBC commentaries and having commented on the French assistance in Uganda in these columns, I would suggest that the French men and women have not quite got the point, which is that France is indeed interested in extending its economic ties with other parts of Africa, and eastern Africa is an important political and economic area for French policies. Paris no longer depends solely on its former colonies and is, in a sense, compensating by expanding. That the Ugandan action is a humanitarian gesture by France is beyond doubt. But there is the inescapable fact that in Africa, especially Anglophone Africa, the French role in the continent is not judged by polite ministerial visits to Nairobi, Dar es Salaam, Lagos or Freetown, but by military interventions in Chad, Mauritania, Zaire and Central African Republic.

Survivor from Bokassa rule

ONE OF THE MAJOR sources of immediate disenchantment with the Dacko rule in the Central African Republic was his decision to retain Bokassa's Prime Minister, Henri Maidou, whom Dacko made vice-president. Now, it is reported that President Dacko has removed this obstacle by sanctioning the dismissal and house arrest of M. Maidou. It was reported that the Prime Minister, Christian Bernard Ayandho, was also dismissed. Both men are now under house arrest and being guarded by French troops.

ONCAD is abolished

SENEGAL'S ECONOMIC problems have been frequently commented upon in these columns, and one of the most constant targets for criticism has been ONCAD, the National Office of Co-operation and Development Aid. It had the monopoly for the purchase of the groundnut crop, the sale of the country's rice production, the supply of agricultural equipment, fertiliser and seed for the groundnut sector and was also responsible for 1,600 peasant co-operatives.

Now in a surprising development, the government has decided to abolish ONCAD. Criticism reached a peak last year when it was revealed that there had been massive embezzlement by the office's agents. Peasants had, anyway, become so disillusioned with ONCAD that they refused to repay their debts.

Under the new system, co-operatives will continue to exist but will sell their groundnut crop directly to Senegal's four main groundnut oil refineries. Agricultural equipment will be supplied by the national rural supply company. A special commission has been set up to find employment for ONCAD's 4,500 employees.

ALGERIA EXPLORES FOR OIL--The Algerian oil minister, Ndugu Belkacem Nabi, has arrived in Dar Es Salaam today for talks in connection with drilling for oil off the coast of Tanzania. Ndugu Nabi told reporters that Algeria will start drilling for oil off the coast of Tanzania before the end of this year. He said oil experts from Algeria will arrive in the country in the near future to implement this project. He said Algeria will soon bring in oil drilling equipment. Ndugu Nabi is leading a four-man delegation. Meanwhile, the minister of water, energy and minerals, Ndugu al-Noor Kassum, said that an Algerian firm, [name indistinct], will be responsible for the oil-drilling operation. A cooperation agreement between Tanzania and Algeria will be signed at the end of the 2-day visit by the Algerian oil minister. The oil-drilling operation will be carried out by Algeria following the discovery of oil off the coast of Tanzania. Parliament recently passed a bill on drilling for and production of oil in the country. A foreign office spokesman said that Ndugu Nabi will also deliver a special message to President Nyerere from President Chadli Bendjedid of Algeria. ZIMBABWE-KENYA TRADE--Zimbabwe is aiming for a "trade boom" with Kenya, the Assistant Secretary of Foreigh Trade, Ministry of Commerce and Industry, Mr David Moss, forecasts. He said Kenya had previously tended to be a trading centre for countries in the East and Central African regions. It could also be a trading centre for Zimbabwe. Mr Moss has just returned from an export promotion tour of Kenya accompanied by another official from the Ministry, Mr Chris Mazhandu. The two men also went to arrange Zimbabwe's participation in the six-day Kenya International Show starting on September 29. Kenyan businessmen had expressed interest in buying a wide range of items produced in Zimbabwe. "There is a great potential for our agricultural equipment, footwear, vegetable seeds and higher quality clothing." Steel was also likely to attract Kenyan importers and opportunities for Kenyan exports were being explored. At the show trade information will be provided for prospective importers and the stand will be manned by Zimbabweans. A Salisbury travel agency in conjunction with Kenya Airways will offer an inclusive tour of Kenya for businessmen attending the show. SA-ZAIRE AIR ROUTE TALKS--Pretoria--The South African government is conducting negotiations with the Zairian government with the intention of establishing regular freight aircraft flights between the two countries, according to a statement made here yesterday by Transport Affairs Minister Chris Heunis. The negotiations are subject to the condition that both countries will be able to provide this service. Heunis said that freight flights will be scheduled on an ad hoc basis between Johannesburg and Kinshasa in collaboration with Air Zaire. This will not affect the flights of South Africa's syndicate partnerships and the flights with hired aircraft. On 21 July of this year the South African Airline carried out a test flight to Kinshasa. SURVEY OF AGRICULTURAL, INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS

London WEST AFRICA in English 11, 18 Aug 80

[Two-part article by Colin Foy: "Regrowth of Angola"]

[11 Aug 80, pp 1475-6]

[Excerpts]

ANGOLA'S traumatic birth as an independent nation at the end of 1975 has left it with scars still to heal.

On the agricultural side, the familiar problem of co-ordinating peasant production to supply surplus food to the towns is being tackled. The problem is that the peasants don't want money if there is nothing to spend it on and the destruction of Angola's internal trade and economic infrastructure mean that this is all too often the case. An attempt is being made to overcome the problem by bartering basic goods with the peasants in return for the staple, maize, crop. Other crops, such as fruit and vegetables, are sold for money at town and village markets where the government is trying to supply consumer goods for sale. The flight of people into the forests in the Central Highlands following Unita's defeat, and their current sudden return, are, however, complicating the situation.

800,000 people have come out of the forests in the provinces of Huambo and Bie alone since January. Their former land has for four years lain fallow and, in any case, most of these regressados are suffering from malnutrition and a whole range of diseases. Besides, what is left of Unita, after the recent government campaign against them, have turned to banditry, burning crops and stealing livestock in the more remote areas. This causes a secondary flow of refugees towards the towns. The result is that strictly local production cannot support the population and supplies need to be moved from other provinces where there is a surplus into Bie and similarly afflicted areas. The catch here is that is that the Luanda bureaucracy all too often are slow or obstructive in facilitating such food movements. Lt.-Col. Petroff, Provincial Commissar of Huambo, says this problem is being tackled by the setting up of provincial planning departments in each province with a degree of autonomy to deal with each other. This will certainly have to be done quickly, for the situation, particularly in Bie, is getting desperate.

As far as cash crops are concerned, the government has the situation under much better control. Most of the coffee, cotton and palm oil products were produced on European plantations on a fairly large scale. Now these have been taken over as state farms. Thus, the evidence is that the state farms appear to be operating reasonably successfully.

MPLA's strategy, as a Marxist party, is eventually to have a planned economy. This, of course, will necessitate the phasing out of individual peasant production and the incorporation of the peasants into organised co-operatives and state farms. The "proletarianising" of the peasantry, however, is still a long way off and its final achievement will have to await the coming of peace to the country.

One interesting project has been started. Situated near Kaala, south east of Huambo, an ambitious scheme seeks to link a state farm with a quarry and stone crushing plant close to a spur of the Benguela railway. Included in the plans is a new town with social, sports, educational and medical facilities and housing 10,000 people who will supply the labour for the whole complex.

Commissar Petroff explains, "The aim is to turn peasants into proletarians, to show the old Unita supporters that the government can give them good houses, jobs and security. The regressados form an available and ready, landless workforce; we hope that other people, seeing the success of this project, will be inclined to move into others like it."

Before moving the workers in, however, the basic buildings are being completed at the farm and the stone crushing plant. The new town has yet to be begun. In the meantime, equipment and machinery arrives from East Germany who, under the contract, will also supply training and support personnel. Petroff emphasises the ambitious nature of the scheme and stresses that labour will be recruited on a voluntary basis, if it is successful, more like it will follow.

Overall, agriculture is not in such a bad way, considering that Angola has suffered five years of war since independence. Many improvements, of course, can be made. The bureaucracy must be overcome in order to make it more responsive and obedient to the needs of the nation. Education, medical care and industrial goods need to be made more widely available. In general, however, the Angolan government and MPLA-Workers' Party do not appear blind to the short-comings, they are openly discussed and genuine attempts are being made to come to terms with them and deal with them. The refugee problems, the South African invasions and the economic disruption caused by the civil war and occasional Unita activity, however, make all these tasks more difficult.

[Excerpts]

PORTUGAL viewed Angola as its most prized possession. This was the most developed colony and the richest, with its mineral deposits of diamonds, iron ore and oil.

Today, Angola remains rich in resources but their exploitation has been interrupted by the constant warfare which has plagued the country since independence.

Reconstruction began straight after independence, but it has been a long and difficult job. One of the most difficult parts of the process, after the lack of trained technical personnel, has been the difficulty of keeping the factories going at maximum capacity. The director of TEXTANG, a textile factory in Luanda explains: "The salary is fixed at 17,000 Kwanzas (about £245), which is below what workers can get elsewhere. So, many left initially and now we lack sufficient skilled operators." Thus, the factory, while it does have experienced middle-level technical people (repairmen, fitters, etc), cannot get enough trained people to work the machines.

Comfortable relationship

Elsewhere, the situation is better. SATEL, in Dondo, and CO-Huambo, in Huambo are two other textile factories, both operating more efficiently than TEXTANG. Part of the reason is that their work-force did not have the range of alternative wage employment that their counterparts in Luanda had. They are also much smaller. It is possible in either of these two to see how the system of workers' involvement in decision making operates, with its trade union representatives on the management committee and that committee's consultation with shop-floor meetings. The result appears to be a comfortable working relationship which helps the companies to cope with some of the problems of transport and supply which inevitably crop up.

All the industrial enterprises, however, suffer as a result of the scarcity of consumer goods and inefficient food supply lines. The scarcity of goods has led to the growth of a black market and huge rises in prices. Often, food, when difficult to obtain in the towns, can be found in the countryside, but the travelling to get it can cause unacceptable levels of absenteeism in the factories. All this has led to an effective devaluation of the Kwanza so that people prefer to be paid, at least partly, in the goods they produce — thus fuelling the black market. The process has now become circular and the government realises that, sooner or later, it will have to take strong measures to break the circle.

The Benguela railway, often the target of Unita attacks, is now making a modest recovery. More or less regular trains pass along its length and this is attested to by the presence of Zairean wagons in Huambo and Lobito. Sabotage has taken a heavy toll, both of stock and lives, and the depot in Huambo has the heartbreaking task of repairing the damage done. The repair yard their is littered with the shattered remains of rolling stock torn apart by terrorist bombs. Most of the mines are laid in thinly-populated Moxico province and their target has been the railway's diesel engines — of the 25 running at independence, only five remained in service by January this year.

The recent rout of Unita forces has, however, resulted in greater success in defending the line and hundreds of kilos of explosive have been recovered. New diesels are on the way from UN and EEC sources and an upturn in the railway's fortunes seems to be imminent. Alternative routes from the inland, such as the Beira rialway, have been found to be unable to make up for the services the Benguela railway provides and it is therefore seen by all its users as a vital asset. With international co-operation, then, the railway will again recover its pre-eminence as an integral part of the African transport network. It will, however, remain vulnerable. 700 miles long, with extensive stretches in sparsely populated areas, the target is still an easy one and its defence will continue to be a difficult task.

Mining is recovering

On the mining side, DIAMANG has recovered from its all-time low and now produces 1,400,000 carats' worth of diamonds per year — at twice 1973 values. 80 per cent of production is of gemstones, for which England is the largest customer. Cutting is no longer done in Portugal, where much of the profit used to be creamed off, and now Angola holds 77.21 per cent of the shares in the company.

Another success story is the oil industry. Here, Angola, recognising the paucity of its technical expertise, has decided to develop its petroleum resources in partnership with Gulf Oil of the United States. The deposits located in Cabinda and Saio (N. Angola), are exploited under special laws which vest all mineral rights in the state. Gulf's contribution comes in the form of technology and finance. Angolan personnel are being trained in a special petroleum school near Ngunza (formerly Novo Redondo), in Kwanza-Sul province. The school, set up with Italian assistance, is an impressive place, employing the latest equipment and techniques eventually to train people for work at all levels of the business. Production of oil is proceeding apace and is on target to reach the levels set for it by the government.

Other mining projects include plans for extracting iron ore, black granite, quartz and phosphates while, in the future, it is hoped to mine copper. In these areas, the situation is less secure. The iron ore mines are in Kassinga and Kasala Kitungu. The latter, near Dondo, is in its formative stages, but the Kassinga mine has been producing for some years. The problem is that Kassinga was, and still is, the site of South African attacks and operations there have often been interrupted. As a further complication, the Kassinga mine relies on using a railway which is often the target of South African sabotage. Nonetheless, both mines are in production and output is rising. Eventually, it is hoped to incorporate Kassinga into an international iron and steel producing complex involving an independent Namibia, Zambia and Zaire. These plans, of course, will have to await the outcome of the complex political situations in the Namib region.

Angola is potentially one of the foremost industrial nations in Africa. With the large hydro-electric potential of the Cunene, Cuanza and other rivers, and with its vast mineral resources, there is no reason why it should not become so. Already its industrial base is impressive. Its biggest problem, of course, is achieving political and military peace — something which has eluded it thus far.

BRIEFS

DIAMOND PRODUCTION--The Angolan diamond mining company Diamang produced 675,000 carats in the first six months of this year and expects to reach its 1980 production target of 1.4m. carats, the Angola news agency ANGOP reports. Last year Angola produced 341,000 carats, compared to a pre-independence output of 2.4m. carats in 1974. Diamang plans to raise production to 2m. carats a year in 1983. Almost all diamond mining in Angola is now reported to be mechanised, except in the Andrada area, where manual methods were still used. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 11 Aug 80 p 1503]

DATA ON AGREEMENTS SIGNED WITH PRC ON 8 JULY

Brazzaville MWETI in French 10 Jul 80 pp 1, 5

[Article by special correspondent Claude Bivoua: "New Perspectives for Sino-Congolese Cooperation"]

[Excerpt] New perspectives have decidedly been opening up for amicable Sino-Congolese cooperation since the signing Tuesday 8 July in Peking of four documents following talks conducted in person by Premier Guofeng Hua and President Denis Sassou-Nguesso.

Inspired by the general impetus for national recovery and an end to the "freeze"--as prescribed by the delegates to the Third Special Congress of the Congolese Labor Party--these perspectives are taking form in the sectors of Mines and Energy, Rural Economy, Transportation, Culture, and Health.

Three documents establish the dimensions of these perspectives. They are: the report concerning the economic and technical cooperation authorized between the People's Republic of China and the People's Republic of the Congo; the report concerning the talks with respect to implementation of four new points; and the cultural agreement, renewable every 5 years.

The new chapter in the friendship existing between the Congo and China is embodied in a list of new projects for some of which the preliminary studies have already been made. Specifically, the projects chosen relate to priority sectors such as agriculture, transportation and health. Principal among them are the survey--and construction--of the Ngo-Djambala highway; the development of three airports, at Loubomo, Sibiti and Djambala, respectively; the development of rice growing; the supplying of water to Lekana; and the equipping of 10 microhydroelectric power plants.

Because the projects undertaken previously have experienced minor difficulties they will benefit from appropriate measures: for example, the state farm at Kombe will be rehabilitated and CHACONA [Naval Shipyard] will build ships with metal hulls. The Kinsoundi textile mill, however, is one sector for which the Chinese side believes additional study is necessary. Other sectors such as the commercial sector (and OFNACOM [National Marketing Office] in particular) require--to a lesser degree--an in-depth review of delays in deliveries and also of its financing.

Under the provisions of the cultural agreement the contracting parties--in accordance with the principles of equality and reciprocal advantages--will develop exchanges and cooperation in the fields of culture, education, the social sciences, public health, sports, publishing, the press, and radio broadcasting.

ADDITIONAL DETAILS ON PRC-CONGOLESE COOPERATION

Brazzaville MWETI in French 15 Jul 80 p 2

[Article: "The Facts of Sino-Congolese Cooperation"]

[Text] Three documents make it possible in this month of July to draw up the list of accomplished facts and projects under way in PRC-Congolese cooperation now beginning its 16th year: the economic and technical agreement of 8 July 1980, the report on the terms of the previous agreements, and the cultural cooperation agreement of 8 July 1980. Given below are details from these texts to be noted:

--two projects were to be brought immediately to the execution phase, as indicated in the above-cited report;

--the Brazzaville Peoples Palace. The Peoples Republic of Congo has confirmed with China that the sum of 1.3 billion planned for necessary local expenditures during the start-up phase set for the first half of 1981 is now partially available; the drawing up of the plan was completed well before the scheduled deadline;

--the popularization center for agricultural techniques will be established near the Kombe State Farm, 17 km south of Brazzaville.

Three projects have been in suspense since 1975, the provisions for putting them into execution have been re-drafted:

--construction of the Military Academy commits the Peoples Republic of Congo to asphalt the road leading to the construction site; to assure water supply and preliminary electric power for the zone in the vicinity of Itatolo;

--the Pointe-Noir Polyclinic Hospital required feasibility studies; a Chinese mission will come before the end of the year to pull together the dossiers already on hand;

Finally the water supply project for Lekana mentioned in the agreements of 2 March 1975 will also proceed to the feasibility study phase before the end of the current year.

New Arrangements

In view of the improvement in production in the rice-growing regions of the Congo, China has agreed to send a mission to the Congo before the end of the first half of 1981.

The moratorium for repayment of the 1969 loan has been increased by 4 more years, as well as the time limit for utilizing credits going back to 1972, extended by 5 years.

Three new projects have been examined in the course of the conversations:

--the project for asphalting the Ngo-Djambala-Lekana road (165 km);

--the construction of runways at Loubomo, Sibiti and Djambala airports;

--and finally the construction of ten small hydroelectric power stations.

The Chinese mission has formulated for itw own account a forest products project on Congolese territory.

The last request recorded in these agreements is from the Congolese side; inviting China to diversify the production of the Madingou lime-spar crushing plant by supplying forges for the manufacture of lime and chalk.

The Old Projects

The understandings arrived at in the talks between Sassou and Hua Guofeng call for "increased development of economic and technical relations between the two countries."

In order to achieve this purpose China agrees to provide renovation work on the shortwave broadcasting station of RTC [Congolese Radio and Television] in accordance with a previous agreement concluded on 18 March last; Chinese experts are in process of checking out equipment on the site. Concrete specifications for renovation will follow when this mission has completed its diagnosis.

Conversion of the Chacona naval shipyard will get under way during the first half of 1981 for the purpose of constructing light tonnage vessels with steel hull.

The Peoples Republic of Congo reserves for itself the right to do the study on a solution for the problem raised by the Kinsoundi textile mill following the difficulties reported by the Chinese in supplying more modern equipment than that in place, at the present time.

The Kombe State Farm needed straightening out, recently taken in hand by a Chinese technical commission by way of preparing a report expected this coming September.

Regarding the projects due to come into being at one or another practical phase of the forthcoming projects, the Chinese Government has granted the Congolese Government a 1.3 billion credit without interest for a period of 5 years beginning 1 January 1981, to alleviate the financial shortfall in projects already authorized and other projects to be decided on by consultation between the two governments.

Finally, the cultural cooperation agreement defines the area for bilateral initiatives in the fields of cultural affairs, education, social sciences, public health, sports, the press, and radio broadcasting. It deserves mention that the two countries agree to have their respective literary and artistic works translated and published.

OFNACOM-PRODINTORG COOPERATION NOTED

Brazzaville MWETI in French 8 Jul 80 p 2

[Article: "Fruitful Cooperation Between OFNACOM and PRODINTORG"]

[Excerpts] As of next Monday the National Marketing Office (OFNACOM) will have a monopoly over the importation and marketing of Soviet canned goods. Pursuant to a $1 million contract signed recently between OFNACOM and the Soviet firm PRODINTORG, approximately 45,000 cases of canned foods will be purchased this year by OFNACOM. Five kinds of canned foods will be marketed throughout the national territory.

It should be emphasized that PRODINTORG last 17 June organized--in Brazzaville--a product tasting of crab, salmon, caviar, mackerel and tuna for the benefit of trade officials of our country.

PRODINTORG last year supplied to the Congo a total of 35,500 cases of canned fish. The progress in respect to sales of canned foods on the Congolese market--and particularly in recent years--has been achieved thanks to fruitful cooperation with OFNACOM. The canned foods (kippered herring, sardines, mackerel and tuna) sold in the OFNACOM stores are well known to Congolese customers.

APPEAL ON BEHALF OF POLITICAL PRISONERS

Paris LE MONDE in French 5 Aug 80 p 5

[Letter to the Editor]

[Excerpt] Following publication of report by Philippe Decraene, "Djibouti, Birth of a Nation" (LE MONDE, 4, 5 July), the members of Defense Counsel for the Djibouti political prisoners, Messrs Comte, Fagart, Laval, Natali and Ziwie, brought to our attention a letter from which the following passages are excerpted: Although "the Territory is absolutely calm for a year," the consequences of a past and more troubled year -- hopefully behind us -- are still manifest: some forty individuals are still in confinement today, accused of "criminal attempts" for which they are awaiting court decision.

Judgment, if it ever takes place, will probably be handed down without benefit of defense, since we are "forbidden to enter plea" on the Territory, by reason of a presidential decision of 22 October 1979, the accused having mistakenly placed their confidence in us. Your correspondent's article written in the hope of bringing it forcefully to the attention of the President of the Republic in order that he may reverse himself on a position that defies the rights of the defense, [words missing] that there are in fact only two lawyers now practicing within the territory.

Let us hope that the spirit of justice will win the day in this country whose highest magistrate prides himself on being different from the other African nations.

COPWE SEMINAR HELD AT GROUND FORCE HEADQUARTERS

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 19 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] Addis Ababa (ENA)--A three-day seminar on COPWE and its mandate got underway here yesterday for men-in-uniform and civil servants within the headquarters of the Ground Force here.

Comrade Brig. General Kefalegn Yibza, Commander of the Ground Force and COPWE Central Committee member, said at the opening of the seminar that through the wise and far-sighted leadership of Comrade Chairman Mengistu Haile-Mariam, the Ethiopian Revolution has reached its present reliable stage.

Speaking earlier, Comrade Captain Gebre-Giorgis Berhanu, COPWE Central Committee alternate member and COPWE representative of the Political Department of the Ground Force said that the experiences to be drawn during the seminar would enable the participants live up to more challenging endeavours in their revolutionary commitment.

The seminar participants will be briefed on the process and progress of the Ethiopian Revolution, party, government and mass organizations, the historic First COPWE Congress and its outcome, the aim and structure of COPWE and the role of the main political Department of the Revolutionary Army of Revolutionary Ethiopia.

Meanwhile a day-long seminar was Sunday organized for employees of the various corporations under the Ministry of Domestic Trade.

Opening the seminar, Comrade Dr. Ashagre Yigletu, Minister of Domestic Trade and COPWE Central Committee member, underscored the role of the Ministry's employees in providing the consumer public with essential commodities and in the efforts made to promote trade services with the joint cooperation of government and mass organizations.

A joint declaration issued at the end of the seminar pledged the more than 1,700 participants to undertake all sacrifice to help enable COPWE attain its historic mission. The seminar participants also expressed firm and resolute support to Comrade Chairman Mengistu's leadership of the Commission. A call was also made in the declaration for the wider printing and circulation of SERTO ADER, the organ of the Central Committee of COPWE.

In another development the seminar for supervisors and technicians from educational upgrading centres in the 14 regions, the Assab administratiion and Addis Ababa has wound up.

The participants deliberated on the implementation of the aims and tasks of educational centres and exchanged ideas and experiences on how to resolve mutual problems.

In the platform they adopted at the end of the ten-day seminar, the participants pledged to pay every sacrifice to help enable COPWE achieve its mission while reaffirming their wholehearted support for Comrade Chairman Mengistu's leadership of the Commission.

They also vowed to do everything in their power to contribute towards the success of the on-going Literacy Campaign.

Speading at the closing of the seminar, Comrade Kebede Tiku, head of the Curriculum Supervision, urged the participants to genuinely serve the broad masses with the knowledge they acquired during the seminar.

STATISTICS PROVIDED ON ADDIS TIRE FACTORY

Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 19 Aug 80 p 3

[Excerpts] The Addis Tyre Factory is one of those establishments that have registered commendable gains over the past six years. When the factory commenced operation in 1972 its daily production capacity was 200 tyres, but in the course of time, most particularly since the popular revolution, the production capacity has been raised and today the factory could produce 300-400 tyres a day.

In an exclusive interview with THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD here Saturday Comrade Getachew Bitew, Chairman of the Production Committee of the Factory, said that the remarkable progress in production could well be attributed to, mainly, the introduction of shift system coupled with the enthusiasm and zeal displayed by the workers towards their work. The production committee, according to Comrade Getachew, was set up in 1979 and was restructured in April 1980. The committee, he said, consists of system control, production process control, technical and administrative sub-committees.

Improve Quality

The factory, he said, produces tyres and inner tubes. In 1973 some 29,755 tubes and 31,098 tyres were produced. The total sales income during the period under review was, 1,783,528 Birr, it was learnt. In line with the on-going National Revolutionary Development Programme, during the first phase campaign about 92,832 tyres and 84,222 tubes were produced and the total sales income was 26 million Birr. This is the highest production output registered in the history of the Addis Tyre Factory. According to Comrade Getachew, the increase in production output was made possible as a result of the active participation of the workers.

Comrade Getachew said that despite the constraints which stemmed from technical faults in the period 1979-80, the total production during the period has shown an increase of some 5,000 tyres over the set target. The factory produces tyres and inner tubes in accordance with the demand for tyres for tractors and heavy trucks whenever the demand rises the supply or the production of such materials will also be increased. All in all, the chairman of the production committee said that the total production in 1979 had increased by 67 per cent over that in 1973. The factory is presently producing tyres with 42 patterns for automobiles, heavy and medium-size trucks, it was learnt. Efforts are being made in collaboration with experts to improve the quality of tyres and inner tubes. Comrade Getachew noted.

At present, there are 651 workers in the factory. Of these 48 are women.

STATISTICS FOR HIDES--Addis Ababa (ENA)--The Ethiopian Abattoir Corporation this year processed 294,920 hides and skins for export and for domestic sales, Comrade Teklu Wolde-Giorgis the General Manager disclosed. Comrade Teklu noted that the Corporation has established a new hides and skins processing factory on the southern outskirts of the capital on the Debre-Zeit road. The Corporation's production in 1978 compared with those of the last two years shows an increase of 77,769 pieces, Comrade Teklu further indicated. The General Manager also reported that the Abattoir Corporation slaughtered 283,594 cattle during the last Ethiopian calendar year. He said that because of the strict quarantine applied by the Corporation administration, 95 per cent of the livestock slaughtered is free of all disease. There is a plan to build a new abattoir at a cost of 50 million Birr in effort to expand and modernize the Corporation's services, Comrade Teklu disclosed. Over 1,129,511 kgs of meat by-products were exported this year, exceeding last-year's export by 9.7 per cent, the General Manager said. SAVINGS, CREDIT CO-OPS--Addis Ababa (EH)--The Savings and Credit Co-operatives Development Office, which is under the National Bank of Ethiopia, has facilitated the establishment of 160 savings and credit co-operatives over the past ten months. The Co-operatives Development Office was endorsed with the task of helping establish 150 co-operatives through 20 organisers during 1972 E.C. Nonetheless, with only 6 organisers the office has managed to successfully facilitate the establishment of 160 savings and credit co-operatives, thereby fulfilling its target by 120 per cent. This was disclosed to THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD here yesterday by Comrade Asmamaw Enquobahrie, Officer-in-Charge of the Savings and Credit Co-operatives Development Office. The 160 savings and credit co-operatives have 20,000 members. 800,000 Birr was raised through the contribution of members, 300,000 Birr in reserve account and close to 4 million Birr collected from the savings of members. Comrade Asmamaw asserted. [Excerpt] [Addis Ababa THE ETHIOPIAN HERALD in English 20 Aug 80 pp 1, 5]

CUBAN ROAD EQUIPMENT DONATION--Assab (ENA)--The Government of the Republic of Cuba Thursday donated various road building machinery worth 10 million Birr at a ceremony held at the Assab office of the Ethiopian Roads Authority (ERA). The donation was made by Comrade Raul Curbelo, member of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, to Comrade Addis Tedla, member of the PMAC Standing Committee, Vice-chairman of the National Revolutionary Development Campaign and Central Planning Supreme Council (NRDC-CPSC) and member of COPWE Executive Committee. It was learnt that the equipment and building machinery would be used for the construcion of two feeder roads in the coffee producing regions of Kaffa and Illubabor. The machinery donated to ERA by the Cuban Government includes dozers, graders, loaders, water and fuel tankers, mobile garages, service cars, carrier truck with trailer, tractor and others. FRENCH COOPERATION VIEWED--The French Co-operation Minister M. Robert Galley has left for Paris after three days of what he called "frank talks" with Mali leaders on their country's acute economic difficulties. M. Galley, who met President Traore twice while in Mali, blamed Mali's problems on increasing world oil prices, international inflation and a drop in Malian exports, especially of groundnuts. The Minister, who oversees aid to France's former colonies, noted that Mali's oil-import bill had been climbing by 10,000 million Mali francs (about $23m.) a year. He also said that Mali needed to find new products for export that would allow it to regain its former level of trade revenue. Mr Galley praised the "excellent development" of cotton production in Mali, but he noted that cotton prices had not kept pace with inflation, and that as a result, Mali was having balance-of-payments trouble. The aid minister said that the two nations would, through consultation in the coming weeks, try to "determine what part France can play in Mali's economic and financial construction." COMMENTARY ON RENEWED U.S. INTEREST IN AFRICAN AFFAIRS

[Editorial: "Washington's African Policy"]

[Text] In the course of one of his speeches, James Carter, President of the United States, stressed that "today the United States is more deeply interested in African affairs than at any other time in its history." The statement is all the more significant in that until quite recently Washington considered its "interests" on the African continent to be "important but not vital."

Several factors explain the attention which the United States is showing in Africa, where serious political and military conflicts have occurred (to note only the intervention, organized by the United States, in Zaire). On one hand, there are the political, economic and strategic interests of the Americans; on the other hand, there are the particularly dynamic political processes which, according to former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger, are developing "rapidly," making Africa one of the crucial problems of our time.

It is general knowledge that throughout the postwar period, U.S. African policy considered the European NATO allies, the former colonial powers, as the mainstay of the Western political positions on this continent.

In the mid-1970's, however, this policy began to be inconsistent with reality.

The fall of the Portuguese colonial empire and the subsequent emergence of young independent states, as well as the intensification of the struggles for national liberation in Zimbabwe, Namibia and South Africa, contributed to the deterioration of the pro-Western "status quo" in Africa; finally, the increasingly important role played by the African countries in the international arena forced the United States to revise its policy.

According to Washington's "new African policy," announced by Henry Kissinger in April 1976, the basic tasks are to keep Africa within the capitalist sphere, insofar as possible, and to divide the national liberation movements, isolating them from the socialist countries and the world's progressive forces.

Economic interests constitute one of the bases for the increasing U.S. activity on the African continent. Quantitatively, Africa's share is still quite modest, representing about 3 percent of American direct private investments worldwide, and a little over 9 percent of U.S. trade overall. It is noted, however, that in the course of these last years, these quantitative indices have tended to rise (in 1973, for example, Africa's share of American business was 2.5 percent for imports and less than 1 percent for exports). The African countries are of increasing interest to the United States as potential markets for American-made articles.

In the 15 years from 1962 through 1976, the overall volume of trade with Washington increased almost 12-fold, while American investments south of the Sahara rose by about 600 percent.

Africa is already America's major supplier for a group of scarce raw materials. Among other products, the United States imports 100 percent of its diamonds, 53 percent of its uranium, 51 percent of its vanadium, 48 percent of its cobalt 47 percent of its chromium, 39 percent of its platinum and 38 percent of its petroleum from African countries.

NUCLEAR MISSILES CAUSING DISCORD IN NATO

[Editorial: "Ill Winds Blowing in NATO"]

[Text] An ill wind is blowing in NATO, stirring up discord in some of its member nations, and it will certainly come up in at least one other country. On the other side of the Atlantic, a president with limited diplomatic ability is writing messages "warning" the allies about the need to close ranks. The key question now preoccupying the NATO member states is the installation of a new generation of nuclear missiles; even before their actual placement on European territory, they have created a dangerous reversal in East-West relations.

The FRG magazine STERN printed the text of a letter from the President of the United States to Chancellor Helmut Schmidt "warning" him against any action or decision that might jeopardize the placement of the new Pershing-2 and cruise missiles in Europe. Despite Bonn's formal denials regarding the allegedly "harsh" tone of the message, the letter certainly reveals that the Germans, seared by two devastating wars in this century, must have begun to think very seriously about the risk they run if they decide to sit down on such a powder keg. This is precisely the position of the English, who are seriously divided regarding this issue. The left wing of the Labor Party vigorously contests the installation of the new-generation missiles on English territory. The British have been assigned 160 cruise missiles. In addition, Ms Thatcher is seeking to modernize the British deterrent force, replacing the old Polaris missiles with new Trident intercontinental ballistic missiles.

Now the British Government will have to decide where the 160 U.S. missiles should be placed. The first to submit to Washington's dictates, the Conservative Government in London would also like to be the first to select the sites for the new weapons, but position statements of the Labor opposition appear to contradict these wishes. Three sites are being considered: the base at Lakenheath, in Suffolk (where the U.S. Air Force already has F-11 and A-10 bombers), Greenham Common (some 100 km from London) or Oxfordshire (80 km from the capital). In view of the broad anti-missile movement in Great Britain, it is probable that this decision, contested in Parliament, will become the target of lively popular opposition, specifically by residents of the chosen areas.

The United States and NATO could also encounter opposition in Belgium, another country "chosen" to receive the new missiles. Incidentally, Joseph Luns, secretary general of NATO, has now "warned" the Belgian Government that the latter is not meeting its commitments to the organization, since the proposed budget cut of 1.7 billion francs implies among other things, that combat planes, ships, tanks and artillery will be taken out of action, that the number of air force pilots will be reduced and that Belgian forces will not take part in NATO maneuvers.

The Western European countries have increasingly well-founded reasons to withdraw from the NATO race to the abyss. The fact is that, three times between November 1979 and now, Pentagon computers have already "mistakenly" initiated a nuclear alert, activating several U.S. devices, ready to respond to a false Soviet nuclear attack.

FRELIMO MESSAGE TO SANDINIST CENTRAL COMMITTEE

[Text] The Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party, which began its seventh session the day before yesterday in Maputo, has sent a message of congratulations to the Central Committee of the Sandinist Front for the National Liberation of Nicaragua [FSLN], marking the first anniversary of the overthrow of the Somoza regime.

The message, the full text of which appears below, stresses the importance of the Nicaraguan revolution in its Latin American and international contexts and the role of the FSLN in the success of that revolution.

"The Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party warmly congratulates the Sandinist National Liberation Front and the heroic people of Nicaragua on the occasion of the first anniversary of the overthrow of the bloody Somoza dictatorship.

"The date 19 July symbolizes the victory of the Nicaraguan revolution, the fruit of the prolonged and courageous resistance of the Nicaraguan people against the adventurist and renegade nationals, faithful lackeys of the imperialist interests in the country.

"The victory over the Somoza regime demonstrates once again that when a united and organized people takes up arms under the proper leadership of its vanguard, it is invincible.

"Hence, 19 July is also a demonstration of the justice of the revolutionary line of the FSLN and of the clarity of its political leadership.

"Heir to the heroic traditions and teachings of August Cesar Sandino, immortal soldier, patriot and anti-imperialist, the FSNL knew how to organize the struggle of the Nicaraguan people and lead them to victory.

"Today, Nicaragua constitutes a secure rearguard of world revolution, in the struggle against the exploitation of men by men and in the stubborn defense of the dignity and independence of the oppressed peoples of Latin America and the entire world.

"For this reason, the imperialists and their local lackeys have launched a series of threats and provocations to destabilize the political situation in Nicaragua and to sabotage the victories already achieved. Nonetheless, we are sure that under the enlightened leadership of the Sandinist Front, the Nicaraguan people will know how to counteract all the imperialist machinations.

"The Central Committee of the FRELIMO Party expresses its wishes for deeper and firmer relations of friendship and solidarity between the FRELIMO Party and the FSLN, between the Mozambican people and the people of Nicaragua, for the victory of socialism."

DIFFICULTIES IN AGRICULTURAL MARKETING CAMPAIGN

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 29 Jul 80 pp 3, 8

[Excerpts] The delayed arrival of sacking in which to pack farm produce and the lack of trucks to distribute the latter to the various districts of Manica Province were among the problems that have held back the agricultural campaign to market surplus production in this large province.

The above-mentioned problems prevented the agricultural marketing campaign in the province from beginning on 2 May, as scheduled.

The information came from Jose Alexandre Canhore, director of the Provincial Office of Agricultural Marketing, during an interview granted to NOTICIAS.

The sacks were not only late in arriving; there were not enough of them. Of the 185,000 ordered, only 87,000 were received, and they were used up immediately. Since the shipment did not arrive until mid-May, it will not be possible to conclude the campaign on schedule.

The delay is also linked to the shortage of scales. The old scales distributed by the Provincial Agricultural Marketing Office last year were found to be damaged, and the 15 scales sent to complement the few functioning scales arrived late.

Meanwhile, the problem of the sacking is being overcome with the arrival of another shipment which is being unloaded at the Northern Mozambique Railways station in Lichinga.

Campaign Initiated

Despite the delayed shipment of sacks, private merchants in the southern zone, Cuamba and Macanhelas have already begun to market corn, while the districts in the northern zone, namely Lichinga, Sanga and Lago, have begun buying beans.

Of the four prefabricated warehouses allotted to the province, two have already been installed in Mecanhelas and Marrupa Districts, and the other two will be installed in Majune and Mandimbe.

Prospects

Since the provincial warehouse of REPECA now functioning does not have sufficient storage capacity to overcome the problems with the preservation of the produce, a warehouse capable of holding 4,000 tons of produce is already under construction next to the Northern Mozambique Railways station in Lichinga.

Some 12 million meticals have been allocated to expedite construction of this warehouse, which should be completed by the end of this year.

BRITISH OFFICIAL'S VISIT--Derek Day, under secretary of foreign relations for the Commonwealth, left Mozambique yesterday after a 2-day visit to our country. Representing the Foreign Affairs Ministry of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, Day held discussions with Mozambican leaders regarding the situation in southern Africa and the status of relations between Mozambique and Great Britain. In statements to the Mozambican press, the under secretary said that during his 2 days here he had had an opportunity to meet with Joaquim Chissano, Mozambique's minister of foreign relations, with whom he discussed the current situation on the southern subcontinent. He emphasized Mozambique's role in the unfolding of events in the region, particularly in Zimbabwe. Day also called the current status of relations between Mozambique and Great Britain "satisfactory," and said that during the exchange of views, possible new areas of cooperation between the two states, as well as ways to strengthen existing cooperation were discussed. EVALUATION OF DMZ PROPOSALS

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 04 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] The idea of a demilitarised zone on the border between SWA and Angola has given rise to a good many problems, both political and military, but the chances of a settlement in SWA would clearly improve should Angola succeed in pressurising Swapo into acceptance of a DMZ.

This is the view expressed by Dr Mike Hough, Director of the Institute for Strategic Studies at the University of Pretoria in an article titled "DMZ proposals for SWA/Namibia" published by the magazine "African Insight," and of which an adapted version is repeated here.

The possibility of a DMZ along the SWA-Angolan border was initially raised by the late President Agostinho Neto of Angola, shortly before his death in July 1979.

His proposals followed the rejection by SA of the UN ceasefire plan in February 1979.

The first problem to be coped with in the possible implementation of a DMZ is the presence of Unita forces in southern Angola. Unita has indicated that it will not permit the establishment of a DMZ in southern Angola unless it is included at the highest level of consultation and it is now clear that a DMZ could not be established without Unita's co-operation.

The proposed DMZ covers a large area of territory which is not easy to monitor especially with limited personnel. It is an inhabited area where the identification of infiltrators would be a problem and retaliation against Swapo would be more difficult than in the past.

The main problem remains Swapo's unwillingness to accept a DMZ which does not favour it.

The proposed DMZ would consist of a zone 50 km wide on either side of the Angolan SWA border and cover a total area of some 140,000 square kilometers.

It would also include parts of south western Zambia and the entire Caprivi strip.

The suggestion is that the DMZ should become operative 14 days after the signing of a ceasefire agreement between Swapo and SA. Under the specifications for a DMZ, Swapo guerrillas would have two alternatives after the signing of a ceasefire: to lay down their arms under UN supervision and take part in an election, or to be removed by UNTAG to bases in Angola and Zambia, outside the DMZ.

The SA forces would provisionally be limited to five "selected areas" in SWA. The areas which have been suggested are Rundu, Katima Mulilo, Mpacha, Omega and Oshakati. Mr Sam Nujoma, President of Swapo, later mentioned a sixth base at Ruacana.

These areas and an adjacent area up to 5 KM wide would be exempted from demilitarisation. Similarly Sesheke in Zambia and Calais, Calucque and N'gira in Angola would be exempted, but these bases would be used by Angolan and Zambian military units only and are not to be used by Swapo.

The DMZ in Angola and Zambia would be monitored by the Angolan and Zambian Governments in co-operation with UNTAG and in SWA the DMZ would be monitored by units of the SA police in co-operation with UNTAG.

Within 12 weeks the SA troops would be reduced to 1 500 and limited to two bases at Grootfontein and Oshivello. However, no provision has been made for the monitoring of Swapo bases in Angola and Zambia outside the DMZ by UNTAG.

A task force of the UN was unable to enforce a DMZ between Saudi Arabia and Yemen in 1963 and also between North and South Vietnam after the French withdrawal from Indo China.

With regard to the situation in SWA, the question arises whether UNTAG would be able to enforce a DMZ and also whether the parties concerned would respect the agreement.

COUNCIL MEMBER: NAMIBIA HAS BLACK MAJORITY GOVERNMENT

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] WINDHOEK: Swapo purported to fight for majority rule in SWA but the Territory already had a Black majority government, Mr P Limbo, a member of the Ministers' Council said here yesterday.

Speaking during the national service debate in the National Assembly, Mr Limbo said this was clear from the composition of the Assembly. There were 50 members of whom only nine were Whites, he said.

"It seems to me that Swapo is fighting a losing battle, Mr Limbo added.

The MPLA Government in Angola claimed to have liberated the country, but all the top posts were in the hands of Cubans and Soviets in that country.

The Angolan Government had to submit to the will of these foreign communists and Cuba, which was a small island, used Angola to deposit its superfluous population.

"Is this liberation?" he asked.

Many Southwesters were being killed because of fighting in Swapo camps after the ousting of Mr Mishake Muyongo, the Swapo vice-president.

He asked what the international community was doing about the situation among opposing Swapo factions in Zambia.

He said the international community had not moved a finger to condemn the killing and detention of Southwest nationals in Zambia.

He appealed to the Secretary General of the UN, Dr Kurt Waldheim, to publicly condemn the killings in Zambia.

Some politicians in Africa claimed they wanted to liberate the Blacks from the Whites.

"But all they do is replace the Whites with other Whites who are communists," Mr Limbo said.

"The fruits of our country are there for all its people – its problems and defence as well," he said. He, therefore, fully supported national service for all races.

Also, taking part in the debate, a member of the Ministers' Council, Dr Ben Africa, said everything was not yet perfect in SWA but the Territory was quickly becoming a model state in Africa.

VILJOEN LEAVES WINDHOEK FOR TALKS IN PRETORIA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 8 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The AG, Dr Gerrit Viljoen left Windhoek for Pretoria yesterday presumably for talks with the SA Government and the Dept of Foreign Affairs regarding the SA reply to the latest letter from Dr Kurt Waldheim on the SWA settlement negotiations.

A spokesman for the AG's office confirmed last night that Dr Viljoen had left for Pretoria but could not disclose any further information about the visit. Dr Viljoen is expected back in Windhoek at the weekend.

August 15 was the expiry date set by the UN for SA to reply to the Secretary General's letter on the latest settlement proposals. The main issue in Dr Waldheim's letter, release in New York on June 24, [as published] was that SA would be allowed only 20 bases on the SWA side of the demilitarised zone during the first 12 weeks of a ceasefire. At the same time SWAPO would only be allowed bases in Angola and Zambia. That was seen as a major breakthrough, for SWAPO remained adamant in the past about having bases in SWA.

Dr Waldheim's letter also stated that he regarded it as imperative that all parties concerned will be treated on an equal footing, although Resolution 435 made provision to deal only with the parties envisaged in the settlement proposal, viz SWAPO and SA.

Diplomatic sources abroad have indicated that there would be strong pressure from the Security Council should SA's reply look like a stalling tactic. It is generally expected that the Security Council would convene within a week if SA does not come up with a satisfactory reply and mention was even made of sanctions.

The Advertiser was told by an informed source that the feeling at the UN was that SA was not serious in its attempts to try and reach a settlement in SWA.

The recent announcement by the AG regarding an independent police force for SWA, the Advertiser was told that this was viewed in a very serious light and should the establishment of a SWA police force change the structure of the political settlement "the deal was off."

Resolution 435 made provision for the SA Police Force to remain in control of law and order in the Territory during an election and transition period and the establishment of an independent SWA police force could very well be regarded by some parties as a deviation of Resolution 435.

VILJOEN HINTS AT AFRICA SOLUTION FOR SWA

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 23 Aug 80 p 1

[Text]

DURBAN — If sufficient progress were not made towards a South African / UN settlement in South West Africa, the solution to the conflict situation there might lie in discussion between this country and other African states without the UN, Dr Gerrit Viljoen, Administrator-General of SWA/Namibia, said in Durban last night.

Dr Viljoen spoke at the inaugural dinner of Africa 2000, an organisation based in Durban, "with no political ties or aspirations which aims for a peaceful and prosperous Africa by the year 2000."

He said the answer to the SWA/Namibia question might be in negotiations with those African states "with the most direct interest in a resolution of the conflict situation."

Dr Viljoen added: "I am sure there would be a bigger chance of success in working out our differences if not with the UN, with fellow Africans who, like we, have a direct stake in settlement."

He appealed to Africa 2000 to support the territory in establishing schooling facilities, not only for children but to increase adult literacy for medical and nursing facilities and to help with community development and expansion in small industry.

However, he said, the country was not totally dependent on South Africa and of its annual budget, R520-million was generated by internal revenue with only R40-million coming from South Africa.

CORRESPONDENT SUMMARIZES IMPRESSIONS OF ARMED STRUGGLE

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 23 Aug 80 p 25

[Text] Military correspondents and their readers have become so used to what is said at regular army briefings and in Defence press releases, that in many instances they have become indifferent and, to an extent, even oblivious to the grim realities in South West Africa's war zone.

Earlier in the week Barry Streek of the Daily Dispatch, one of the newspapers associated with the Mail Africa Bureau and with which, in turn the Windhoek Observer has a news pool association, returned from the north.

Barry Streek said that for one who last visited the Ovambo-speaking areas of South West Africa five years ago, the transformation of the situation was shattering. "Indeed frightening", he said.

According to Streek, the conflict in the northern areas of South West Africa has escalated into real war, with all its ghastly human toll.

HAS INTENSIFIED

Streek said that after his visit, he could arrive at no other conclusion than that the military situation has intensified, with more casualties on both sides, with more what are officially described as "incidents" and all the grim realities of armed conflict. The seasoned journalist observes that a regular publication of army releases on deaths and incidents in the war zone, and the details of raids on SWAPO bases in Angola, tend to blur the true nature of the war. He says that this is particularly the case for people like those in South Africa who are remote from the battle zone.

In a dispatch, Streek writes that while the possibilities of a political settlement of the conflict drag on in an apparently hopeless mire of negotiations, international manoeuvering and diplomatic leaks, the security situation in the area has deteriorated markedly.

In 1979, he writes in his dispatch, the number of incidents involving insurgents increased by 100 per cent over the previous year, according to General Jannie Geldenhuys, and landmine incidents increased by 105 per cent.

This year, he says in his dispatch, there were already 600 incidents, which again shows that the situation has intensified once again. Streek took note of the curfews at night, the guarded convoys, security controls and real fears of landmines.

CONFIDENT THAT THE SITUATION CAN BE CONTAINED

He correctly sums up the situation of armed struggle in which there was no declaration and nor was its scope conventional, but it is war. While the intensification and military confrontation is obvious and openly admitted, and while the trend seems likely to continue, the army is confident of containing the situation. Streek also correctly makes the point that, based on the figures of the numbers of guerrillas killed or captured, it is difficult to see how SWAPO will be able to significantly extend its field of operations in the foreseeable future.

General Geldenhuys estimated publicly earlier this year that there were 8 000 to 10 000 SWAPO members under training, but a figure of 15 000 has been speculated. Whatever the actual number, the focus of the war at this stage at least, seems to be confined to the northern areas.

THOSE RAMBLING POLITICIANS

Streek also questions the vagueness of some military communiques which in itself is functioning to convey a degree of insecurity. He writes that even if the army is able to contain the situation in the northern areas, it will not be able to do more than that, because the removal of the basic causes of the conflict is not in their hands. While the politicians in Windhoek continue to prolong their negotiations, and while they dilly-dally in thir efforts to gain petty advantages, the war continues, taking its terrible toll. Young men, 20 per cent of them Black, will continue to spend at least two years of their lives in the dust and sand trying to contain the situation. Other young men, all of them Black, convinced that violence is the only way to produce change, will try to make the job of the 20 per cent Blacks as difficult as possible. In particular, Streek goes on, they will make those Black people, who associate with the system of control, the targets of attack.

The horror stories, of which there are many, can be continued, but where is it all heading?

INTERNATIONAL SETTLEMENT THE ANSWER

It seems clear that unless there is an international settlement which is accepted by SWAPO, the South African government and the DTA, the war is going to continue. Hit-and-run attacks in other areas are also likely to continue sporadically.

If that is the case, Streek writes, and if the plan for national military service is implemented so that everyone will be liable for call-up, it seems inevitable that the war will intensify, because every male will be forced to make a decision of actively siding with one or the other group. According to some of Streek's sources, many will leave the country as a result.

Clearly in these circumstances, he writes, any decision to maintain the status quo is hardly a desirable option. According to him, the only realistic way war can be ended is for South Africa and SWAPO to reach an accord, in terms of which an acceptable formula for elections can be found.

THE REAL RIDDLE

He writes that the danger for both sides - that being South Africa and the DTA - and possibly the main reason for the extensive procrastination in the negotiations, is that they will lose. But if SWAPO is in fact the majority party, this is surely a reality that has to be accepted -- and a reality that is preferable to the extension of a debilitating war. If SWAPO is not the majority party, then it is difficult to understand why there should be any fears in Pretoria about an election.

According to Mr Dirk Mudge, Streek writes, one can't have peace and elections with thousands of armed men around. He was referring to SWAPO, but his statement applies equally in regard to the presence of South African troops.

MINISTERS' COUNCIL CALLS FOR END TO BLOODSHED IN SWAPO CAMPS

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 8 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

WINDHOEK: The SWA/-Namibian Ministers' Council yesterday urgently requested the UN and other international organisations to stop the bloodshed in Swapo camps in Zambia as a result of the split in the organisation's leadership.

In a statement issued in Windhoek, the Council reiterated its invitation to the ousted vice-president of Swapo, Mr Mishake Muyongo, and his followers to return in peace to SWA/-Namibia.

"We wish to point out that the amnesty offer still stands," the statement said. "They are invited to return in peace to their fatherland and help with important internal development (opbouwerk).

"We appeal urgently to the United Nations and other international organisations to take cognisance of the plight of these people," it said.

"These organisations are requested to take urgent steps to prevent the bloodshed in Zambia by Swapo of SWA/Namibian nationals," the Council said.

The statement by the multiracial Council said it was extremely concerned about the fate of SWA/Namibian nationals who were apparently being subjected to large-scale anarchy within Swapo after Mr Muyongo and other leaders had been ousted.

The Council said it had confirmed reports that fighting had broken out between the Kwanyama tribe (of which the Swapo president, Mr Sam Nujoma, is a member) and the Caprivian Subiya tribe within Swapo.

It was evident that tribal differences within Swapo were out of control.

The statement said the Ministers' Council had information that the situation within Swapo might further deteriorate in due course.

"People who are still holding important positions within Swapo organising a rebellion against the leadership of Sam Nujoma," the Council said.

"Our information is that at least 50 Swapo terrorists have deserted from Swapo camps in the past few days.

"According to information from Botswana the Swapo deserters are being held against their will in Zambia, but we do not know what their fate is," the statement said.

The ministers said Mr Muyongo was reportedly making secret plans to return to SWA/Namibia.

If he and his followers returned to the Territory they would find the situation "free of the kind of racism" prevalent in Swapo.

They said it was significant that these developments with Swapo were taking place while Mr Nujoma was in Moscow.

It was not clear, they said, if Mr Nujoma had gone to "fetch new instructions in Moscow" or to replenish arms and ammunition recently destroyed in Angola by the security forces. — Sapa

SWAPO WILL PARTICIPATE IN MEETING

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 23 Aug 80 p 10

[Text]

PARIS: An international conference, at which SWAPO will be the main participant, will meet here from September 11 to September 13. It is being convened with a view to mobilise international support all around the world for the movement.

Virtually the entire SWAPO Central Committee, led by the movement's President, Mr Sam Nujoma, will attend the conference. The theme of the congress is to enlist increased support, and an agenda has been drawn up. The conference is to precede the 35th General Assembly meeting of the United Nations. Various internationally known personalities will attend the conference such as the former prime minister of Sweden and the leader of the Swedish Socialist Party.

The conference will take place in the UNESCO headquarters in this city.

There will be many delegates from Africa, Asia, Europe and the Americas. Also in attendance will be delegates of Nationalist and Liberation movements and Trade Unions.

One of the more colourful personalities to attend will be the aged Mr Sean Bride, former Commissioner of the United Nations for South West Africa, who was later succeeded by Mr Martti Ahtisaari. A large number of Foreign Affairs Ministers of various countries will also be in attendance.

K3 MILLION ALLEGEDLY SPENT DAILY TO FIGHT SWAPO

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 28 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] SOUTH Africa is now pumping more than K3 million into Namibia's defence system every day to contain the advancing people's liberation army of SWAPO.

SWAPO treasurer-general and chief spokesman in Zambia, Mr Lucas Pohamba, said this at the 14th anniversary of the armed struggle in Namibia held at the Evelyn Hone College in Lusaka on Tuesday.

He said freedom fighters were now tying down the 70,000 South African troops in the disputed territory.

Mr Pohamba told more than 1,000 people including chairman of the Social and Cultural Sub-Committee of the Central Committee, Mr Elijah Mudenda, and representatives of ANC of South Africa that this was because of the ability of SWAPO to deepen and broaden its struggle in Namibia.

The plan involved guerrilla advancement into suburbs of Tsumeb, Groodfontein, Otavi and Otjwarongo in central Namibia. It forced many white farmers to live in hotels in towns.

The farmers left management of the farms to less experienced African workers.

Mr Pohamba said it was because of the guerrilla successes that the South African backed legislative assembly in Windhoek had recently proposed the creation of "protected villages" in Namibia.

Such villages were tried in Vietnam and Zimbabwe but this did not help imperialists and their lackeys from ultimate defeat. "In Namibia too, the story will be the same," he added.

Aware

Mr Pohamba said the South African regime was aware that its puppets in Namibia could not win under the UN-supervised and controlled elections as was the case in Zimbabwe.

"In order to run away from this inevitability, the racists are resisting the implementation of the UN plan which was worked out after three years of intensive negotiation," he said.

Because of this resistance SWAPO was confident of winning a people's war.

The heroic feats of the ANC of South Africa's guerrillas, especially that of the Sasol oil plant, were a source of encouragement to SWAPO, he said.

SWAPO owed President Kaunda, UNIP and its Government and the people of Zambia much for their selflessness and unrelenting support in SWAPO's just struggle for liberation.

And Mr Mudenda called for a speedy solution to the Southern African problems to avert possible racial and ideological conflicts in the region.

He said that ideological conflict would continue and would intensify in Zimbabwe and Zambia if a solution was not found quickly.

He reiterated Zambia's unflinching support and solidarity with SWAPO.

In Dar es Salaam, Organisation of African Unity liberation committee assistant secretary Laban Oyaka pledged Africa's support for the liberation struggle.

Mr Oyaka, speaking at a SWAPO rally, called for increased efforts to liberate the South African-administered territory.

The liberation of Africa was the responsibility of African countries, but Africa could not have arrived where it was without the help and support of friendly countries, he added.

In Cairo, representatives of international political organisations have commended Zambia's continued support for the liberation movements in Southern Africa.

Representatives of the Afro-Asian solidarity organisation, diplomatic corps, Egyptian government and SWAPO commended Zambia's commitment to the liberation movements at a similar ceremony.

Chief SWAPO representative in Cairo, Mr John Mandongo, said Zambia's stand on the liberation movements had remained unshaken despite indiscriminate killings of its people and the destruction of property by the racist regime.

In Johannesburg, commentators from both ends of South Africa's white political spectrum agreed that the latest cabinet reshuffle would mean greater personal rule by Prime Minister Pieter Botha in his search for change.

After Mr Botha named several moderates to his new cabinet, the normally pro-government newspaper the Citizen commented: "What happens now is very much what he wants it to be."

And the liberal anti-apartheid Rand Daily Mail said: "We are into an age of greatly increased direct rule by the Botha cabinet and its committees."

But Dr Nthato Motlama, chairman of the committee of unofficial but influential community leaders in Soweto said although the new cabinet showed a slight leftward move "it is meaningless in relation to what blacks received as meaningful change". — Times Reporter/Zana/Reuter.

BLACK NATIONALIST GROUPS MOVING CLOSER TO SWAPO

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 4 Aug 80 p 9

[Article by Max du Prez: "Patriotic Front Type Coalition Developing in Southwest Africa Politics"]

[Text] Windhoek--It appears that Southwest Africa is experiencing a serious polarization in black politics which in the foreseeable future can result into a sort of Patriotic Front coalition between the nationalist parties and SWAPO.

The Southwest Africa National Union (SWANU), one of the leading parties of the Namibia National Front (NNF) which refers to itself as the oldest liberation movement in Southwest Africa, is already moving in that direction at a fast pace to become (as DIE BURGER was told) the "Nkomo wing" of SWAPO. At least two other member parties of the NNF the National Independent Party (NOP) and the Damara Council are talking about the same possibility.

SWANU is now working hard to build a basis of conditions exactly for this purpose by forming its own terrorist force and by becoming almost more radical in its policy than SWAPO.

Recruits

According to security spokesmen, about 100 young SWANU recruits have already illegally crossed the border with Botswana and are waiting in a camp in Francistown to be taken to a country which is willing to train them as terrorists. SWANU's top leaders have negotiated with Libya and China on more than one occasion in this respect. (SWAPO is getting support from the USSR and East Germany).

A senior NNF leader from SWANU summed up the situation to DIE BURGER as follows: "Our position in the middle is now beginning to be an impossible one. If we go by the way Namibian politics are now developing there will simply not be a role for us to play.

"Since the Turnhalle-Council, the NNF and the other parties have been able to do absolutely nothing. The People of Namibia want to become free and independent and there are only two organizations which can accomplish this: SWAPO and the DTA [Democratic Turnhalle Alliance]. With today's frustrations and confused politics, there is room for only these two extremes.

Relevant

"As a politician and leader of my people I will have to decide for myself where I am going and if I am no longer a relevant figure in the center. Despite my objections to SWAPO I can tell you that I know that I will never go along with the DTA.

"The time to choose and to stand up to be counted is now here. It is of no use for us to run to the side of SWAPO if it is about to win, or has already won, the election. The only way we can play a role in SWAPO is to throw our strength there now."

Pressure Group

Not one of the nationalist leaders of the center with whom DIE BURGER spoke has any illusion about SWAPO's domination of the Ovambos and the low accent on democracy, although none of them believe that SWAPO is actually a communist organization.

"If I have to choose between Ovambo domination in SWAPO and white domination in the DTA, I will be choosing Ovambo domination. Of course, the ideal thing is that there not be any ethnic domination and that democracy be the highest principle. This is the reason why perhaps the time has come for us to become a pressure group within SWAPO." This is the statement made by another leader.

'Wooing'

The objections against the DTA are due mainly to the alliance's close ties with South Africa and its government, the DTA's inability to do much in its National Assembly and Ministerial Council to improve the lot of the common man, the DTA's impotence in getting rid of discrimination effectively and at all levels, the DTA's "wooing" of rightist whites, the "weak quality" of the DTA leaders and the DTA's "exaggerated" emphasis on ethnicity which requires that each of the 11 national groups should, for example, have a representative in the Ministerial Council regardless of the merits and abilities of the representative.

Another great objection against the DTA by the black nationalists is that the DTA "and South Africa are delaying the UN's settlement plan for an election and independence while the people are yearning for independence and the end of the war."

Robben Island

A strongly worded statement by the NNF to the effect that Security Council resolution 435 should be applied without any more fussing is expected this week.

In the course of a gathering of about 1,000 persons at Katatura this past week, SWANU gave further indications as to the direction it is taking. SWANU's chairman, Gerson Veii, who was imprisoned at Robben Island for about 2 years, demanded that the people of the Southwest must refuse to do military service such as Administrator General Gerrit Viljoen has proposed. Veii stated that the Southwesterners are now expected to fight against "their own brothers" (SWAPO's terrorists) while SWAPO's fighters have already shed much blood in the attempt to liberate the country.

PREVENTIVE MEASURES AGAINST SWAPO'S ATTACKS ON POWER STATION

Capetown DIE BURGER in Africaans 2 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] Pretoria--SWAPO will be getting its fingers burned if in the future it tries to sabotage the electrical power network of the highly important Ruacana power station.

Southwest Africa's security forces have thought of a way of protecting the network which has the potential of supplying power to most of the Southwest. After repeated sabotage of the network, the power station is now of very little value.

Not much is being said at this stage about what the countermeasures are going to be. Perhaps SWAPO will try once more and then it will find out that it has gotten hurt. This was the warning given by a senior officer in the Southwest.

The modern power station at the westernmost portion of the power line with Angola has the capability of providing 160 megawatts of power to Southwest Africa's WEK; However when the press visited the power station early this week it was producing only 1/20th of its capacity and to be sure only for the town of Ruacana.

For the past 2 years, Ruacana and its surroundings has been the part of Southwest Africa which has lived through the worst of SWAPO's attacks. The power line has been sabotaged repeatedly and the channel system which must provide water from Caluque to Ovambo is still dry.

The thing being considered in order to provide irrigation water to Ovambo is building an extra pipeline at the cost of 9 million rand at least to provide drinking water for the region.

Last year SWAPO was responsible for 40 attacks in the region and among other things this involved the laying of land mines, kidnapings, intimidation, murder, etc. So far this year there have been 40 instances of this nature.

Killed

These attacks reached a high point last Sunday morning with the mortar attack on the town of Ruacana where the military base is located. There was little damage to the buildings and at the base six servicemen were slightly wounded. One of the 40 or so mortar fired exploded in the bar of the base.

For this reason, this weeks' success by the security forces in killing 27 terrorists in pursuit actions is of special significance.

The security forces had information which indicated that the mortar attack on Ruacana had been planned in Angola even before last month's Operation Smokeshell and that SWAPO had supplied weapons to its terrorists for this purpose.

Attacking Ruacana was supposed to have helped to demonstrate that SWAPO is in condition to retaliate and this can mean much in rebuilding the morale of its soldiers just at a time when this was very necessary for them.

This is also supposed to show that SWAPO is able to reorganize its forces after Smokeshell, but this must have created the wrong picture of the real situation.

SWANU SEEKING LIBYAN AND CHINESE TERRORIST TRAINING

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 29 Jul 80 p 3

[Text] Windhoek--The Southwest Africa National Union (SWANU) has now started in earnest to smuggle terrorist recruits from Southwest Africa for training abroad. At least 85 young SWANU members have illegally crossed the border with Botswana during the past 4 months.

SWANU, one of the strong member parties of the Namibia National Front, has recently moved strongly to the left and its leaders have frequently spoken about an armed struggle as the only alternative for slow, dragging international settlement.

According to DIE BURGER's information, SWANU's leaders have recently been in contact with prominent Libyan and Chinese personalities and there is talk that they have even been in touch with Col Muhammar Ghadafi, Libya's leader.

The young SWANU recruits are now staying in Francistown. SWANU leaders under the leadership of their chief, Gerson Veii, are believed to be going to Gaberone soon to negotiate with Quett Masire's government about the recruits. According to available information, the Botswana government is not happy about its territory being used as a transit location for terrorists now that its problems with the Zimbabwan war are over. The SWANU delegation will also be going to other African nations to ask for help.

Two of the recruits in Francistown who are very well known here are Veii's son, Gerson Veii Jr, and Willie Kusch, a senior NNF youth leader. Kusch is supposedly the leader of the group of recruits.

Yesterday DIE BURGER learned that so far SWANU has not had much success in its efforts to get someone to train and support its military wing. Countries doing this sort of thing are already doing this for SWAPO. SWANU and SWAPO are not the greatest of friends, because SWANU is predominantly an Herero organization and SWAPO is a Wambo organization. However SWANU has had good ties with Red China all the time and the recent contact with the Libyans is not the first.

Comrade

SWANU's biggest problem is going to be the establishment of bases. Angola and Zambia are out of the question, because SWAPO is using these two countries as springboards. Botswana will not easily allow terrorist bases in its territory and moreover the terrain on the border between Botswana and the Southwest does not render this possible.

Yesterday an NNF youth leader, a certain Willibad Kandjinomuini, was given a 1,000-rand fine or a 1-year jail term by the magistrates court of Gobabis, because on the night of 10 July he helped 10 SWANU youth members cross the border illegally. His comrade, Albert Kanguatjivi, testified against him as a state witness saying that the 10 recruits were diverted to the vicinity of Buitepos in the area of Gobabis and from this place they crossed the border. Half of Kandjinomuini's sentence was suspended for 3 years.

APPRAISAL OF NEW ADMINISTRATOR GENERAL

[Editorial in column "Comment"]

[Text]

To many the appointment of Mr Danie Hough as the new AG would seem the appointment of an unknown.

That may be so locally, but Southwesters have no need to fear the man: he has all the attributes to fulfil the role aptly.

These are some of the attributes:

- He is an excellent administrator and is known to be a hard worker;
- He is an expert on local government and legal/-financial affairs. He has handled these matters with the utmost competence in the Transvaal;
- He is known to be an objective politician and is well-liked by both sides of the House in the Transvaal Provincial Council;
- He is extremely approachable as a person and never becomes hysterical in discussion or debate;
- He is well-educated (an attorney) and is a successful businessman and farmer;
- And he has for some time been earmarked for higher things. At one stage it was thought that he would take over as leader of the House in the Provincial Council from Mr Dawid van der Merwe Brink; at another stage it was thought that he would be the next Administrator of the Transvaal.

It now seems that he will probably follow Dr Gerrit Viljoen along the SWA road to the SA Cabinet.

It is indeed inconceivable that PM Piet Botha would ask Danie Hough to give up everything he has risen to in the Transvaal merely for the purpose of a short sojourn north of the Orange.

This newspaper wishes Mr Hough well in his new post and we hope that he will carry on the valuable work of his predecessors.

The challenge is a great one, perhaps one of the most intricate in international politics today, and will have a strong bearing on the stability of both SWA and Southern Africa at large.

Mr Hough will be taxed to the full.

NAMIBIA--THE LAST DOMINO

Johannesburg SUNDAY TIMES 17 Aug 80 p 15

[Text] "SWAPO I can live with. After all, the whites are living with that fellow in Rhodesia — Mugabe? One thing I'm not doing is going to Jo'burg."

PERCEPTIONS differ from country to country in Southern Africa.

The tough boutique manageress expressing her determination to stay in Namibia has her counterpart in Salisbury.

Majority rule isn't too bad close up. The relative success of the Mugabe government is already having an impact in Windhoek and the prospect of Sam Nujoma coming to power is now counted as a probability, not a possibility.

Up north where the army affably conducts visitors on sight-seeing trips the dry "culling" season as it is sometimes colloquially referred to (an expression borrowed from the Rhodesians), was in full swing.

Reeling off "kill-rate" statistics with the cold detachment of briefing officers the world over, an army spokesman described the recent destruction of the Swapo HQ in Angola.

A journalist friend who attended the operation told me privately that the Swapo dead, like the South African dead, were mere boys, 14 or 18 years old.

The problem is that kill-rates are deceptive. In the case of the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (Plan), the force level has remained static at about 7 000 for the last three years.

Swapo apparently makes up many of its losses from the half-million Cuanhama Owambo tribesmen who live on the Angolan side of the border. And while it can be argued that this shows Swapo has difficulty recruiting in Ovamboland it is still a virtually bottomless well of reservists.

While the kill-rate ratio is ostensibly in the security forces' favour it is not necessarily in the white man's favour. Unlike Rhodesia, most South African troopies killed in action are white.

There is an inevitable sense of withdrawal up there on that distant and hostile frontier. War is tough and tougher still if there is uncertainty about the cause.

Nobody talks of winning as such. The army's only official raison d'etre is to maintain sufficient stability in the border area to allow the politicians to do what they think is right.

A forgotten war to much of booming South Africa that costs millions a year, one wonders whether a Vietnam syndrome will one day begin to bite. Where are the welcoming flags for those "coming home"?

The towns on the border, with evocative-sounding names like Oshikati, Rundu, Katima Mulilo, have miniscule white populations. Virtually everybody works for the Government in some public service, police or army capacity.

Hamlets

Nothing more dramatically underscores the fact that South Africa is a foreign presence than a tour of these hamlets — some of which are logistically almost as far from Pretoria as Portugal's African colonies were from Lisbon.

If the "Boere" should pull out, every town along the northern Namibian border will virtually become black overnight, emphasising the illusory whiteness of the giant mineral-rich territory.

There are fewer than 100 000 white souls at present. Probably fewer than 60 000 would remain after independence.

While the politicians squabble among themselves in Windhoek, the army spends almost as much energy on a "hearts-and-minds" programme in the operational area as it does fighting.

This investment in education and agricultural training programmes is very real, and one wonders to what extent the prospect of "giving it all up" one day must influence the perceptions of the military.

The neatly tilled irrigation schemes, the schoolrooms, the black youth movement in the Kavango with its own flag, the wonderful Durrell-like zoo at Rundu — all are the creation of the army.

There is a feeling that people musn't be left in the lurch, that there must be progress, medical care and development: but sadly one suspects it will matter very little when the South Africans go.

Mother Africa will simply take over and obliterate the tracks of the soldier administrators as it has wiped out the presence of other foreign armies since time immemorial.

One place where it will matter though is Camp Omega, home of the much-publicised Bushman Battalion, the "Crows of the Caprivi".

Here the army has brought together several thousand Bushmen and their womenfolk, most originally refugees from Angola.

Their ancient bush craft is employed in the service of a modern war. But theirs is the cause of desperation — kill or be killed.

Little patriotism here, merely the stimulus of the refugee doing a job in return for food and pay.

Omega's objective is the "achievement" of Bushmen. They are taught Western ways for reasons of hygiene and community living.

Anticipating criticism, an officer says:

"No, we are not destroying the noble savage. The Bushmen were exterminated by disease. You haven't seen them when they come out of the bush."

Bloodied

And yet, when all is said and done, the Bushmen are being alienated from their nomadic ways, their tricks of bush survival.

What will happen to them when Pretoria goes? Whose is the responsibility for this unique little army?

Under a DTA government they would presumably be safe. But would Nujoma, if he should come to power — feed them, pay them? One doubts it somehow, and recognises a potential tragedy in the making.

But if people may be talking about a South African withdrawal elsewhere, there is no sign of it in the east. Digging in is the operative word.

Katimo Mulilo gives every impression of steadfast resolution, with bomb shelters in every backyard and a massive security fence under construction around the settlement.

A veritable Caprivi Mafeking that has already been bloodied by mortar fire.

Here, too, one gets a sense of the explosive international potential of this war, with Zambia just across the border.

Almost secondary to the war now, however, are Pretoria's increasingly urgent attempts to retain South African influence in the post-independence period.

Africans think South Africa fears an independent government in Windhoek more than a leftist one, and point to Samora Machel's and Mugabe's "pragmatism over ideology" approach. Both were leftist, but the Administrator-General, Dr Gerrit Viljoen, poo-poohs parallels with Zimbabwe.

And yet one wonders whether the simple truth of the Zimbabwean election isn't that the colonial presence and its proxies will be decisively rejected when the people are finally allowed a voice.

Jonathan Steele writes in The Guardian that the business community in Windhoek has come to terms with what it sees as historically inevitable.

Once again, it says, the Afrikaners are deluding themselves by confusing black nationalism with communism; by minimising legitimate grievances on the grounds that they are being exploited by extremists; and by exaggerating the relevance of ethnicity in the self-deluding hope that different groups of Africans would rather confront each other than collectively confront the white man.

And, epitomised by the seven black rearguard battalions, ethnicity is alive and well in Namibia.

These are professional soldiers, professionally paid. Conscription does not exist in Namibia. Nor does there seem to be any indigenous rush to volunteer for the security forces.

Defecting Swapo fighters are not exactly swelling security force ranks either. So the professionals salute the colours in defence of — what?

This question is the nub.

Andre du Pisani, of the University of South Africa, argues that the policy of Pretoria to allow for maximum internal institutional development during the transitional process in Namibia by means of the DTA-dominated National Assembly and the Council of Ministers does not resolve the deeper problem of dependence and erosion of legitimacy.

On the contrary, he says, it is seen by a growing number of Namibians as a means of consolidating the fragmentary DTA both in terms of its internal structure and the shrinking power base of the movement.

The shortcomings of the "incumbent political elite" enhance the alternative of a total revolutionary transformation and the DTA, moreover, lacks historical, ideological and charismatic sources of legitimacy.

The "fatal flaw" that Pretoria has made, however, is to define the terms of the conflict in ideological terms (democracy vs Marxism) which virtually ensures that the "moderates" are bound to be losers by definition unless they can deliver the economic and political goods the people want.

Du Pisani says a legitimate (Africanised) bureaucracy and a drastic alleviation of black unemployment (running at a rate of 25 per cent) are, therefore, immediate priorities.

But South Africa hasn't the time to tackle these priorities. International pressures for a settlement are mounting and valuable years have been wasted trying to patch up the differences between the whites, let alone the blacks, Hereros, Damaras and all the others.

The National Assembly has only recently been given the teeth it needs to start a social programme to win it some popular support, but at least four years are required to accomplish anything meaningful ... the time span of an average African development plan.

There is little doubt in most observers' minds now that Swapo would win an election held tomorrow. Also, that every additional day South Africa remains in the territory means another 20 votes for Sam Nujoma ... if only because he will profit from the record of a frankly racial system that encouraged divisionist tribalism, resentment and low wages.

Conflict

Not everybody in Namibia sees the conflict in straightforward ideological terms either, and there are many who would agree with Lord Caradon, former Minister of State at the British Foreign Office, that few people who know Nujoma well would describe him as a Marxist.

What will be the legacy of the decades when Namibia was the virtual fifth province of South Africa? Deserted ghost towns on the border, a resentful minute white population and a hostile and bitter black government in Windhoek?

Or will Pretoria stay on until it is convinced the DTA will win a UN-supervised election? Perhaps at great cost internationally to South Africa.

After Zimbabwe, people wonder what is holding up the logical progression of black rule in Namibia. But Namibia is South Africa's last psychological domino, not to be toppled quite yet.

It also looks increasingly like an albatross: a moulting albatross with exposed flanks, dangerously vulnerable.

COUNTRY FACES MEAT SHORTAGES

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 04 Sep 80 p 4

[Excerpt]

THE RECENT sharp rise in meat prices is the direct result of a shortage of supply from the producers, and can be expected to last for the next few months at least.

This was told to the Advertiser by the Manager of the Meat Board, Mr Horst Kreft.

The shortage of supply has resulted in the hike of producers' prices across the board, and has logically been passed on to the consumer.

The reason for the shortage is attributable to the previous few drought seasons, the effects of which found relief this year in emergency marketing measures.

This means that the farmers are now fetching reasonable prices for their stock.

Since stock levels on the farm are now low, producers are holding onto stock in order to breed.

It was always the case, explained Mr Kreft, that during seasons with good rainfall, producers' prices rose because breeding was placed ahead of marketing amongst the farmers' priorities.

It was essentially therefore a cyclical occurence, he said.

These cycles last for about three to four and even up to five years at a stretch.

Mr Kreft ventured a prediction that the shortage would last out another two years, while farmers were making up their stocks through breeding.

It should also be borne in mind, Mr Kreft said, that meat price increases occured at short notice, unlike most other commodities, which generally showed a gradual increment in consumer prices.

On the other hand, all consumer items were presently undergoing price increases.

Mr Kreft requested farmers not to hold onto their stock unecessarily in the light of the possible temporary closure of the Otavi abattoir on September 12 because of the current meat shortage.

If the factory had to close, it would result in a loss of turnover leading in turn to less trading money on re-opening. This would then affect producers adversely in the future.

Farmers should try their best therefore to lend support to factories during the current shortage.

Floor prices are adjusted weekly in SWA.

INCENTIVES USED TO KEEP PUBLIC SERVANTS IN COUNTRY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

PUBLIC SERVANTS joining the SWA/Namibian public service would immediately receive an increase of two notches in their salareis Mr Dirk Mudge, Chairman of the Ministers Council said in the National Assembly

Mr Mudge expressed appreciation for the service and contribution the public servants have made to SWA. He said he was of the opinion that the public servants did not merely perform their duties for material gain and expressed the hope that they would stay on in the country. Mr Mudge stressed that all possible measures would be taken to ensure fair guarantees with regard to conditions of service and their careers in SWA.

Many public servants appeared to be anxious about the security situation, Mr Mudge said, but SWA was probably one of the safest countries in the world to live in, in spite of the war on the border.

He said the SA Government had given the assurance that it would protect the Territory and people of SWA until a peaceful settlement had been reached.

Rumours that SWA was politically unstable was nothing but political propaganda, Mr Mudge said.

Despite the fact that measures have been taken to inform public servants of the changes being brought about by the new dispensation a great degree of uncertainty and ignorance still existed, he said and urged the public servants to satisfy themselves about the facts by contacting the Central Personnel Institution in Windhoek.

COMMISSION ACT ALSO APPLIES IN COUNTRY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE COMMISSION appointed in SWA by the Administrator General will have full powers in terms of a proclamation issued by the State President of SA in today's Government Gazette.

The proclamation is to make the Commission Act 1947 (Art 8 1947) applicable in the Territory. It will also be published in today's Official Gazette.

It was decided that the stipulations of the Commission Act be applicable here in order to give commissions appointed by the AG legal authority and wider powers — for example to have sittings in the Republic to hear evidence, or to summons witnesses who live in SA to give evidence here, and to be in a position to act against such a witness, either here or in SA if a summons from the commission was ignored or held in contempt.

A proclamation issued by the AG, as well as an Act passed by the National Assembly is only applicable within the Territory's borders. For this reason the Ministers' Council approached the State President to issue a proclamation in terms of the authority vested in him by Article 38 of the Act on the Constitution of SWA 1968.

NAMIBIAN YOUTHS IN REFUGEE CAMPS IN BOTSWANA

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 23 Aug 80 p 16

[Text]

WINDHOEK: In a talk to Mr Gerson Veii, the leader of the S.W.A. National Union who visited Botswana very recently, it transpired that a substantial number of youths from South West Africa are currently housed in the United Nations refugee camp in the neighbouring state.

Mr Veii said he would not like to disclose the name of the locality where the United Nations refugee camp is situated. He found on his visit there last week a group of about one hundred youths from South West Africa. It was a mixed group consisting of boys and girls who had left the country. He gained the impression, Mr Veii said, that these children were desirous of a higher and better education. On a question of whether some of them were also planning to undergo military training, he dismissed the suggestion by shaking his head.

In the camp were also housed, Mr Veii said, members of the African National Congress, and there were even a few members of the Patriotic Front.

In response to further questions, Mr Veii said it was undeniably the case that the black youth of South West Africa was, in an increasing manner, showing hostility and resistance to the order of the day.

The recent announcement, he added, which suggested compulsory military training for all in South West Africa, had prompted an exodus amongst the youth. Most of the youth were not inclined to support compulsory conscription.

VIOLENCE POSSIBLE AT HERERO COMMEMORATION SERVICES

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 23 Aug 80 p 8

[Text]

WINDHOEK: Katutura residents have been requested to stay away from commemoration services over the weekend, and particularly tomorrow (Sunday), to be held by the so-called Red Flag faction of the Herero-speaking people, namely NUDO, led by the leader of the Herero faction in the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance, Mr Kuaimo Riruako.

Swanu member and Secretary for Publicity and Information of the NNF, Mr Reinhard Rukoro, said when approached that Swanu supporters had been asked to stay away, in the event of trouble taking place. Swapo supporters too, and particularly residents of the Ovambo hostel, have been asked to stay off the streets.

In Katutura the talk is that certain members of Nudo have been armed, and there are worries that the commemoration day will take the form of a 'witch hunt' for members of Swapo and Swanu, with whom Nudo is at loggerheads.

According to Herero-speaking people, the day is one which was traditionally a commemoration day for the Hereros who had fallen in the wars with the Germans. It took the form of a national day, until various splits came about within the Herero ranks. The day has now become one which is solely celebrated by the NUDO faction of the Hereros, and has become greatly politicised. The commemoration services usually take the form of a march to Okahandja where most of the fallen Herero chiefs are buried.

Residents of the town have also expressed the hope that Police will be keeping a watchful eye on the proceedings, since commemoration of this day usually heralds trouble or friction between the various groups, in one form or another.

REASONS CITED FOR LOW LABOR PRODUCTIVITY

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 8 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] THE EXPANSION of local manufacture from raw materials forms the vital course along which planning should be steered if SWA is to develop along the road to economic stability and growth.

Local manufacture not only implies higher export earnings through product diversification and import substitution. Alongside the primary extractive sectors — mining and agriculture — manufacture is also the sector capable of absorbing the largest fraction of unemployed manpower in the country.

A high rate of unemployment and a superfluity of unskilled labour are two edges of the same pyramid. The third edge is that of excessively low productivity levels.

This three-sided obstacle constitutes the most serious restraint limiting economic growth, particularly manufacture, in SWA.

Manufacture not only requires inputs of relatively skilled labour, but these inputs must of necessity be utilised with their maximum degrees of productivity.

In a previous article in this newspaper, some of the obstacles to raising productivity levels in SWA were mentioned. These are

- alienation and all its ramifications such as lack of motivation and responsibility, and absenteeism
- poor housing and health services
- illiteracy and inadequate training facilities and
- unsound management-labour relations.

There are a number of further constrictions to manpower productivity in SWA.

TRADE UNIONS

Another important causative factor underlying the problems outlined thus far is the absence of responsible trade union organisation amongst the Black workforce.

The argument that these institutions are inevitably motivated by communist aspirations is invalid. Those who are familiar with the history of White trade unionism in SA during the earlier parts of this century, know that these intitutions won the day for the free enterprise system in SA and continue to do so today.

There is no rational argument that can justify the fear of communist upsurgings that would result from the extension of trade unionism to all sectors of the labour force.

In fact, therein lies the strongest bulwark possible against the emergence of communist-led trade unions. — a realisation which the DTA — dominated government has come to in recent months . . .

An adavantage of the establishment of trade unions along existing ethnic lines would be the harnessing of the cultural collectivity of the traditional African values within the industrial situation.

On these grounds, such institutions would serve as the ideal vehicle for transmitting modern value systems necessary for aligning the bulk of the labour force with the profit-oriented production process.

In addition, specialised trade unions would be ideally suited for the purposes of implementing manpower training programmes that are directly related to the economy's specific needs by incorporating within them the functions of recruitment, selection, training and placement.

Thirdly, these unions would be in a position to support the African labour force during its period of transition and inevitable dislocation that would result from the erosion of traditional cultural value systems in the face of individualistic, profit-oriented training.

HIGH TURNOVER

Both the system of voluntary migration as well as the contract labour system are responsible for the high turnover of labour in SWA. Workers in the urban centres have been regarded, for all intents and purposes as temporary sojournes, until very recently, in actual practice, the social after effects therefrom will still linger for a long time. The housing backlog contributes its share in this regard.

Allied to the contract labour system and its accompanying salient features such as anti-social hostels, poor food, health and other social amenities, is the entire question of labour legislation in the Territory.

There exists no legislation guaranteeing a minimum wage, none providing for cumulative wage increases with lengthy service periods, no pensions, paid annual leave or sick leave benefits.

These are glaring shortcomings in the existing labour situation which are the preconditions for creating a fully-fledged modern labour force.

Unemployment itself contributes directly to the high labour turnover by reinforcing management's hand in executing its notorious 'hire and fire' policy in Windhoek.

For those who are not familiar with this widespread practice, 'hire and fire' refers to the tendency for employers to recruit workers from the ranks of the unemployed for short – term production runs of tender projects, and then to lay these workers off at short notice or without any notice at all, either when they are no longer needed, or as a form of retribution for laziness, irresponsibility etc.

For the private sector, this practice must obviously be seen in the light of the seasonal nature of agricultural production cycles and the fluctuating demands for labour on short-term projects such as prospecting or construction work.

In addition, the Government's role in limiting long-term employment opportunities in the private sector by awarding short-term tender contracts to employers should not be overlooked.

The absence of any suitable legislation aimed at stabilising the labour force in the face of these typical production problems however, can be laid at the feet of State.

One can understand that any employer cannot keep supplementary labour contingents on the payroll after completing a certain tender contract, or when the snoek no longer runs. This is unavoidable.

But under the prevailing system of labour legislation, temporary and even long-term workers are laid off with no reference or record that reflects their past performance or accumulated skills, no matter on what level these may be notched.

There is of course a popular explanation for this feature of our labour economy. Without a record of a worker's previous job experience to merit his bargaining position as a job-seeker, the prospective employer can happily offer nothing more than the absolute minimum wage.

If the job seeker does not bite, there are plenty of others looking for work, not so?

It is a tight circle. And although employers' wage bills are arbitrarily deflated in this manner, the general level of accumulated skills amongst the lower echelons of the workforce as a whole, is allowed to drain through the sieve of short-sightedness year after year.

In searching for explanations for the existence of this unproductive state of affairs, one does not have to look too far.

APARTHEID POLICY

Several decades of separatist and apartheid policy implementation on the part of the successive governments in SWA, coupled with the desire of employers to maintain wage levels at the barest minimum, are the operative causes. The solution to transforming a largely unproductive mass of unskilled manual labourers to a productive labour force with a suitable industrial orientation, lies in the reform of industrial legislation, firstly.

Arguments from some quarters that the prospects of minimum wage legislation will widen the avenues of undue exploitation on the part of employers by providing them a ready-made ceiling on wages within which to restrict the payment of higher wages, are one-sided.

Private employers in the Territory are insistent in their demand that minimum wage legislation must be accompanied by higher productivity, and they are quite correct in stipulating this requirement.

It remains to point out that in the case of the existing unskilled mass of Black workers, increased productivity can only result through further training – on the job – as well formal.

In addition, however, the supervisory and managerial levels of the labour force, must be geared to take on additional resonsibilities under these conditions; for increased productivity will not naturally flow from legislatory reforms and improved training.

Increased productivity involves a combination of suitably skilled labour and capital under sound, and dynamic management and supervision.

Having examined the high labour turnover amongst the Black labour force, one must not lose track of the high turnover of managerial and professional labour traditionally, and for all practical purposes, presently, dominated by the other cultural communities – Europeans and White South Africans.

BRAIN DRAIN

The brain drain from the Territory to the Republic is a well recognised phenomenon and has no simple solution. Under the present circumstances there is little alternative but to continue to pay these cadres inflated salaries in order to attract them to the backwaters of our underdeveloped economy. Emphasis should be placed on recruiting these people in training positions rather than for their direct economic utility. When they leave for the brighter lights of Cape Town and Johannesburg, they will then have imparted some of their skills to our own people.

It is all very well to focus one's attention on the actively employed labour force and its general level of productivity, for it is the economic muscle of SWA.

What must not be lost sight of, however, is that some two-thirds of the upper-income employees in the Territory are unproductively employed in the vast bureaucratic machine that administers the political system locally.

The labour of these people, by and large, is unproductive in the sense that it does not deliver goods and services that are exchanged at a profit, in the market economy.

On the contrary, their salaries and wages are paid out of taxes gleaned from the profits of the mining, agricultural, financial and commercial sectors.

Some parts of the tertiary sector are of course more directly productive in the economic sense than others, other less so, and these carry the largest weight.

A top-heavy bureaucracy is the one one thing that an independent SWA needs least, and can afford even less.

Sound administration is a necessary component to any stable political and economic system. That much is true. It is not a sufficient condition, however. Under conditions of severe economic and political strain facing SWA today, rationalisation on large scale of the national economy would be meaningless without similar efforts on the political administrative front.

ENGLISH TO BE TAUGHT IN OWAMBO SCHOOLS

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 4 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

English will be the medium of education in Owambo as from 1981.

Mr Peter Kalangula, member of the Owambo Legislative Authority charged with education, told the Advertiser on Friday that some schools were already giving extra English to introduce the concept to the children.

Although very few children in Owambo spoke English, Mr Kalangula said they were confident that the problems they were faced with would be ironed out because the children were eager to learn.

The main problem, Mr Kalangula said, was finding English speaking teachers but, he said, they also had to start from scratch in Afrikaans teaching and if they could overcome the problems in Afrikaans they would certainly be able to overcome them now.

The scheme was initiated in the second quarter of this year when a delegation of 15 school inspectors and senior teachers, together with Mr Kalankula, approached the Department of National Education. The officials considered their proposals and it was passed by the Owambo Legislative Authority.

All the schools in Owambo would teach by way of the English language medium as from the beginning of next year, Mr Kalangula said. There were however, a number of practical problems still to be ironed out, such as the introduction of the new language medium to senior students.

Mr Kalangula explained that the idea of English as a teaching medium was partly influenced by the number of students leaving Owambo each year for other African countries where they were educated in English. He said it was difficult to argue with the students if they were not offered any alternative medium within their own country.

A delegation from the Department of National Education is leaving for Owambo on September 8 where they would liase with senior teachers, school inspectors and officials to try and draw up a modus operandi for the implementation of English, Mr Kalangula said.

The Owambo Legislative Authority has decided to delegate Education to the Central Government where it would fall under the Department of National Education.

NEW RESERVE BANK GOVERNOR IS APPOINTED

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 8 Aug 80 p 2

[Text]

GERHARD DE KOCK, the newly appointed Governor of the Reserve Bank, in succeeding Dr Theunis (Bob) De Jongh makes history by following in his father's footsteps.

Dr De Kock is currently senior deputy governor, but has other duties such as special economic adviser and has recently been elected to head up the Prime Minister's "Constellation of States" committee.

Dr De Kock's appointment is welcomed by those involved in free enterprise, as the "Good Doctor" is undoubtedly a marketing man, evidenced by his reports on Exchange Control, allowing easier movement of funds between this country and others.

Accolades for the manner in which Dr De Jongh, has governed the Reserve Bank flowed in last night and Standard Bank's Dr Conrad Strauss, also chairman of the Clearing Banks Association said: "For more than a decade Dr De Jongh has served South Africa with distinction, both locally and in international forums."

He added: "In my own dealings with him, I found that he was objective, unfailingly courteous, and his door was always open." Dr De Jongh has not always had the full support of the banking sector, with comments such as "inflexible" being levelled at him, but there is concensus that he has been prepared to look and listen to any argument.

The Governor's seat is an important, and executive position, and although Dr De Jongh has been seen to be conservative at times, he has operated through a very difficult period for the economy, and has handled it well.

Dr De Jongh was appointed in 1867, and at the commencement of his third term of office, on July 1, 1977, he came to agreement with the Finance Minister Owen Horwood, that he would not serve the full five year term. In his statement yesterday, Dr De Jongh said: "I now wish to announce that, in accordance with this understanding, I have advised the Minister that I prefer to retire on December 31, 1980."

Wim Holtes, head of the South African Foreign Trade Organisation, which has not exactly had the friendliest relationship with the Reserve Bank, told The Citizen: "Dr De Jongh has been a true gentleman ... and we must not forget that he has made a tremendous and everlasting mark on the South African scene."

Mr Holtes says local businessmen should be parucualrly grateful for Dr De Jongh's conservatism in times when the temptation to "spend the millions" was very strong.

Dr De Kock's appointment has met with a measure of surprise from the banking fraternity, but mixed with the surprise is a strong element of happiness, as his open market convictions are wellknown, and coming to the helm in good times will allow relatively free reign on the central banking sector.

KOUNTCHE ADDRESSES CONFERENCE OF CADRES

Niamey SAHEL HEBDO in French 11 Aug 80 p 8

[Report on address by President Seyni Kountche to a conference of cadres on 5 August 1980; place not given]

[Text] Chief of State Col Seyni Kountche presided over a conference of cadres last Tuesday.

On that occasion the chief of state addressed the officers of the FAN [Niger Armed Forces], the secretaries general, the department heads, directors of the mixed-economy companies, and the representatives of the various organizations.

In opening the conference, Col Seyni Kountche first explained the reasons for the conference of cadres and its significance. He began by clarifying certain passages in his message to the nation and then removed all doubts concerning certain rumors making the rounds of Niamey's social gatherings, notably in connection with certain matters now under investigation.

The chief of state touched on the current economic and financial situation in West Africa, more especially within the economic and financial organizations to which we belong, such as the CEAO and the UMOA [West African Monetary Union]. In this connection, he said that any difficulty cropping up in one of the countries necessarily has repercussions at the level of the entire organization or monetary union.

He also noted that in some countries the rainy season did not really start at the end of July, and he said that everyone knows that some countries are experiencing difficulties with food supplies.

Discussing the drop in uranium prices, the chief of state said that under the best assumption, we will experience a drop in revenues corresponding to what Niger's budget was in 1974. This calls for no comment, but it means that we will have to adopt the austerity measures required.

Speaking of austerity, Col Seyni Kountche also brought up the current matters that are the topic of conversation at social gatherings as well as the inspections being made at certain local companies. Those inspections have already revealed that the operating credits of the public services are excessive, a situation that has led to misappropriations of all kinds. In this connection, the chief of state listed a number of practices adopted by the swindlers and their accomplices. In any case, the investigations will cover all areas, and the incriminated firms will pay, because the state will never be the loser.

In the OPVN [Nigerien Foodstuffs Office] as well, fraudulent practices have resulted in massive withdrawals of cereals through the administrative lists for the benefit of a few merchants. Those practices are all the more blameworthy, said the chief of state, in that the government is making a sizable effort to support the price of those cereals to allow for the purchasing power of the Nigeriens and also enable the peasants to get through to the next harvest.

Col Seyni Kountche then asked if the Nigeriens have short memories--are they already forgetting the difficulties experienced just a few years ago? Now that the situation has improved thanks to the state's efforts, a few irresponsible persons are trying to take advantage of it and make a fortune at the expense of everyone's labor. Here again the investigation is continuing, and the guilty merchants and civil servants will be made to answer for their acts.

As far as the National Commission's role is concerned, the chief of state told the national cadres that they are responsible for the progress or regression of the country. They must conduct themselves as committed patriots, because they control the machinery of state. As for the commission itself, the responsibility of its members will make it possible to test their patriotism and degree of commitment.

In conclusion, Col Seyni Kountche told the national cadres that each of them will be judged twice: once by the people and once by history. In this connection, he said that the people's verdict will be implacable and that as a result, we cannot close our eyes to certain practices.

The second verdict--that of history--is more distant but will also be pronounced on our acts and our actions.

The entire situation, he said, is due to a slackening of discipline, and in this regard, every Nigerien will have to pull himself together to accomplish his duties with conscienciousness and dignity.

IKOKU DENIES PURPORTED SPLIT IN PRP

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1679

[Text] Despite ominous signs to the contrary, the National Secretary for the People's Redemption Party (PRP), Mr. S. G. Ikoku, has asserted that the party is not split. "The purported split in the party is the wishful thinking of the mass media, which backed the rebellious faction within the party."

Addressing a news conference on what was termed "recent developments within the PRP", Mr. Ikoku rejected any split on the following grounds:

"Only two deputy national secretaries and the national financial secretary are on the side of the rebels.

"The national directorate is solidly behind Alhaji Aminu Kano, with only three gradualists and compromise-seekers out of about 70 members.

"The party branches in the constituencies of rebel legislators have been sending large delegations to Kano to pledge their support for Alhaji Aminu Kano and the PRP leadership.

Mr. Ikoku added that in contrast, the overt evidence of support for the expelled Governor Abubakar Rimi has been an increased mobile police escort. He rejected reports that the PRP had been sold out to the National Party of Nigeria (NPN), adding that attempts had been made in the past to unite the UPN, GNPP and the PRP, but these had failed.

The two sacked governors from the People's Redemption Party (PRP), Alhaji Abubakar Rimi and Alhaji Balarabe Musa, have won the first round of their battle with the PRP leadership. Until their legal actions have been fully disposed of, they should not be expelled, ruled a Lagos High Court.

The Publicity secretary of the Borno State branch of the PRP, Alhaji Alhazai Bala, has said in Maiduguri that non-members were to blame for the rift currently going on within the party. Such people, he said, were trying to bring about the downfall of the party by applying all possible means of wrecking it. "It is very common for members of a family to quarrel or have a misunderstanding among them, but it is unwise and an act of sabotage for any outsider to try and interfere in the affairs of the party."

Mr. Bala expressed his belief that at the end of the current crisis, which he hoped would be resolved quickly, the party would become strong and united, and would sweep the general election in 1983.

GOVERNORS OF OIL-PRODUCING STATES REJECT OKIGBO REPORT

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 pp 1641-1642

[Text] GOVERNORS of Nigeria's five oil-producing states have rejected the recommendations of the Okigbo Commission on Revenue Allocation. At the end of their meeting in Port Harcourt last week, Governors Ambrose Alli (Bendel), Melford Okilo (Rivers) and Clement Isong (Cross River), whose states produce the bulk of on-shore crude oil, described the recommendations as "politically tainted, prejudiced, insensitive and biased".

Making public the substance of the Commission's report, which was recently submitted to the president, the Governors said that the report revealed a "deliberate and dangerous mix-up of the principle of derivation with the Special Fund meant to clear up the mess of the debris left by the process of exploration and exploitation of minerals". The Okigbo Commission has recommended, among other things, that federally collected revenue be distributed as follows: 53 per cent to the Federal Government, 30 per cent to the states, 10 per cent to local governments and 7 per cent to the Special Fund.

As between the states, the Commission recommended that revenue due to them should be shared on the basis of 40 per cent on population, 40 per cent on minimum responsibility (that is, on equality), 15 per cent on primary school enrolment and the balance of 5 per cent on primary school enrolment and the balance of 5 per cent on the amount of internal revenue collected. The Commission also recommends transfer of housing, agriculture and the universal primary education (UPE) from the Federal to State Governments. At present, the Federal Government funds the UPE scheme at 40 per pupil in each state and it has invested in housing estates at state capitals. In addition, huge sums of money had been invested in agricultural projects by the Federal government in the states, particularly in river basins linking many states.

On their part, the three Governors have demanded 50 per cent of federally collected revenue for states, 40 per cent to the Federal Government and 10 per cent to local governments. The state joint account should, according to them, be shared equally on the basis of population and equality of states. They want the Special Fund paid 100 per cent to the oil states (the two others are Imo and Ondo States).

In addition, the governors have called for setting up of a national committee with equal representation from each state to monitor mineral and agricultural output for export and calculate revenue due to each state. This body would be the equivalent of the National Revenue Allocation Commission to be proposed to the National Assembly by President Shehu Shagari.

The Federal Government, in a "federation memo" to the Okigbo Commission, had demanded a share of federal revenue on a formula of 70 per cent to the Federal Government, 20 per cent to the states, and 10 per cent to local governments. The Federal Government had proposed that 3 per cent of the value of minerals derived from a given state should be statutorily allocated to it in the form of compensatory payments, while the proposed federal capital territory of Abuja be treated as a state for the purpose of revenue sharing. In addition, the Federal Government had wanted 1 per cent of federal income to go into a National Relief Fund.

At one of their meetings before making a submission of the Okigbo Report, the nine Governors of UPN, GNPP and PRP-controlled states had called for sharing of federal revenue on the basis of 50 per cent to the Federal Government, 40 per cent to states and 10 per cent to local governments. And the report, copies of which have been made available to governors as members of the National Economic Council, was discussed at the meeting of the nine at Abeokuta last week. The nine governors will be expected to adopt a joint stand on the Ikigbo report at the next meeting of the NEC.

Although details of the Commission's report are not yet known — the Federal Government has not published the report — it would appear that Okigbo had attempted to do a delicate political balancing act as between the positions of the Federal Government and the states and such conflicting criteria as population and derivation. In absolute terms, the states would have more money and the Federal Government less than they used to have if the recommendations are accepted. What would be of tremendous political interest is the weight the Commission has attached to derivation, population, equality of states, even development, equitable distribution and national interest — factors which formed the Commission's guidelines.

Attention has been focused on oil spillage in Rivers and Bendel States in anticipation of the report and to justify allocation of a Special Fund to the oil states. The Federal Government will keep its hands off primary education and 15 per cent of the state account will be shared according to primary school population. Two questions may be raised: would states fare better in real terms under this arrangement and would the states with less populated schools not kick against this weighting, as it would benefit states like Kano, Oyo, Sokoto and Kaduna that do not produce part of the golden egg (oil)?

During a recent public debate of the oil issue, Governor Sam Mbakwe (NPN) of Imo State has asserted that Cross River State produced less oil than Imo State. But Governor Clement Isong (NPN) of Cross River State maintained that his state ranked third after Bendel and Rivers State in oil output. And Governor Isong, who is a former Governor of the Central Bank and an economist, quickly produced figures through his director of information to buttress his statement. According to these figures, the bulk (ie. 72.56 per cent) of crude produced in 1979, that is 842 million barrels, was on-shore. The production in the creeks of the Rivers State is regarded as on-shore. The balance of 27.43 per cent was off-shore.

Rivers, Imo and Ondo States did not produce any off-shore crude, while Bendel and Cross River produced 61.47 and 38.52 per cent, respectively, of total off-shore crude. And distribution of each state's contribution to total production in 1979 is as follows: Bendel 53.08 per cent, Rivers 28.74 per cent, Cross River 11.75 per cent Imo 6.17 per cent and Ondo 0.11 per cent.

If the oil debate between the two governors is anything to go by, public discussion of the Okigbo Report is expected to be intense. For one thing, there would appear to be enough common ground between the states for them jointly to confront the Federal Government, ignoring party platforms. For another, it would appear that in an attempt to satisfy all sides, Okigbo may not have succeeded in satisfying any.

[Speech by AREMA [Vanguard of the Malagasy Revolution] member Laurent Radaody at the Fifth Congress of the PCR [Reunionese Communist Party]]

[Text] Comrade delegates, Reunionese brothers and sisters

The secretary general of AREMA, Didier Ratsiraka, personally asked me to bring you his brotherly regards and to bear witness to you once more of our organization's militant solidarity with the PCR, which is to us not only the major force struggling for respect of the Reunion people's legitimate rights, but also a vital element in the fight against imperialism and for the defense of peace and socialism in our area.

The Vitality of Progressive Forces in the Area

We salute this fifth congress of the PCR and the success of its work as outstanding proof of the vitality of progressive forces in this region of the Indian Ocean.

The quality of the analyses and discussions which we have heard here faithfully reflect the important and responsible principles of the Reunionese communists as we have known them for a long time in Madagascar, and which led AREMA from the beginning to conclude warm and confident relations with the PCR and its leaders.

All the Colonies Are Disappearing

Whatever the intrigues and mystification created by those who are nostalgic for an outdated and iniquitous order, AREMA, as all the progressive parties in Madagascar, is strongly at your side in your struggle for respect of the right of the Reunionese people to self-determination, to build themselves a future of liberty, justice and social progress; for we are convinced that only the people of Reunion can decide what is good for Reunion and that it is up to the people and to those who create the wealth, in other words the workers, to define their goals and the manner in which they will be attained through the organizations and institutions which they judge to be the most effective.

We are also convinced of the futility of the rear-guard struggle led by a colonialism which, anachronistic at the end of the 20th century, is seeing all the colonies, even those established 5 centuries ago, inevitably disappear.

A Burdensome Heritage To Dispel

We are not minimizing, however, the threats which international imperialism always cause to hover over the independence and the security of countries which have recently been liberated and which are trying to dispel the burdensome heritage that colonialism has imposed through its policies of pilfering and overexploiting.

Our party would like to express here its gratitude to the PCR for its faithful support of the Malagasy Republic in the defense of its youth and its integrity in the face of the imperialist maneuvers, and especially for the support of the PCR for Madagascar's legitimate claim to recovery of the Malagasy Islands in the Mozambique Channel, unduly occupied by France.

We also congratulate ourselves for having at our sides a companion in battle such as the PCR in the struggle to make the Indian Ocean a peace zone. We have discussed this issue together for several years, and today our most pessimistic predictions are on the verge of being realized if we wait any longer to mobilize.

No to the Balance of Terror!

We are presently witnessing an unprecedented militarization of the Indian Ocean under the avowed pretext of protecting the petroleum route. Nuclear weapon strike forces are brought into our region every day, the number of warships is continuously growing, and, in the case of a confrontation, the coastal countries would be the first victims of this deranged escalation.

We can admit that each country must protect its interests, and we can understand the conflicts which exist, but we cannot accept that the consequence of this be the establishment of a balance of terror at our doors.

It is for this reason that Madagascar has decided to make its contribution to peace in this area and in the rest of the world by inviting the heads of state of the USSR, the United States, China and Japan, the heads of the EEC, the CEMA and the group of nonalined nations, and the heads of state of the countries on the Indian Ocean, to a summit conference at Antananarivo at the end of next year or at the beginning of 1982, to draft an international convention guaranteeing the safety of private ships, and more specifically, of oil tankers in the Indian Ocean. In a reciprocal agreement, the signatories will promise to take all measures to facilitate creation of a peace zone in the Indian Ocean by adopting the following four points in particular:

1. Guarantee of the safety of private navigation and oil tankers.

2. Progressive reduction of military personnel.

3. Dismantling of foreign military bases.

4. Prohibition of the entrance of nuclear weapons or of weapons capable of massive destruction into the Indian Ocean.

For the Solidarity of Progressive Forces in the Islands

We were able to note during this congress from the explanations of your party how the idea of an Indian Ocean peace zone is deeply rooted among the people of Reunion.

We were also able to appreciate the living force which the tenets of socialism and of anti-imperialist solidarity constitute within the heart of your party; tenets which unite us even more than all the very strong ties of history and geography.

Finally, we were able to see through the work of this Fifth Congress how the watchword of democratic and popular autonomy has actually become a watchword of the people, thanks to the PCR. The PCR's action is based on a concrete analysis of the specific conditions in Reunion and is essential in sweeping away attempts to sow diversion among us by confusion for the sole profit of our common enemy: imperialism.

And we would like to profit from the unique opportunity which is offered us today to renew our unflagging appeal for the solidarity of the progressive forces of the Indian Ocean islands.

Before yielding the floor to the other parties who are members of the FNDRSM [National Front for the Defense of the Malagasy Socialist Revolution], let me thank the Reunionese communists for the warm and brotherly welcome I have received.

What we have heard and seen here fully confirms, if confirmation is still needed, that there are more and more of us who are refusing to kneel before the colonialists and the imperialists.

Long live the Reunionese Communist Party and its Fifth Congress!

Long live the solidarity between the brothers of Reunion and Madagascar in the struggle against colonialism and for peace!

Cuban Representative's Speech

Saint Denis TEMOIGNAGES in French 21 Jul 80 p 5

[Speech by Rene De Los Santos, member of the Central Committee of the Cuban Communist Party at the Fifth Congress of the PCR]

> [Text] The participation of the representative of the Cuban Communist Party was one of the highlights of the Fifth Congress of the Reunionese Communist Party. It was the first time, in fact, that a Cuban delegate made the trip from the Caribbean to bring the support of the Cuban people to the Reunionese people.
> In the same sugar cane monoculture, the same environment marked by the presence of imperialist forces, Fidel Castro's representative must have felt "at home" on our island, and more particularly, at the port during these 3 days of the PCR congress. "Peace in the Indian Ocean," "Friendship among the people," "Solidarity of the progressive forces"; these phrases could only reinforce the common struggle of the Cuban and Reunionese people.

It is with great pleasure that we bring to the delegates at the Fifth Congress of the Reunionese Communist Party, and, through the congress, to all communists and to the Reunionese people, the warm and brotherly regards of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Cuba, of its first secretary, comrade Fidel Castro, and of all the Cuban people.

As for our delegation, it is with special emotion that we meet with you at this congress, since this demonstrates and reaffirms the bonds of friendship between the Communist Party of Cuba and the Reunionese Communist Party, and between our two people.

Both of our countries are small islands with similar characteristics, with economies essentially based on agriculture, where sugar cane is the chief export product. In both countries there are military bases imposed by imperialism against the will of the people and we are both located in regions in which the imperialists are trying to maintain their military, economic and political predominance. Our people are both defending their inalienable rights to freely and independently decide their future.

The struggles of the Reunionese people against colonial exploitation, impregnated with true class character, began very early. These struggles have been continued by their communist party in the unions, in the women's and youth democratic organizations, giving them a more advanced political and social content to end the situation of colonial domination in order to permit independent economic development, social progress and cultural and political expansion in freedom.

Today the struggle of the Reunionese communists is becoming more important. The geographical location of their country in this strategic area of the Indian Ocean where American imperialism intends to give us a new version of "gunboat diplomacy," obliges the people to maintain close surveillance along with other countries in the area in order to attain the vehement desire of all men: that the Indian Ocean become a peace zone.

The Cuban people, as well as many other countries in Africa and in other parts of the world, had to struggle for decades for their independence and their freedom, finally and irreversibly obtained in January 1959.

Since then, and during these 21 years, the North American imperialists have maintained a criminal blockade against our people, performing mercenary sabotage, provocation and aggression, and stubbornly continuing to occupy the naval base at Guantanamo against the will of the people, while spy planes hover over our territory.

But none of this has been able to break our revolutionary spirit; on the contrary, this has only consolidated and strengthened our revolution. Powerless, the imperialists are now trying to orchestrate new and even more dangerous actions against Cuba.

To this purpose, the Carter administration had announced military maneuvers in the Antilles which would include a massive debarkation at the Guantanamo naval base; but he had to abandon the plan in the face of categorical condemnation by our people and world solidarity.

Their new maneuvers and slanderous campaigns have failed again before the resolute will of the Cuban people. Millions of men, women and children have demonstrated to the world their unconditional support of the revolution, the communist party and our commander in chief.

Comrades,

Mankind today is threatened by new dangers, by grave dangers, due to the fact that the imperialists have not lost any of their aggressive and predatory nature, any more than they have renounced their intention of turning back history, of trying to relaunch the sad era of the cold war to recover lost ground.

We have proof of this in the frantic arms race, in the increase of their military presence in the Indian Ocean, on the Diego-Garcia island, and in the coastal countries, in their maneuvers and aggressions against Iran, in the creation of a rapid intervention team, in the decision to install new nuclear warheads in Western Europe, and in their refusal to ratify the SALT II agreements.

The people of the world, desiring only peace, are watching imperialism's aggressive plans with alarm, and demanding in complete justice the dismantling of these military bases and the end of the arms race.

The recent victory of the people of Zimbabwe, who, under the direction of the patriotic front, fought an unequal battle against English colonialism and the racist regimes of Rhodesia and South Africa, proves that it is no longer possible to prevent the people from liberating themselves.

On this occasion we cannot tire of condemning the vile and criminal aggression of which our brothers in Angola are victims by the hands of the racist forces of South Africa; this aggression, as justly pointed out by comrade Fidel Castro in his message addressed to the heads of state of the nonalined nations "coincides with the recent actions announced by the United States to eliminate the legal restrictions which hypothetically were limiting the administration by preventing its intervention in the internal affairs of Angola and the granting of open aid to counterrevolutionaries who operate from South African bases."

This fact again demonstrates the close alliance between imperialism and apartheid; it shows the danger which the existence of such a degrading regime and the military, economic and political cooperation granted it by several western powers constitutes for the people of Africa, as well as the necessity of continuing to supply political and material support to the struggle for the liberation of the oppressed people of South Africa and Namibia and to their legitimate representatives: the ANC and the SWAPO.

Comrades,

We are sure that this congress, which is important not only for the communists, but also for all the Reunionese people, will contribute to the strengthening of the struggle of the workers and of all the people of this beautiful island of Reunion for democratic and popular autonomy based on anticolonialism.

Long live the Fifth Congress of the Reunionese Communist Party!

Long live Marxism-Leninism!

Long live proletarian internationalism!

The homeland or death!

We will overcome!

NEW TEACHERS' UNION PLANNED

Niamey LE SAHEL in French 13 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] It has been learned in Dakar that in reaction to the Sole Democratic Trade Union of Senegalese Teachers (SUDES), which is close to the opposition, teachers favorable to the Senegalese Government are going to establish a Federation of National Education Workers (FTEN). This new union will be formed at a congress to be held at the end of October.

A trade union of socialist primary and secondary teachers (the party in power in Senegal is the Socialist Party) was established on Sunday. The constituent congress for the Union of Lay and Religious Private Teachers, this establishment will be followed in October by that of a union of nonteaching personnel in national education. The three unions will then constitute the FTEN [paragraph as published].

The decision to set up these new structures was made on 10 April by a national conference of socialist teachers, which also decided to dissolve the former National Union of Senegalese Teachers [SNES], which was close to the government, after noting that it had fallen "into a state of lethargy."

Like the former SNES, the new federation will be a member of the National Confederation of Senegalese Workers, which is affiliated with the Socialist Party.

The congress of socialist teachers adopted a resolution affirming its attachment to Leopold Sedar Senghor, president of the republic and secretary general of the Socialist Party. The union condemns the SUDES for initiating a strike last 13 May in which it refused to administer examinations, and it expresses its solidarity with the authorities in the sanctions adopted. Lastly, it is asking the government to take steps to insure that the coming school year will proceed under the most favorable conditions.

STUDENTS ATTEND LAUNAY HOLIDAY CAMP

Victoria NATION in English 18 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The first group of several hundred Primary Nine students from all over the country who are taking part in a specially organised holiday camp arrived, excited and happy at Port Launay yesterday afternoon.

The group, which is divided into 18 units, consists of over 170 students accompanied by a number of teachers. These students will be eligible to enter the NYS when it starts next year.

The camp which started yesterday is the first of three that have been organised during the August school holidays.

In a short welcoming speech, the Minister of State for Youth and Community Development, Mr. Esme Jumeau, expressed his delight at seeing the eager young faces who had come to sample, in the short period of one week, the satisfaction and benefits of real harmony, on which the society of tomorrow will be based. Mr. Jumeau told the students that for the rest of the week they are to live as brothers and sisters.

"You are expected to talk about any problems, which may arise with your supervisors and they in turn will help you to find the solutions. If any such problems are quickly spotted, discussed and rooted out, there is no way in which the camp will not be a success," Minister Jumeau said.

"Living as brothers and sisters demands a lot of tolerance, understanding and discipline and this is what we are asking of you as from today," he added.

"Your parents know that in this pilot camp you will all be able to see what type of society the Seychelles People's Progressive Front (SPPF) is aiming for," Minister Jumeau went on.

"The true road to a new and better society is being created now, by you all," he emphasised.

After the Minister's speech, senior youth officer, Miss Noella Antat, outlined the organisation of the camp.

It is to have seven departments: an information department which will include the drawing up of reports; the taking of photos and also a study of the history of Port Launay; a cultural section to deal with traditional dances, plays and songs; a production section which will carry out community work; and other departments covering ecology, health, domestic science and sports.

Apart from the Youth Department officials, a number of volunteers from the Port Launay community will help with the cooking and in any other way they can.

A co-ordinator for each of the 18 units will be appointed by the rest of the participants and he or she will discuss with the group's advisor any problem arising in that particular unit.

While in camp the group will also be organising a sports day. A cultural evening will close each week's camp and it is hoped that as many parents as possible will attend these. The cultural shows will be held on Saturday evenings, before the break-up of camp on Sunday.

All the students taking part in this and the other two camps are volunteers.

USSR INTERVENTIONISM IN HORN SCORED

Mogadishu HEEGAN in English 22 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by A. Jama: "Is Moscow the Protector of the OAU Charter?"]

[Text] Member States of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) should urge in unison this super-power which supports the Mengistu regime to cease its uncalled for and unwarranted intervention in purely African problems.

As a matter of fact, in order to prop its position among African states the Soviet Union keeps making loud references to the OAU Charter by stating that all member states have committed themselves to upholding the existing borders in Africa! !

Obviously the logical question to ask then is: where is the passage in the OAU Charter which says that it is the Soviet Union to ensure the implementation of the Charter by intervening militarily?

The above super-power has intervened in the question of the Horn for its own strategic ends through its often orchestrated propaganda of protecting «the Socialist Revolution in Ethiopia» surrounded by imperialism and hostile reactionary states.

While in the past, Abyssinia has subtly utilised the old cliché of «Christian Island» surrounded by a sea of Muslims.

In fact, the Soviet Union has ignored international and African public opinion in its flagrant and and wanton intervention in the Horn's affairs by the active deployment of 12% of its total transport fleet to safeguard the dying colonialism of the Mengistu regime in 1977-78.

But one thing is certain that the Russian and their surrogates have utterly failed in their intervention by their lack of understanding the true nature of the forces caught in the conflict of the Horn.

In retrospect, the conflict of the Horn is basically a war of nationalism in which the said super-power has openly sided with the oppressor. Thus five major oppressed nationalities namely, the Eritreans, Somalis, Oromos, Tigraweans and the Afars have opted for the armed struggle in order to extricate themselves from the cowebs of Amhara minority domination.

Similarly, the majority of the Black people in South Africa are fighting against the White Afrikaaner minority rule. Both these peoples are fighting for their legitimate and inalienable rights for Self-determination.

This being the essence of the issue of the Horn, it is then high time that the OAU member states should take a principled stand on the said issue instead of pursuing an ostrich-like policy.

BACKING OF ISRAEL BY 'CERTAIN' POWERS TERMED 'HYPOCRITICAL'

Mogadishu HEEGAN in English 7 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Condemning the Israeli Plan"]

[Text] Israel's announcement to make Jerusalem its capital city has come at a time when our world has been undergoing a series of crises, the latest of which was Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. These two events have compounded the already tense situation of the international body politic, and have thrown into relief not only the Palestinian question but the fundamental issue of human rights.

Many of us are apt to look up to the UNO for a solution whenever a crisis occurs somewhere, and that is only natural, for the UN was founded with the aim of maintaining internatinal justices. And we are disappointed when in a flagrant violation of its charter certain tragic events take place. Further, one is appalled when he or she finds out that the very nations that are expected to observe the principles and behests of the UNO are themselves the very first criminals to commit or abet others to commit acts that are in violent contrast to the Charter to which they have subscribed.

If Israel had not have the backing of certain big powers it could not have been able to pursue its expansionist policies. [as published] These powers have either backed it openly or have blocked moves in the United Nations to curb Israeli ambitions.

It is indeed hypocritical that these very powers at the same time preach freedom, peace and democracy for all. This is applying not only double standards but triple standards, for nowadays in addition to denying others these rights they blatantly justify their own involvement in the troublespots of the world on the ground that they are putting into action these lofty human ideals.

We condemn the present monstrous Israeli plan as champions of the Palestinian cause and of the right to self-determination and of human freedom. And particularly at this moment when the whole Moslim world is wrathful we too would like to record our indignation alongside the rest of our brothers.

ISLAMIC, SCIENTIFIC SOCIALISM PRINCIPLES DOVETAIL

Mogadishu HEEGAN in English 1 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "An Ally of our Revolution"]

[Text] The revolutionary government has attached great importance to the improvement of religious knowledge. In view of this, training courses have been organized for our Shiekhs from time to time, thus keeping them abreats of developments. [as published] Just during this week one such course has been closed at Afgoi.

The reason behind our Revolution's concern for the religion of Islam is quite obvious. Our people are one hundred per cent Muslims, and Islam has been the main source of inspiration for them over the centuries. All our great nationalist leaders were invariably prominent religious leaders who fought under the banner of Islam.

Likewise all our good theologians have been freedom-lovers who have defended our people in their nationhood and sovereignty conformity with Islam that preaches freedom, equality and justice for all humanity. For which reason the Somali people have never submitted to slavery in whatever form it exists. Inspired by this great religion they have consistently strived to play a constructive and progressive role in order to improve their lot and that of their fellow men elsewhere.

That is why our religious men have always been the standard-bearers of all our revolutions as Jaalle Siad averred at the closing ceremony of this present course.

Islam, before the Revolution, was in a miserable condition. It was relegated to the background and consequently chaos reigned in every sphere of life. There was anarchy and a degeneration of morality. Worse, Islam was used by our enemies to further their own ends.

Islam is a dynamic religion that can go with every epoch and give guidance at all times. More important, it is a religion that champions the cause of the exploited and the oppressed. Its tenets, therefore, nicely dovetail with the principles of Scientific Socialism. In as much as it interprets the aspirations of our people, it has the same objectives which our Revolution is seeking to attain. Islam is, in other words, an ally of our Revolution.

PIK BOTHA WARNS PRESS ON USE OF OFFICIAL DOCUMENTS

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 2 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Text] Newspaper publication of official documents and notes published without authority is a crime, according to a statement issued yesterday evening in Pretoria by Foreign Minister Pik Botha.

This statement was issued after it came to the government's attention that documents and notes of an interdepartmental committee came into the hands of some newspapers. The committee was set up for the purpose of countering the unrest which broke out earlier this year in Capetown--one of the causes being the school boycott.

Consequences

"These newspapers are bent on publishing notes and other documents about the committee's functions. The newspapers must judge for themselves whether any laws are broken by publishing such things."

The statement also says: "The newspapers must also assume responsibility for any harmful effects which the publication can have on the government's efforts at maintaining law and order in the country.

"The committee in question was established by the cabinet and was given the task of planning measures aimed at countering increasing unrest and violence. The unrest and violence also stemmed from school boycotts earlier this year.

"Through peaceful measures, the committee has contributed to the prevention of violence and in forestalling the loss of life. The committee also divulged information refuting the lies and misinformation which had been spread on a large scale by subversive elements.

"In some instances, anonymous pamphlets were prepared by the committee, because it regarded this as the most effective way for countering unrest and subversive plans and in helping to maintain order. The pamphlets reflected the opinions and attitudes of a large sector of the population.

"The government will not hesitate to maintain law and order with all the forces and resources at its disposal. If it should again appear to be necessary, measures of this kind will be employed in order to combat the action and false propaganda of anonymous agitators and advocators of violence and to promote peace in the country.

"The police are investigating the unauthorized issuance of official documents to certain newspapers and appropriate measures will be taken in light of the findings." (South African Press Agency)

ENORMOUS TASK FOR REAGAN SHOULD HE BECOME PRESIDENT

Johannesburg DIE TRANSVALER in Afrikaans 19 Jul 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Tests for Reagan"]

[Text] For Western democracies, which have become so worried over the shift of power equilibrium during the Carter administration, the fact that Republican candidate Ronald Reagan is making such loud noises for the coming presidential elections must be encouraging.

This is because what the West is now yearning for is exactly that, namely: Strength and decisive leadership in a world which has become extremely dangerous as a result of Russian self-confidence and expansionism which is unprecedented since the World War II rearrangements which favored Joseph Stalin so much.

But, unfortunately, it is here that one finds a reality which is going to provide a tough time for Mr Reagan to suit deeds to his words, should he really become president.

First of all, there is the fact that the Soviet Union has attained equality with the United States with respect to nuclear weapons. Then, in the conventional [weapons] area the very thing which former prime minister John Forster predicted on several occasions has happened: The Russians have built up such an advantage that now a great price must be paid for that.

For example, let us take Afganistan--What on earth can President Carter do militarily to get the Russians out of there other than unleash a self-destructive nuclear war? It is simply in irrefutable fact that, as far as conventional forces are concerned, the Soviets have surpassed the West in Europe, Asia and even black Africa (if you do not count in South Africa).

A tremendous effort by the United States will be necessary to get the equilibrium back in its favor. Will Mr Reagan be able to bring the American people up to making these kinds of sacrifices?

And there is still one more question: Will the Western allies work better with him than they have with Mr Carter? We must remember that the simplistic days of American predominance which characterized the decades of the fifties and sixties are gone forever.

ROUTENBACH APPOINTED TO POLITICAL PLANNING IN PM'S OFFICE

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 6 Aug 80 p 9

[Text] Johannesburg -- Prof I. Rautenbach, 37-years old, whose appointment as head of the new branch of political planning in the prime minister's office was announced yesterday, believes that a new constitution must be drafted for South Africa over a period of 4 or 5 years.

Professor Rautenbach, who was former dean of the Faculty of Jurisprudence of the Rand Afrikaans University and a professor in public law, assumed this point of view at the end of last year in a report submitted to the Schlebusch Commission.

The climate for a new final and ideal constitution is not the right one; however, a commitment to put into effect a new constitution over a period of 4 or 5 years should create an atmosphere of detente in which a new constitution could well be stipulated by whites, coloreds and Indians.

Dreyer

Besides the appointment of Dr Routenback it was also announced yesterday that J. P. O. Dreyer, formerly chief planner in the office of the prime minister, has now become chief of economic planning. He succeeds Dr Simon Brand who was appointed chief of fiscal policy.

Professor Rautenbach, who grew up on the family farm near Harrismith in the Free State, is in Heidelberg, West Germany, at the moment doing research on constitutional law with special emphasis on security legislation.

He has an Alexander von Humbolt scholarship and is using his 1-year leave for study (which now has apparently come to an end) and to do research.

Ideal

Professor Rautenbach based his proposal to the Schlebusch Commission, that the government commit itself to the realization of the ideal of a new constitution within 4 or 5 years, on the opinion that the whites, either rightly or wrongly, have misgivings about the responsibility with which colored and Indian groups will be partaking in power sharing.

Coloreds and Indians also have doubts about the honesty of whites whenever meaningful constitutional reforms are discussed. Professor Rautenbach's view was that the groups practicing political policy must either drop their suspicions or prove them. This should create a spirit of detente in which a new constitution can be considered. This could then become a practical workshop.

In the interim arrangement, coloreds and Indians must have legislative authority over their own affairs and also have the say concerning the determination about the extent of power and the manner in which community matters are to be handled.

OPPOSITION ASKED TO GIVE THE PRESIDENTIAL COUNCIL CHANCE

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 6 Aug 80 p 12

[Editorial: "The Presidential Council"]

[Text] In the debate revolving around the Presidential Council, the planned Black Council and the country's constitutional future, too many of the participants are getting boggled in the erroneous thinking that these bodies are an objective in themselves rather than instruments of change as intended by the government.

The Presidential Council is going to consist of 60 members, all distinguished persons from the white, black, colored, Indian and Chinese communities. It appears desirable to have the Black Council consist of mainly urban blacks in view of the fact that considerable progress has already been made in collaborating within a confederal context with respect to the self-governing and already independent national states.

The opposition is making the point that the Presidential Council is doomed to failure, because 70 percent of the country's population is not represented in it.

Naturally the opposition makes no mention of the possible counterargument that this could imply that 70 percent of the Presidential Council must be black (and, therefore, in practical terms such a council could sink before it even begins).

Such lack of frankness might serve their own interests, but certainly not those of the country.

In addition it ought to be borne in mind that national states have reached separate and joint stages of constitutional development in which negotiations in the context of a confederation are actually already underway. An example of this is the recent summit conference between South Africa, Transkei, Bophuthatswana and Venda in which, among other things, an agreement was reached with respect to a development bank. The requirements for a form of fulfillment for the wants of urban blacks can, therefore, become a matter for the Black Council to a certain degree.

Moreover, the expectations for the Presidential Council, in which prominent leaders of the various groups must try to jointly reach a consensus over the course of changes, in no way excludes consultations with the Black Council now being considered.

A place for the black people in a new constitutional order is, therefore, not being left out of consideration, whereas the Presidential Council itself must show through consultations that it can succeed as an instrument of change.

The cardinal question is that, for the sake of a peaceful future, these instruments of change must be given a chance to show their worth.

Apparently it will be just as easy to wreck untested new institutions such as these as it is to break off a bud and getting these institutions to succeed will be just as hard as allowing a bud to bloom.

The question which South Africans must ask themselves is whether they want to help or whether they want to make things difficult; whether they want to take part in a new initiative which demands daring and great effort or whether they want to stand aside in the destructive role of demolishers.

ARMY COMMANDER WARNS OF LONG-TERM STRUGGLE

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 26 Jul 80 p 4

[Text] Pretoria -- South Africa must not make the mistake of assuming that in preparing for a war against it the attack is going to be of the same sort as the one in Rhodesia or Southwest Africa. The country must prepare for a long, stretched out war of "the plow in one hand and the gun in the other."

This was the statement made yesterday at Pelindaba by the chief of the army, Lt Gen Constant Viljoen, as he presented medals to members of the Broederstroom Industrial Commando. The commando is tasked with the protection of the heart of South Africa's nuclear research.

General Viljoen said that in the past the enemy has not hesitated to attack very important installations in the country and the country must be prepared to expect such attacks.

Regional Preparedness

Greater emphasis will have to be given in the future to sabotage and attacks on economically important targets, because such attacks are important for the psychological onslaught against the country.

Similarly the country must prepare itself for attacks on actually any place. The enemy is not in a hurry and is preparing for a long struggle. Weak targets will become important objectives and a system of regional preparedness covering the entire country will have to be pursued.

General Viljoen said the ideal situation would be for the country to have enough soldiers to show their presence everywhere in sufficient numbers, but this would require too many of them and this sort of thing would fit in with the enemy's aim of economic and psychological exhaustion process.

Therefore, the responsibility of protecting regions with part-time soldiers, who will be present everywhere and whose training is aimed at this objective, rests upon authorities such as those in Pelindaba.

Angola

The full-time soldiers of the army will then be able to deploy for action against enemy targets such as was recently the case with the Angola operation, and also for border defense.

This sort of approach, which must be put into action, is one of work and defense such as is the case with the Israeli settlements where the land is being worked with gun in hand while outlook posts are present in the surroundings and women and children are in places protected against attacks.

General Viljoen said that South Africa has no other choice but to extend its field of defense, not only with respect to installations but also with respect to schools and other important places.

TREURNICHT DISCUSSES RUGBY INTEGRATION, NP UNITY

No Rugby Integration

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 1 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Bloemfontein -- Yesterday, here at Bloemfontein, A. P. Treurnicht, Transval's Nationalist Party leader, clearly disassociated himself from the effort to open up rugby to all races at a club level.

In the course of the meeting, arranged by the Nationalist Party Youth Branch of the Free State University, he proceeded to answer a question put to him by saying that he saw a press report to the effect that rugby will become "open" at a club level.

"I do not think this is possible, because in having this sort of thing then you are going to have mixed schools and residential neighborhoods," he stated.

In his earlier speech and in answer to other questions, Dr Treurnicht placed heavy emphasis on the right of communities to have their own institutions. He said that the basic approach is still to practice sport on a community basis; this means that communities will have their own clubs and the like.

If one group plays against the other, that is not integration.

NP Unity, Constructive Criticism

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 1 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Bloemfontein -- There are many people who think they must save the Afrikaner people by starting a new movement, because the Nationalist Party [NP] would otherwise end up on the wrong road, "but I want to tell them that they must give attention to what happened in the forties when one organization was trying to be more nationalist than the other," stated Dr Andries Treurnicht, the minister for tourism, statistics and public works, here in Bloemfontein.

Among the pro-Nationalists there was "a spectacle of divisiveness, humiliation and grief" in the forties when our people quarreled among themselves. Today something like that is happening again.

It is the people's right to criticize, but then they should do so for the improvement of Nationalist Party policy and not for the sake of carrying on one-sided ravings. Today South Africa is asking its people to unite under the banner of the Nationalist Party. Minister Treurnicht said that it is clear that organizing for the purpose of bringing down the government, or to make it succumb to demands, is going on even outside of parliament. "I can cite the MPs who are supporting this."

ECONOMIC PLIGHT OF WALVIS BAY DESCRIBED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 29 Jul 80 p 6

[Excerpt] Keeromstraat 30 Capetown--It would appear that the Walvis Bay fishing industry workers deserve at least as much sympathy, and perhaps actual help as well, as the sheep raisers of some of the dry sections of the interior. This tiny enclave with its strategic significance for South Africa is experiencing hard times.

Dormehl Vosloo, who has held the brand new position of director of Walvis Bay since the beginning of this year, came to greet us in passing and in his usual candid manner answered a few questions about the "the challenge of Walvis."

To begin with it is well to bear in mind that these are hardy people and they do not complain; but they do have problems.

Compared to a sardine and anchovy quota of 1 million tons 4 years ago, they are now working up an average of 150,000 tons. The once superabundant pelagic source has been exhausted and a long period of reestablishment lies ahead.

Only three of the eight fish-processing factories are still running and out of the previous work force of 14,000 workers there are 4,000 left. About 10,000 of them, mostly nonwhites, have had to leave and those who stayed on are leading a survival existence. The great black hostel is empty and its 6,000 beds are unoccupied. The municipality is saddled with an unproductive investment of 11 million rand; the income from water and lighting for the complex had disappeared. Only the timely intervention of South Africa's minister of finance prevented taxation from having to rise by 112 percent last year.

White Fish

When asked why the fishermen do not concentrate on white fish, Vosloo had an answer for this also: To be able to catch and process white fish takes new investments and in today's uncertain political circumstances people think twice.

Nobody would know better than our spokesman. He is always being dispatched to Walvis to help the leaders of the community stimulate the deteriorating economy.

With the collapse of the fishing industry it is business that first comes to feel the pinch, and yet business people from elsewheres in Southwest Africa do not hesitate to invest money in property in Walvis Bay. They must know that this region's future in that respect is at least insured by the fact that it could be of extreme strategic importance if it becomes impossible to reach a compromise over Southwest Africa.

Or is Walvis experiencing problems of relationship as a result of its proximity to the "open" Swakop hardly 40 kilometers away up along the coast?

Rust Problem

No...we would rather talk about tourism. The potential for this in Walvis with its rich and exotic bird life is great. People always wish to include a tour through the peculiar sandy region in their "Southwest vacation."

One last problem: Is Walvis Bay close to resolving its problems with Rusting?

This does not appear to be in the positive.

An automobile which has not been regularly treated will not hold up longer than 1 year. Special antirusting treatment is necessary before building foundations can be poured. The town lies below sea level and is built on sand with a salt content four times as high as sea water.

The only thing that does not get rusty is the inhabitants' love and faithfullness for the far away hold-out place lost in their dreams and lying between the high dunes of the Namib and the surly swells of the Atlantic Ocean where the fishing fleets of other nations keep on scooping deep for white fish without having to recognize the 200 nautical mile limit, because they do not recognize the presence of the white South Afrikaners ashore.

BRIEFS

APPOINTMENT TO PRIME MINISTER'S OFFICE--Johannesburg--The deputy commissioner of auxiliary administrative services of the Department of Jails, Maj Gen Jannie Roux, has been appointed chief of the branch of social planning in the office of the prime minister. The 37-year-old General Roux (who for the past 4 years has been deputy commissioner of auxiliary administrative services in the Department of Jails) will assume his new position in the office of the prime minister the day after tomorrow. On that day, General Roux will be exchanging his uniform and rank for civilian clothing and his title of doctor. He has been connected with the Department of Jails for the past 19 years. General Roux is not saying much about his new position in the office of the prime minister, except to say that he has been transfered from one department to another with a promotion. COFFEE SMUGGLERS SAID ROBBING COUNTRY OF ASSETS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by John Worrall in Nairobi]

[Text]

ONE third of Uganda's lifeblood — coffee — is being drained away by smuggling. Ugandans say it is worse than it was in the days of Idi Amin and has become a sophisticated racket in which international syndicates are involved.

Last year, government experts said, smuggling cost Uganda 50,000 tonnes of coffee out of a crop of 165,000 tonnes. It is ironic that the coffee industry should be suffering this loss just as it is getting on its feet after the mess left behind by Amin.

Ugandans are at their wits end to know how to control the racket. Corruption and theft has got so bad among all ranks of officials, police, army and customs officers that only a major change in deteriorating public morals can redeem the situation.

That, again, is a heritage Amin left to his unhappy country — a creeping decay of moral standards.

But smuggling, like other forms of crime, has to have a buyer and a seller. The buyers are known to be wealth syndicates, with large sums of money available, operating across the Uganda borders in Kenya, Zaire and Rwanda.

In Kenya, the buyers have access to the traditional port of Mombasa, where Uganda's legitimate coffee exports leave Africa for the international markets.

Millions of Kwacha in foreign exchange are being lost to Uganda through coffee smuggling, foreign exchange which the country cannot afford.

There have recently been high level meetings by the ruling military commission to find ways of ending the racket. One problem is that highly placed ministers and officials are involved, using their rank to move the coffee out.

Many consignments leaving the country in road trucks and transporters are found to have official documents issued by the Uganda Coffee Marketing Board.

At the Kenya border, agents are waiting with large sums of money in the much sought after Kenya currency to buy the consignments. Customs officers and police, generally poorly paid and wide open to temptation, shut their eyes to the operations.

The Kenya government is also robbed of large sums in customs dues through the corrupt activities of its own officials.

Sometimes the Uganda police crack down. The manager of the Bugisu Coffee Cooperative Society was arrested after 14 lorries had been loaded with Bugisu arabica coffee destined to be taken through the Malaba border to Mombasa. The consignment had false documentation.

The consignment was to have been mingled at some point with Kenya's own arabica coffee, a practice which has alarmed the Kenya Coffee Board which prides itself on the consistent quality of its coffee when offered on the international markets.

Smuggled

Most of Uganda's smuggled coffee goes out by road. But some is smuggled across Lake Victoria (which is shared by the three East African countries, Kenya Tanzania and Uganda) in fast motor boats, to Sio Port, on the Kenya side.

Lake smuggling went on in Amin's days, and he operated an anti-smuggling unit using fast speedboats heavily armed with modern weapons, and something manned by girl soldiers.

Amin's white lieutenant, "Major" Bob Astles, was at one time in charge of this unit. He is now languishing in a Kampala jail awaiting trial on many charges.

Smuggling coffee is also a little man's activity. Smugglers who have bought coffee from the farmers carry the bags on handcarts, bicycles and donkeys at night along the lonely footpaths leading to the border, where they meet small traders from the Kenya border town, Busia. It is a long border and cannot be adequately patrolled.

Concern has been roused in Kenya by the smugglers' practice of using small boys to carry messages and warnings of the presence of the police. Some have left school to do this job which earns them a few shillings a week.

Some of these children, often as young as nine or ten, were recently brought to court at Busia charged with smuggling or aiding and abetting.

They all pleaded guilty. Some got off with minor fines of between 50 ngwee and K3. Others were acquitted because of their age.

There seems no end to the agonies of Uganda, and this drain away of is main means of livelihood is crippling the economy at a time when every ngwee is needed for rehabilitation.

Kenya is equally concerned, for it is losing substantial sums in customs dues and port charges. There is evidently a smuggling chain through Kenya, which the police are investigating, but so far they have come up against a brick wall.

With coffee prices running at more than K1,500 a tonne, far less than in the boom days of 1977 but good money all the same, some big, well established men are making a great deal of money and can afford to pay for their "protection". — GEMINI.

OFFICIALS URGED TO SPEED UP STEPS TO ELECTION

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 23 Aug 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Polls Plan"]

[Text] Politics in Uganda is heading towards its climax. It has gone deep in the village and now the people are ready to go to the polls. The government is doing everything possible to ensure that the elections take place as scheduled.

While the politicians in the country redouble their efforts in campaigning for their party's success, the government continues to amend all the electoral laws. The NCC has, however, requested the government to table before it all the necessary amendments to the constitution of the Republic of Uganda and the electoral laws by August 27, 1980. All these are being done to ensure free and fair elections.

For any elections to be free and fair, all the laws regulating it must be in order and act as a principle guideline. In our case we need laws that are not controversial but precise. They must take into account the prevailing circumstances. We need the laws that will not leave us with doubts and raise concern.

We hope all the necessary arrangements will be completed soon. Registration will take place in the near future but up to now a number of issues have not been cleared. We are aware of the fact that Uganda has a large number of refugees in the country who are not in the refugee camps. These people are at large and are difficult to identify. Today it is difficult to know who is a Ugandan especially in the city and other urban towns. Graduated tax tickets are not enough to identify a Ugandan. We therefore request for the introduction of national registration cards with photographs. This must be sealed. This is difficult to obtain but if it could be obtained it is bound to produce clear results of the forthcoming elections.

The government announced some weeks ago that by the end of July all aspiring parliamentary candidates in the forthcoming elections will have resigned. This has not yet taken place. It would be better if this decision was implemented soon otherwise it is bound to cause chaos especially if the candidates are allowed to continue up to the end of August.

We therefore call upon those who have been charged with organising the elections to speed up their work.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ELECTIONS CALLED IN QUESTION

Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 18 Aug 80 p 3

[Editorial: "What Constitution?"]

[Text] Currently there appears to be anxiety in some quarters regarding the issue of constitutions'. [as published] On one hand there are people who ask: 'under what constitution are we going to hold the forthcoming elections?' On the other hand there are people who find the anxiety built over the constitutional issue difficult to understand. Most people agree that neither the 1962 constitution nor the 1967 constitution is suited to the present day Uganda. The former is impractible in as much as the institutions it specified (e.g. Mengo Lukiiko,) as having a vital role to play in the election exercise no longer existing. [as published] In fact many people agree that the method of indirectly electing representatives of one area of Uganda to Parliament as being out of step of current thinking.

In the same vein, the 1967 constitution is opposed both on the method it was introduced (having not been agreed to by the nation at large nor adequately debated by the national Parliament) as well as on its concentration of powers in the hands of the president of the country.

What all this boils down to is that Uganda needs a new constitution. Then the question is whether this should be drafted and passed before the elections or after. Democracy demands that the nation's constitution must be agreed upon by the majority of the people constituting the nation. The point is that someone or party must present a draft for the initial debate. This someone or party must be one who enjoys the trust of the people. What better method of identifying such party than through the ballot box? It is our contention that the elections should be held first and a government formed--enjoying the support of the country. It should then be that government to initiate a draft constitution and lead the debate both in the national legislature as well as in the country at large. When a final draft has been ironed out it will only remain to get ascent from the country either through the national legislature or through the system of a referendum.

This then puts additional importance on the forthcoming elections. The country must ensure that it puts a Party into Government which can be entrusted with the duty of drafting a constitution for the country.

It is for this reason that many of us have been agitating for elections as a matter of urgency. Ever since liberation the country has been ruled under nebulous instruments and constitutions. Sometimes it has been the 1967 constitution, at other times it has been the Moshi constitution and at yet other and at yet other times, it has been the 1980 Decree No. 1. [as published] This confusion can only be settled by holding elections and getting the new government to untangle the constitutional mess we find ourselves in.

Perhaps the people interested in this question should stop asking 'under what constitution are we going into the next election?. [as published] They should rather ask the political party leaders what form of constitution they hope recommend to the people when they get into government. [as published] What appears to be agreed is that there is no constitution at the moment suitable to Uganda of the 1980. We should start hearing more about what each party envisages as the foundations of a Uganda Constitution of 1980 after the dictatorships of both Dr. Milton Obote and his creation Dr. Idi Amin Dada. PARTIES SUBMIT CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 22 Aug 80 pp 1, 12

[Text] AMIDST the mounting public concern over whether the promised general elections can be held by September 30th, Weekly Topic has learned that the inter-party Legal Affairs Committee has already submitted its recommendations for amendments in the constitution. And it is understood that the Committee now hopes to complete the second part of its report, on the National Assembly Elections Act, within one week.

The Committee, set up in June after a meeting between the Military Commission and representatives of all four political parties, has been meeting since July 1st as an advisory body on legal affairs concerning the forthcoming elections.

Its recommendations will go to the four parties and to the ruling Military Commission before they are ultimately tabled for debate in the NCC.

No details of the recommendations drawn up so far were available. But reliable sources have disclosed to Weekly Topic that they include constitutional aspects like lowering the age for voters and that for parliamentary candidates from 21 to 18 years. The qualifying age for presidential candidates remains 35.

Well placed sources say the major bone of contention within the committee now is whether Uganda should have direct presidential elections as one political party wants it to be; or if the country's president should automatically be the leader of the party controlling the majority of seats in parliament. "But this is a purely political decision and I hope a political settlement will be found to solve it", one source said, hinting that the matter might be put before the leaders of the political parties when they meet next with the Military Commission.

The inter-party committee is formed by lawyers from all four political parties. And observers hope that, barring unforeseen bottle-necks, the committee will complete its work within the "next ten days".

One significant observation made by observers over the slow progress in the work of the committee has been that the committee members have, in several instances, been forced from earlier decisions reached unanimously by the committee.

They cite the agreement reached by concensus with the Committee to recommend a single ballot box for all parties to prevent ballot rigging. According to these sources, one political party got second thoughts over the idea, went back on its committment, and started demanding separate ballot boxes for each party "although they knew that this would be four times as expensive and would put the work of the Committee back to square one".

LABOR MINISTER: PARASTATAL, PRIVATE PAY RAISES SOON

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 19 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Article by Asuman Nakendo]

[Excerpt] WORKERS of parastatal organisations and private firms are to get salary increases soon.

This was announced in Busoga at the weekend by the minister of labour, Dr Luwuliza-Kirunda.

Addressing the Uganda People's Congress (UPC) rallies in Jinja and Busembatia towns, Kirunda said:

"Already, the government has regraded jobs in the civil service and given an interim award. In the same manner, we are working out a scheme for private companies and parastatal bodies.

"The increases are to be announced in two weeks time."

Kirunda told the workers and peasants; "We pledge our loyalty to you. This country's economy is sustained by your sweat and you deserve national respect for that."

"But I am surprised most of our friends in the DP (Democratic Party) do not want to accept and recognise your importance." He further charged that the president general of the DP, Dr P.K Semogerere had turned down an appointment as minister of labour on the pretext that it was an inferior ministry.

"How then can such a man lead the people if he despises the workers and peasants?" he asked.

Kirunda the UPC national organising chairman, assured the workers: "Once our party is voted into power we shall immediately rejuvenate the factories and create more jobs."

He said claims that the UPC wanted to introduce forced labour through the national service, were based on misconception. "This was intended for the good of the youths. We wanted them to acquire skills such as carpentry and shoe-making so that they could become job-makers rather than job-seekers.

"We could not have had 'bayaye' if the national service had been effected, nor could Idi Amin cling to power so long if all the youths had had military training."

TRADERS URGED TO CUT PRICES OF FOOD TO IMPROVE CURRENCY

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 19 Aug 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Cut Prices"]

[Text] Ousted dictator Idi Amin's contribution to traders who never dreamt of becoming businessmen is immense but the destruction to the consumers and the commonman is great. Exploitation of man by man and survival of the fittest are the current theme of trade in Uganda today. Trade competition therefore, died in Uganda by 1972 and today it has left a commonman helpless at the mercy of unscrupulous traders both in the market places and shops as he has no other trader with fair price.

The normal fixing of prices in the market according to economists is determined by the law of demand and supply of a particular commodity. But to that there are other factors that do affect the law. The state has the power of affecting prices of commodity by fixing the prices of the goods to be put on sale. This would mean, for it to succeed, the state has to act to curb the malpractice of trade being exercised by the traders in the country by setting up standard prices of commodities.

Prices of commodities in Uganda have gone out of hand and are taking their own course thus rendering it difficult for a greater percentage of the population to acquire basic commodities. One kilogram of posho in some places costs well above 60/-, one kilo of meat in certain areas costs well over 90/-, a bunch of matooke costs over 250/- just to mention a few. These prices are abnormal and they tend to lower the value of our currency. One wonders what the aim of the businessmen is. This is a broad day-light robbery being committed by indigenous Ugandans.

Following the recent declaration by the Military Commission that Ugandans especially of European and Asian origins should return and repossess their property and claim those they have lost, a number of Ugandan traders have raised their eyebrows in protest against this decision.

But it must be understood that this decision if implemented and succeeds, the consumers in this country are bound to get relieved and saved from the hands of the so-called indigenous businessmen who want to get rich over night. The greater majority of our population is aware of the contribution of traders in nation building. The same traders can destroy a nation. It is being seen in Uganda today.

It is commendable that the Military Commission has called upon these Ugandans whose property was misappropriated by Amin's regime to claim them back. Most of these people are traders who were managing the trade atmosphere in Uganda and were rendering their services to the commonman. It is known that before the declaration of the so-called, Amin's economic war in 1972, we had traders who could sell bread to a common man at a price he can afford even if it was a luxury food to him.

The situation today needs to be cleared by the government. If this is done the value of our currency is bound to gain value.

FAMINE IN KARAMOJA COULD BE WORSE NEXT YEAR

[Article reprinted from AFRICA MAGAZINE No 108, August 1980]

[Text] The returning medical survey group described seeing emaciated people struggling along the roads even before reaching Namalu in the Karamoja region of Uganda. At the nearby mission, over a hundred starving people were waiting in hope of getting some food, among them severely marasmic infants, grossly emaciated four to seven-year old teenagers so weak from hunger that they could hardly stand and adults all showing signs of severe malnutrition. It appeared that in this area most children under four years old might already have died.

Deeper into the Karamoja area things were even worse. The journey from Namala to Amudat was punctuated by passing abandoned buildings ghost villages and empty health centres and schools.

In Moroto the starving were wandering listlessly in search of food. A food distribution point was surrounded by women waiting patiently in their manyatta growings. Unfortunately, there was not much to distribute. Most of the rations given out were eaten on the spot for fear of their being stolen.

The reception centre for children had about 100 severely marasmic three to nine year olds. It was difficult to tell the ages of the children their skin wrinkled and growth stunned. [as published] Some were dehydrated others going blind. Some were quietly dying.

The small children mostly orphans slept evidently on the cold cement floor of the building outside where a woman had just died in a pool of watery diarrhoea. As elsewhere in the Karamoja these people would require emergency medical help before they could begin really benefiting from incoming food aid.

UNICEF (United Nations Children's Fund) sources report that the relief situation has begun to improve in the past week or two but progress is gradual. In cooperation with Save the Children, Caritas of Switzerland, and others, UNICEF has just set up the first of 7-10 nutrition rehabilitation centres.

Volunteer final-year medical students from the UK, provided by Save the Children, have already arrived at the first of these centres in Moroto. Lutheran World Federation has offered 70 tons of specialized foods for treatment of severe child malnutrition.

The UK has offered 20 tons of 'clinafeed', another specialized high-protein food which will be used for teenagers. The Netherlands is sending 500 tons of high protein biscuits.

An initial six months of medical supplies for the nutrition rehabilitation centres are being rushed from the UNICEF supply centre in Copenhagen in 'kit' form for easy transport. Meanwhile convoys of the World Food Programme (WFP) and CARE are reportedly beginning to penetrate again to Karamoja with emergency food provisions.

Two major problems persist; security and the eagerness of starving mother to abandon children in any place or to anybody better able to feed them. Security has deteriorated since the raiders who have been attacking convoys and stealing cattle by the hundreds of thousands are well-organised and often better armed than the minimal government forces in the area.

However, a high-ranking Ugandan military official has just assessed the security situation and has promised relief groups that new efforts will be made to assure the safety of convoys and nutrition centres.

Relief officials stress that even with the improved international awareness and aid for Karamoja, the crisis is far from over. With people too weak to do planting and most of the cattle gone, next year could be worse. Two years of effective national and international assistance without disruption or political support that, say the optimists, will be the minimum effort required.

SUPPLIES MINISTRY, OTHERS ACCUSED OF CORRUPTION

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 8 Aug 80 pp 7, 9

[Article by Buzigi-Kikonyogo: "These Ministries of Magendo (corruption..."]

[Text] MONSTERS have invaded this beautiful country of ours. These monsters swallow endlessly everything that be. Essential commodities have long disappeared from proper markets. Nobody seems to know exactly where they go. Yet relevant sources reveal that a lot of foreign exchange was allocated to different importers to import urgently required essentials.

Many of such goods do arrive, supplemented by tonnes and tonnes of foods and other edibles donated by friendly countries to assist the people of Uganda, alleviate hunger and mass starvation being experienced as a result of the liberation war and long droughts.

But alas! We also know that goods are being smuggled out of the country as they come in. It is against this background that the logic underlying the creation of the Ministry of State for Supplies should be reviewed.

WHOLE SET-UP WRONG

Hungry and starving Ugandans greeted the new Ministry as parents would when a new baby appears in the family. It was with hope that there would be equitable distribution of commodities to all traders and that the commodities would appear on the open market and at reasonable prices. But months of fruitless waiting for commodities have proved them wrong, in any case, it was a jump from the frying pan right into the fires.

No commodities have reached them and the little they can see is sold at prices beyond their reach. The whole set-up of this ministry is wrong, some of the people who work there are morally wrong and hence the whole essence of its creation has proved zero, except perhaps to those who established it. But to the ordinary Ugandan, this and some other ministries in this country have long lost their meaning, let alone the purpose for which they were established.

In such a situation there is nothing to stop anyone from recalling those old days of Amin when ministries, corporations and even public offices were created for the sake of satisfying (financially, the appointee and those who appointed). There isnot much difference today.

Commodities handed to the Supplies Ministry for equitable distribution to all traders are instead allocated to wives of "honourables" and to brief-case business-operators. Hence the price hikes as genuine traders have to buy from third parties in the effort to survive.

Whoever thought of the idea of creating a separate ministry of supplies "as a solution to poor distribution of goods", must be told in black and white that the so-called ministry is just a "Feeders Club", catering only for its well-to-do members. To the rest of Ugandans and who comprise of the thirteen million or so, the ministry exists only in name.

It is the same Central Allocation Committee — the famous state organ that has caused unaccountable miseries to poor Ugandans by swallowing endlessly all that appeared in the depots of Food and Beverages — that was upgraded to a ministrial status. The same "gentlemen" who served under it are the same people in the new ministry.

FALSE ALLOCATIONS

The fact that top government officials participate actively in magendo is no longer a secret. It is these "honourables" in collaboration with officials of relevant ministries who have maintained the wheel of magendo in motion. Information is avaiable to the effect that besides authoritative chits to wives, girlfriends and brief-case business operators, another dubious method of "false allocation" is in operation in the new ministry of supplies.

Non-existent schools, organisations and Consumer Co-operative Societies have, for some time now, been on supply lists for various essential commodities. This "magendo network" interweaves some other ministries such as Education and Co-operatives. But all roads lead to the Rehabilitation and Supplies Ministries.

Quite a number of commodities that have been officially allocated by the Supply, ministry, have been to dubious organisations, schools and individuals. Some of these commodities have been intercepted by officials of UNLF, Kampala Branch while on their way to Kikuubo or elsewhere. In most cases all the goods such as Ugil shirts for school uniforms, baking flour, sugar, salt, toilet papers, cooking oil etc that are intercepted are found to have been obtained on false documents. The remarkable work of the Kampala UNLF branch in combating these economic evils reminds one of the effectiveness of the Ten-Home Cell and vigilante units which the Front had set up to, among other things, fight smuggling and magendo. Such units have all disappeared now. Thus a steady worsening of the economic situation.

Many a time the school does not exist or the allocation is given to a wrong headteacher. Although the Ministry of Education is suppoesd to compile a list of all the existing schools and submit it to the Ministry of State for Supplies, many allocations are going into wrong hands. Some of the schools on the list are non-existent and this is the work of some officials in the Education Ministry in collaboration with some crooks in the Ministry of Supplies.

Surprisingly when such people are caught, except for confiscating the goods and even refunding the culprit with the total official cost price of the goods, nothing much is done although the false documents are found to bear the correct signatures of the officers where the goods are allocated.

The only conclusion that can be drawn from such an act of reluctancy to punish the culprits is that all those who should have done it belong to the same

"Feeders Club". All roads lead to somebody BIG. Would it not be a very interesting case if a thief punished a fellow thief? Nevertheless the rich are getting richer while the poor poorer.

FREE RELIEF AID SOLD

One interesting, but shameful aspect of it all is the fact that relief aid commodities that are donated by friendly countries and organisations to needy Ugandans and to be given free of charge, are being allocated to individuals in great quantities and put on sale!

Hunger and mass starvation have invaded parts of this country, particularly because of long droughts climaxed by the liberation war. Yet surprisingly some greedy and selfish Ugandans divert this relief aid to magendo!

Millions of Ugandans have not tasted the fruits of liberation. Latest reports from the most hunger-stricken areas of north-eastern Uganda reveal that the death rate has risen to seven hundred a day and is still rising. Selfish as we have proved to be, several SOS that we sent across the seas for assistance have proved useless as most of the aid so given is diverted from the original purpose for which it is given. SHAME!

The gloomy picture we so paint for the international community to see and hence assist us shows clearly that all is not well in t his country. But we forget to diplomatically inform them that the situation facing us now is of our own making. What logic is there to allocate one hundred bags of baking flour or 500 tins of cooking oil to a wife of a "honourable" for her to sell on magendo in Kampala while 700 Karamojong are dying everyday because of lack of food?

Yet such goods are clearly marked NOT FOR SALE! What logic is there to allocate ten 100 kilogramme bags of sugar to a person who owns neither shop nor trading licence? Or what sort of common sense does some Ugandans have to allocate 100 bags of baking flour to a Mrs "Honourable" so and so who was never allocated a shop or bakery since the family came back from exile? Africans have extended families, but the bitter truth is no family can consume all that chapati or cake, even for a year!

Every thing in this country seems to be going wrong and those entrusted with responsibility don't care a damn. The once rich and prosperous country — "The Pearl of Africa" has been reduced to a begging nation.

Ugandans are sickened with such ministries that are purported ly created to serve their cause, but instead become instruments of enrichment for the few. The government would have done a better service to starving Ugandans if, instead of creating such ministries, bothered to police our borders so that goods imported in the country do not find their way back to Kenya or to Rwanda and Zaire.

The Ministry of Commerce would only know what arrives in the country and by what importer, fix the prices and let that importer sell freely to all retail traders. As long as the borders are policed the importer will sell here. And in the long run, prices will stabilise. But this system of issuing chits to non-business people and allocation to selected traders by the Supply Ministry only enhances magendo. STOP SMUGGLING AND LET THE MARKET FORCES TAKE THEIR TURN!

GOVERNMENT SAID UNABLE TO PROTECT AID ORGANIZATIONS

Paris LE MONDE in French 8 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by Isabelle Vichniac: "Famine In Karamoja; The Government is Unable to Insure the Protection of Representatives of Aid Organizations"]

[Text] Geneva. United Nations circles in Geneva confirm the decision of the resident of the United Nations development program in Kampala to interrupt aid operations in Karamoja Province where, let us recall, a convoy of the United Nations Refugee Commission was attacked on 25 July.

Considering the prevailing insecurity on Ugandan territory, the commission was forced to interrupt its activities in the country despite the considerable number of "displaced persons" (refugees in their own country) who are receiving United Nations aid (LE MONDE, 3-4 August). It has been intimated at the Palace of Nations that this interruption may be for an "indeterminate period." The fact is that all humanitarian organizations want to insure the protection of their representatives in the area, a protection which the Ugandan government is unable to provide.

Adequate Logistic Means

Nevertheless, it appears that the Red Cross will continue its traditional aid activities to the extent to which it is possible. Back from Karamoja, Jean-Michel Goudstikker, in charge of Red Cross information, stated the following:

"The famine afflicting this province cannot be considered as a disaster exclusively caused by natural calamities such as drought. Naturally, the drought is causing considerable harm. However, we could no longer ignore the phenomenon of self-destruction in Karamoja. Thus, the biggest cattle rustlers are the Karamajongs themselves. At the present time they have progressed from the amateur to the organized stage. Previously, they rustled cattle in small numbers, moving from one village to another, without the stolen cattle leaving the area. Following the looting of an armory in Moroto, the biggest settlement in Karamoja, the looters have conducted operations on a grand scale: the loot consists of several thousand head of cattle per raid, followed by the destruction of the attacked village and the massacre of its defenders, including women and children. Famine has developed since cattle is the only food resource of men and adolescents who eat only the blood and the milk of the bovine stock. Women and children consume vegetal food. However, virtually nothing has been planted in the rural areas where insecurity and fear reign. Furthermore, the areas in crops have been ravaged by the violent short rains in May, preceding the current period of intensified drought.

"It is unquestionable, however, to any person or organization that the resumption of aid distribution is an absolute necessity. Every day spent without food results in innumerable deaths, whereas until 25 July the activities of all aid organizations provided the hope that famine could be substantially reduced."

According to information reaching Geneva the local logistic facilities are adequate to channel such aid. There is also sufficient food to insure the survival of the Karamoja population for a month. Yet, the chronic insecurity could discourage the initiatives of humanitarian institutions.

PROBLEMS OF FREIGHT BOTTLENECK IN MOMBASA OUTLINED

Kampala WEEKLY TOPIC in English 8 Aug 80 pp 6, 7

[Article by John Joseph Lule: "The Price of Being Land-Locked"]

[Text] Uganda's transport headache about her imports and exports seems to be getting acute while at the same time the colossal sums of money needed for the clearing and forwarding of Uganda's cargo which is now lying at the Kenyan port of Mombasa is putting the country's financial potential on extra strains.

The piles of Uganda cargo at Mombasa, have raised so much concern, that the government is considering a reduction in the importation of general cargo from abroad until such a time when most of our goods now lying at Mombasa can be cleared and forwarded to the appropriate destinations within the country.

Good-will on the part of Kenya authorities and clearing and forwarding firms, could go a long way to the improvement of the already strained economy of the country, and to the streamlining of operational facilities between Kenya and Uganda.

GOODWILL LACKING

It is unfortunate, at the moment, to say that this good will is lacking in certain quarters, that even up to now charges for the services rendered on Uganda's goods are normally decided upon by the Kenyan authorities alone with little say or none at all by their Ugandan counterparts — the price of being land-locked!

It was solely because of this, that the new Transport Minister, Mr. Kintu Musoke recently flew to Kenya to have an on-the-spot assessment of the problem and familiarising himself with the various relevant institutions in Kenya which have direct business connections with his Ministry.

The Transport Minister is understood to have done a thorough job, delving into the whole clearing and forwarding field during his stay both in Nairobi and Mombasa.

Although tentative talks were held between him and Kenyan officials it cannot be claimed that positive conclusions leading to better handling and transporting procedures were adopted. Definitely there was willingness on part of the Kenyans to meet and discuss matters with him but there was lack of enthusiasm and commitment on the issue by most of them.

For instance when the long standing questions of giving Uganda credit facilities at the port or waiving certain port charges were raised, the Kenyan officials could only make a promise to the Uganda Minister. They only said that they would provide favourable recommendation to their government as regards the subject.

The same was the case with similar discussions with the Kenya rail officials, when the Minister asked for their assistance in the exercise of conveying from the port to Uganda. goods which were most urgently required for the country's rehabilitation efforts. The Kenyans said they could only help in the matter if both countries first tried to get the spare parts and other components from the suppliers for Kenyan locomotives, 9 of which were in bad shape.

But in the case of Kenya-railway's attitude, one could easily see the reason for their complacency in the matter. While railways services between the two countries were said by V. Hoyer as being rudimentary in his report on Transocean, he also said that there is a lot of "bad feeling" arising from the unresolved question of distribution of the joint property of the former East African Community. Kenya kept the lion's share of the assets when the Community broke up.

Mr. V. Hoyer is an ILO Chief Technical Adviser, now working with the Ministry of Transport. He said in his report which he compiled for the Ministry of Transport and the ILO office in Geneva, that, until now no Kenyan railway wagon crosses the border to Uganda, and Uganda railways wagons can hardly be used freely for transportation of Uganda goods to and from Mombasa, as within Kenya the same charges have to be paid to Kenya railways as if they were using one of their wagons, and that Kenya railways are reluctant to allocate additional wagons (from the joint property) to transport Ugandan goods.

Mr. Hoyer's report continues to state that the main transportation has to be done by road, whereby Transocean (Uganda) Limited, having been once one of the biggest haulage companies, plays now only a very minor role with regard to transit transportation of Uganda goods due to loss of a large number of vehicles during the war. Presently only about 20 vehicles are plying the Mombasa-Kampala route thus leaving the major portion of the road transport business to private Kenya-based haulage companies, for which the foreign exchange has to be made available by the Bank of Uganda.

MINCED NO WORDS

Mr. Hoyer's report couldn't therefore have come at a better time than now. Although it solely dealt with Transocean (Uganda) Limited and problems associated with Kenya-Uganda transport, it generally appraised Uganda's transport problem as regards her imports and exports as well. He made certain recommendations which, if adopted, could go a long way in improving the clearing and forwarding sector of Uganda's economy.

Before Mr. Kintu Musoke left Kenya for home, he is understood to have held talks with clearing agents in Mombasa. He minced no words. He told them point blank that reciprocation was expected of them since, as he said, most of them had been given large sums of money to clear Uganda goods in advance.

To those companies which were sulking because of the money Uganda owed them, the Minister said that the temporary financial difficulties experienced at the moment, should not discourage them, as the situation was bound to improve as the coffee season starts to pick up.

Most clearing agents, however complained of the delay of documentation from the suppliers and importers and complained of delays in payment from the Bank of Uganda. They demanded improvement in documentation handling prior to dispatch from Uganda to Mombasa.

But one other thing the clearing agents forgot to tell the Minister was the reason as to why they charge 1.5% c.i.f. value on our goods, whereas only 0.5% is officially charged by the Kenya Officials. This shows that some of these clearing firms have also been playing tricks on the unknowing Ugandan Importer, which have resulted in the country losing millions of shillings of the vital foreign exchange. These clearing and forwarding firms which are entrusted with the clearing of Uganda goods should live up to their expected standards, true they are profit making companies but this should be no reason for them to cheat.

Maybe our licensing process is not all that good, and we may have to adopt the advice given by Mr. Hoyer, who recommended a revision in the import licensing of goods. He considered Rwanda's system as being a lot better than Uganda's

RWANDA'S SYSTEM BETTER

He said that while issuing an import licence in Rwanda, Clearing and Forwarding agents must be named in advance and a proforma invoice by the agents for all charges and commissions has to be presented. Then the required foreign exchange is allocated to the clearing and forwarding agent well in advance, and all documents needed for clearing (Original Bill of Lading, Invoice of the goods or certificate of Value. Original Marine Insurance Certificate, if any) are also sent straight to the clearing and forwarding agent, thus allowing him to go at once through the whole clearing procedures before the goods have even arrived in the port. Consequently, on arrival, the goods can immediately be taken out of the port and transported to their final destination without delay. In this way the amount of foreign exchange transferred to the clearing and forwarding agent does not therefore, include any provisions for demurrage charges or customs warehouse rent.

The benefits of this arrangement as expounded by Mr. Hoyer cannot be over emphasised, and this can go a long way in curing our transport headache which does not seem to abate.

'THE ECONOMY' BACK IN PUBLICATION AFTER LONG ABSENCE

Kampala THE ECONOMY in English Vol 1 No 36, Aug 80 p 1

[Letter "From the Editorial Board"]

[Text] Dear Friends,

We address you as friends because those who read THE ECONOMY are more than readers--YOU ARE OUR FRIENDS. It is now over three months that you've been unable to hear from us, and unfortunately circumstances did not permit us to let you know of our abrupt suspension of publishing your Household newspaper. We sincerely apologise for this but as friends you must forgive us.

Those who witnessed the birth of THE ECONOMY will vividly recall our first Editorial in which we knew quite in advance that "we had entered the turbulent world of journalism.' [as published] The risks are high but even the stakes are so! We met what professionally are known as 'occupational hazards.'

We take this special opportunity to thank the Chairman and constituent members of the Military Commission for their positive spirit and magnanimity exercised in a critical situation as it was. Indeed, we are even more grateful that the current Government Administration has continued to expand the latitudes of the FREE PRESS.

We resume the publication of THE ECONOMY in the middle of a severe political campaign. It will require us some time to catch up with the issues as are expounded upon by the four political leaders namely Dr. Milton Obote, ex-President of Uganda and leader of UPC; Mr. Paul Semwogerere, President General of the Democracic Party, Mr. Yoweri Museveni, Interim Chairman of the Uganda Patriotic Movement and Mr. Mayanja-Nkangi Chairman of the Conservative Party. [as published]

The current challenges facing the leaders of these respective political parties are formidable but they are not insurmountable. In this issue we have in absence of official manifestos thrown the economic challenge to our future leaders. The Analysis of our economic problems has not been extensive but has been narrowed down to simple essentials to facilitate an easy political debate.

Now, Gentlemen who has the key to the economic miracle? [as published]

We wish you a good reading!

MINE WORKERS' STRIKE AVERTED, OTHER UNIONS SET TO STRIKE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] Lusaka--The Zambian Government has narrowly averted a major mineworkers' strike but workers in other industries are set to demand higher wages and better working conditions.

Zambia's economy has already suffered from 120 illegal strikes in the past 18 months and President Kaunda has put the unemployment figure at "close to three million".

Now the Civil Servants' Union of Zambia (CSUZ), has declared a dispute with the Government because of the creation of a Government commission of inquiry into the public workers' plight, reports the Herald Africa News Service.

These unionists regard the commission as a threat to free negotiations between workers and management and claim that the commission seeks to preempt union responsibility for its members.

Negotiations between this union and the Government for a new package deal were nearly complete earlier this year when the Government pulled out of talks and appointed the commission.

While these Zambian civil servants express their dissatisfaction, Zambian Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) chairman Mr Frederick Chiluba, an outspoken champion of Zambian labourers, has thrown his support behind the CSUZ calls.

He has also attacked reports that the Government intends to reduce the size of the civil service.

"The truth is that the Government has an obligation to create employment. When it fails, you must fight for social justice," he said.

Now diplomats say that, in spite of successful negotiations with the mine and mineworkers, the country's 340 000 other organised workers are going to start demanding a better living.

ZUOBGO ISSUES WARNING ON ELECTIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Anyone attempting to create chaos and usurp law and order during November's local authority elections was promised harsh treatment by Local Government and Housing Minister, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, in the House of Assembly yesterday.

He was asked during debate on his Ministry's vote by Mr John Nkomo (PF, Matabeleland North) what steps were being taken to ensure that the elections would not be disrupted by violence, as already, he said, there had been a wave of maimings, of murder and kidnappings in clashes between rival political party supporters, reports Iana.

Mr Nkomo told the Minister it was not sufficient to provide housing for people, if they could not live in safety.

REVIEW

Mr Zvoogo replied that the matter was really one for Dr Joshua Nkomo, the Minister of Home Affairs, in his capacity as head of the police force, but he said that both he and Dr Nkomo were on a Cabinet committee on public order that met each week with senior police officers to review "the general public order situation in the country

"It is clearly desirable that these elections are peaceful and that persons who are planning to take advantage of the elections to cause chaos and breaches of law and order should be aware they will be dealt with and dealt with very severely," he said

CHURCHES REACT TO PRESIDENT'S CALL

[Text] Senior clergymen in Zimbabwe, reacting to President Banana's call for a radical transformation of the Church to serve the broad interests of the people, yesterday defended their organisations' record of service to the country.

Opening a clergy revival conference in Salisbury this week, the President stressed the need for a "people's church" that would accommodate indigenous culture and beliefs and take part in the country's reconstruction and development.

Bishop Abel Muzolewa of the United Methodist Church said yesterday he agreed that all Christians had to involve themselves in the development of all people.

Bishop Muzorewa said of his church: "We have identified with the President's role for the Zhurch in Zimbabwe over the past 15 years.

"The Methodist Church had been integrated from top to bottom for many years and had been the first to elect a black bishop.

"Wherever people need and if the Government wants us to work side by side to build on development of the country the Methodist Church will assist," Bishop Muzorewa said.

The Bishop of Mashonaland, the Rev. Paul Burrough, who chaired the opening session of the revival conference, said yesterday: "The President's remarks were well received in a very friendly atmosphere."

Impressed

He denied that President Banana had "waged a bitter attack" on the clergy at the conference.

Bishop Burrough said the Anglican Church had been involved in the affairs of the country since 1890.

"The President was impressed with what we were doing.

"But," he added, "the Church is nothing unless it is first committed to Christ and the gospel, otherwise it will merely be a shadow of the State."

Commenting on President Banana's call for greater Church participation in education and irrigation projects, the Bishop of Matabeleland, the Rt Rev. Robert Mercer, said: "The Church can no more promote irrigation schemes without money than the Government can. If His Excellency would care to provide the money we would be happy to promote them.

INVOLVED

"In the meantime, ecumenical agencies such as Christian Care are actively engaged in work of this kind."

The Dutch Reformed minister in Bulawayo, the Rev. Johan Kriel, said his church was similarly involved in education.

"The suggestion about educational programmes is what we have been doing in this country all along. Apart from that, I cannot comment."

A spokesman for the Roman Catholic Church in Zimbabwe said yesterday: "The President's remarks are most welcome, being those of a fellow Christian, especially in his advocacy of opposition to discrimination and oppression, and of openness to indigenous values.

STRIVES

"The Catholic church, together with other Christian churches, has always endeavoured to put these attitudes into practice.

"The Catholic church strives continuously to adapt itself to serve the people, in every land and in every age.

"This process, although often retarded by the human frailty of Christians, takes place under the guidance of the Holy Spirit of God."

PLAN TO BALANCE BUDGET REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

A MAJOR assault is to be made on the growing Budget deficit, Finance Minister Senator Enos Nkala has announced, hinting that he might even aim for a balanced Budget within three years.

Speaking to financiers at the economic resources conference being held at the University of Zimbabwe, the Minister said: "Revenues, for the first time in five years, are showing a return to growth. I expect the growth to continue. This, together with a wider and I think more equitable spread of taxation, has improved the budgetary position.

"It is my intention and that of the Government to maintain a strict control of expenditure and to ensure that the budget deficit is brought into proper alignment by 1982-83 at the latest."

Enlarging on this, Senator Nkala said that among his objectives he set out to "ensure that subsequent Budget deficits will be contained to more manageable levels by securing a meaningful expansion of the economy, and a strict control of expenditure".

This country has had a deficit every year since 1970, the smallest being $7 million in 1971-72. This year the estimated deficit is $485 million.

The Minister also indicated that balance of payments pressures would intensify, in turn making it difficult for him to cut down on the Budget deficit.

He dwelt on invisibles becoming larger every year. Last year there was net deficit of $205 million on these with services, principally foreign travel and freight/insurance making up the largest part.

It is to exports that the Minister is looking to improve the balance of payments which, on capital and current account, showed a deficit of $700 000 compared with a supply of $89 million last year. Exports are expected to grow by 40 percent this year, but imports will rise by 55 percent.

One target of the expected pruning in expenditure will undoubtedly be vote appropriations to Ministries. It is thought a clamp down could be made on the level of salary rises for civil servants.

Government salaries are estimated to be $346 million for the year to June 30 next year.

Senator Nkala also repeated his policy of severe restrictions on currency allocations for luxuries. However, he said industrialists must be given the chance to capitalise so as to be able to catch up with the rest of the world.

For the first time he put a timescale on ending the import control system, with a minimum of five years needed "before the entire system of import controls, per se, can be dismantled".

Exchange control will be kept for even longer, with blocked funds being the main inhibiting factor. The Minister said that nonetheless great strides had been made in easing the restrictions.

MINING INDUSTRY DEVELOPMENTS, OUTLOOK REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 pp 3-12

[Selected articles from a "Mining Survey"]

[Excerpt] Buying Boom in Industrials and Minings

SHARE investors have become almost dizzy in the past 12 days as the mining and and industrial indices have risen extremely strongly.

The industrial index pushed through the 400 barrier for the first time but in the last week has reached the hitherto undreamt of 420 level. Mining has likewise reacted strongly but not as steeply, with a three percent gain against five percent for industrials.

The resurgence of buying is put down to two factors — the tremendous amount of liquidity and, as usual, the absence of other avenues of investment.

Of course, behind this lies market confidence. It seems as though the repeated assurances by the Government on no nationalisation have been heeded. From the hundreds of private interviews and public statements it has become clear that there is no sinister motive behind the Government's financial policies.

Indeed the Budget, preceded as it was by gloom and dire warnings, gave the lie to that. Since the message by the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, that Zimbabwe was looking to equity participation and not takeover, investors have reacted first with glimmerings of hope and then with the realisation that he was sincere.

The message was repeated in a different form this week when the Minister told delegates to the international economic resources conference that they should have confidence in the economy.

As regards the slightly more muted reaction from the mining sector, a certain logic is apparent. The uncertain fluctuations in gold price and commodity prices have made it risky for investors to start switching.

Then too there are the obvious high dividends which mining shares continue to enjoy. So investors hang on to what they have and there is a resultant shortage of scrip — the index cannot rise that much anyway.

[By Martin Rushmere: "$1000 Million by 1990 Is the Target "]

A HUGE capital development programme is necessary for the mining industry if it is to achieve its $1 000 million target by 1990. This is one of the two biggest problems facing the country's brightest economic jewel.

The other problem is the long standing shortage of skilled labour, but there are positive signs that companies are putting more effort into training people from Zimbabwe rather than relying on foreign recruitment.

Capital equipment is a problem more easily solved in the short term but one with a more doubtful commitment by entrepreneurs.

They will pour in the extra cash only if convinced they will get greater rate of return from the capital employed.

At present they are doing well with the outdated but still useful plant they have, mainly because of good commodity prices.

There is no doubt that to keep costs down in the long run capital replacement is a must. If the mines wait too long there is a danger of falling returns, because of costs catching up with profits making it financially difficult to get new equipment.

Prices of machinery are rising all the time, too, and it is better to re-equip now than wait.

Against this is the need to provide as much employment as possible.

As the second biggest employer after agriculture, mining is a source of bread and butter to hundreds of thousands of people.

Modern equipment is basically labour saving and more efficient machines are built every year, so people could be put out of jobs by mechanisation.

Some compromise has to be reached.

An idea of how much it costs for capital projects is the newest "pride" of the industry — Shabanie's $100 million asbestos mill opened by the Minister of Mines and Energy Resources recently.

The future is as much in the hands of the Government, represented by as it is determined by economic and technical factors.

The Government has clearly realised that much of our foreign currency lies in effect below the ground and is keen to develop mining.

Positive assurances have been made that there will be no State takeover of mines, although there will probably be involvement of some sort.

Against this background investors are in turn heartened and should be willing to increase their stake in the country.

This would go towards not only the existing minerals such as copper, asbestos, gold and chrome, but in development of new ones.

Prime targets would be platinum, now known to exist in large quantities, and uranium.

The latter has an uncertain future as no extensive exploration has been made.

But it is thought there is some in the north-west of the country, a spill-over of a supposedly rich deposit in Zambia.

There is also coal. This could become the biggest money spinner in the country. Wankie is but a small part of the national reserves and equally extensive deposits are waiting to be tapped in the south-east.

World consumption of coal is rising, particularly in Japan. And South Africa has been quick to cash in on this.

It is exporting through Richard's Bay and predictions are it will eventually overtake gold when the metal's output declines towards the end of the century.

Happily, exploration in this country is reviving. Dozens of exclusive prospecting orders are in the pipeline and several have been granted.

This momentum must be allowed to continue or the country will suffer but it does not appear as if there is any slackening off.

Coupled with this is technical research, mainly at the Institute of Mining Research at the University of Zimbabwe. This unit has gone from strength to strength, despite severe disruptions.

Fields of research include metallurgy, economic geology, mineralogy and rock mechanics.

Support from all sectors for its work has been good, but now it needs to be better. New facilities are needed and the institute also wants to branch out into new fields so it can keep up with both world trends and the demands of the industry.

Much more money is needed for this and mining houses seeking to increase yearly grants to various organisations could do no better than the institute.

There has been no let up either in commercial based research. Lonrho has pioneered the carbon-in-pulp gold treatment process here which will be of especial benefit to smallworkers (lower capital cost) as well as improving recovery rates.

AECI has opened the country's first industrial explosives plant, outside Que Que. There was a small plant in Rhodesia in the 1930s which closed down when the Second World War broke out.

Both these developments mean the country is keeping abreast of changing technology and also represent a saving in foreign currency.

In the end this is what the future of the country is all about. The more that can be saved and the more than can be brought in ensures our economic development.

Mining is the one sure way of achieving this.

[By Des Parker: "More Trained Men Urgently Needed"]

MINING faces a short-term shortage of trained manpower which the Government hopes to alleviate by the greater use of semi-skilled workers.

The largest and most crucial area of shortage is in the field of trained artisans due to the effects of emigration, security-force call-ups and the limitation on the number which can be facilitated at the technical colleges in Salisbury, and Bulawayo, says the chief executive of the Chamber of Mines, Mr Ken Vanderplank.

There was no lack of volunteers to train as apprentices. "For example, if we wanted 10 men we would probably get 400 applicants", he said.

The mines presently had 500 apprentices at various stages of their four or five year apprenticeships.

"In this respect, the Ministry of Manpower, Planning and Development is helping with its stated intention of boosting the capacity of the technical colleges — there is also a new one under construction in Que Que at the moment," said Mr Vanderplank.

"In the long term we will sort this one out because training facilities are being expanded and even the lack of qualified teaching staff is not insuperable.

"The problem is in the short term because it will be some years before the chaps at present doing apprenticeships are all qualified."

He said the Ministry's solution to this was to "make greater and more intelligent use of the large pool of semi-skilled workers that are about."

Many of these people had received in-job training and were capable of doing more than they were presently permitted to do.

This was "new thinking" from a Government point of view as previously the trade unions had strongly resisted "unqualified people doing qualified jobs".

"While we as an industry wouldn't like to see these limits removed entirely, there is a strong case for these men to be able to do more than they are presently permitted to."

Mr Vanderplank said that for the industry to expand as it was hoped it would with the availability of minerals, the skilled manpower pool would have to be enlarged.

"As things stand, there are not enough skilled people to even maintain the existing rate of production," he said.

Mr Vanderplank said the industry also had a need for degree qualified workers in the fields of engineering, metallurgy, mechanical and electrical engineering and geology.

"As far as the industry is concerned, these people just don't exist.

"There is a world-wide shortage in the field of mining metallurgy," he said. "The job is very well paid, but isn't popular. The trend today is to become an economist."

Most of the major mining groups in Zimbabwe offered university scholarships for engineering courses but most years these were not all taken, said Mr Vanderplank.

However a four-year "sandwich course" in the study of mechanical and electrical engineering was available with the school of mining at the Bulawayo Technical College.

Students qualified for diplomas from the Institute of Electrical Engineers and the Institute of Mining Engineers.

"Learnership contracts" of up to two years were offered for trainee plant operators and miners and between 150 and 200 men qualified in Zimbabwe every year.

If an employee was found to be suitable after completing the learnership course in one of several fields, he could go on to do a two-year middle management course at the Bulawayo mining school.

A six-month learnership scheme registered with the NIC for semi-skilled miners to learn certain aspects of a trade was also available with large mining concerns, Mr Vanderplank said.

All major mining groups within Zimbabwe had training schools where they co-ordinated training at all levels within their organisation, for company sponsored university students down to internally trained men "learning the right way to handle a shovel underground."

The mining industry was having a blitz on training because it believes skilled labour should be found within the country and not imported in the form of expatriates.

"The economic future of the country and of the mining industry lies in training what is available and not relying on bringing people from outside. We should become self-sufficient," said Mr Vanderplank.

"But for speeded-up emigration in recent times, we would be in this position, with the exclusion of engineering degrees which are not available in this country.

"Very few of the people being trained here are immigrants, and all new employees are locally trained. The only problem is that the existing employees have been leaving faster than we are training new ones," he added.

A Booming Start for Explosives Industry

ZIMBABWE'S explosives industry got off to a booming start last month when mining leaders, Government officials and technicians were shown slurry explosives power at the country's first manufacturing plant.

A $1 million slurry plant built at Samwari outside Que Que by AECI is the forerunner of a thriving business in Zimbabwe.

Although new to this country and having some big advantages over gelignite based types, they will probably not take over from them completely.

AECI managing director, Mr Mike White, says production at present is not economic, but will become so as demand for slurries grows.

SAFER

Cheaper than conventional forms, they are also much safer (there are no self-explosive ingredients in them) and they are also extremely water resistant.

However their efficiency is often not as great when used for small diameter blasting holes, and because they are soft can be very difficult to pack into holes which are in broken or hard ground.

Possibly the biggest advance for this country is the total use of local ingredients, largely the ammonium nitrate which comes from Sable Chemicals.

At full capacity Samwari will supply one-third of the country's total explosives requirements — about 150 000 cases a year — and will save $2 million a year in foreign exchange.

Mr White sees the next step, besides widening the range of slurries, as the production of blasting accessories such as caps. This will mean another $1 million investment.

"I cannot see this country making nitro-glycerine types until the market is very much bigger.

"The point about Zimbabwe is that it has a wide range of mining operations (open cast, deep level and many variations within this) but the market itself is not big.

EXPORT

"South Africa has the biggest explosives industry in the world which is supported by the huge market. It has been able to develop its own research and export a tremendous amount because it was big to begin with."

Because there is now a domestic product, reliance on outside sources is not as great and in a crisis, when supplies could be restricted, the country could depend on its own supplies.

At the demonstration of the explosives visitors saw both their power and safety. A high-velocity rifle failed to ignite the slurry when fired from 100 m and when set alight a charge merely burnt and did not explode.

But, as an AECI technician warned: "There is no such thing as a completely safe explosive. Take extreme care all the time."

Small Workers--Backbone of the Industry

THE mining smallworker is an indispensible contributor to the Zimbabwean economy and since the country's independence his industry has been flourishing.

There are about 250 smallworkings employing some 10 000 men in the country and since independence in April more prospecting licences have been taken out and more claims registered than since the last peak interest period before the war.

The chairman of the Mashonaland Mining Association which represents 40 smallworkers — about 90 percent of the small miners in the province — is Mr "Sox" Tselentis, himself a smallworker near Salisbury.

He described the "versatile and necessarily optimistic" smallworkers as the backbone of the Zimbabwean mining industry.

Mr Tselentis said he expected to see more smallworking opening. "There has been a tremendous upsurge in the industry since April."

Of the wide variety of minerals mined, including tin, tantalite, beryl, semi-precious stones, scheelite and wolfram (tungsten), mica, barites, felspar and silica, gold is the most prolifically mined and accounts for the large majority of production.

REFORM

The hugely increased gold price, which now fluctuated around the U.S. $600 an ounce level, was largely responsible for renewed interest in smallworking which had resulted in Mr Tselentis's decision in March 1977 to reform the Mashonaland Mining Association.

"After the price started to climb, interest increased in smallworking and there was a lot of activity in the known gold belts in Mashonaland."

Mr Tselentis said he believed the smallworker was responsible for more than 20 percent of the country's mineral output and Government provided a range of services to assist the miners in recognition of this.

The Government metallurgical laboratories assisted the smallworkers with all reduction and benefication problems, and also provided a free assay service.

"Tremendous support and guidance are given by the Government geologists, surveyors and engineers in the development of our mine.

"The Mining Commissioner and his staff are always ready to help but particularly with regard to legal problems," said Mr Tselentis.

Mr Tselentis would like to see the Ministry get a larger vote.

SMALLEST

"Bearing in mind that the Ministry of Mines and Energy Resources has the smallest vote of all the ministries — $4 004 000 — and the mines contribute about $300 million annually, seems rather unfair," he said.

It cost between $120 000 and $140 000 to bring into operation a smallworking capable of mining and milling 20 tonnes of ore-bearing rock a day.

"However, once you're established, you stand a far better chance than just about anybody of making a fortune, or losing one. That is why the smallworker has to be a born optimist," he said.

Mr Tselentis said the Mashonaland Mining Association which was one of seven similar bodies representing the country's smallworkers, was headed by a committee of three.

Mr Danny Hogan was the vice-chairman and Mrs Tselentis acted as secretary at the association's tri-annual meetings in Salisbury.

MOUTHPIECE

"At these meetings, we have representatives from all sectors of the mining industry, the Ministry and the Chamber of Mines and we act as the mouthpiece for the small man.

"We inform members of developments in our industry and they (the members) bring their problems to us," said Mr Tselentis.

He said Zimbabwe's smallworkers had progressed beyond the "pick and shovel" stage and today's men had highly sophisticated mines.

The majority of the men were blacks trained on the job and like their employers were skilled and versatile.

"They make excellent supervisors — comparable to those on larger mines — and being smallworkers there is no room for specialisation," said Mr Tselentis.

"If these circumstances are maintained, there is no reason why the smallworker should not really come into his own and continue to make a considerable contribution to the wellbeing of the economy and the country as a whole."

Money Talks--Small Ball or Stamp Mill?

THE QUESTION of relative costs is delaying the Ministry of Mine's decision whether to re-introduce stamp batteries or to concentrate on small ball mill production for small workers.

At a meeting of the Mashonaland Mining Association in May, a discussion was held concerning the merits of re-introducing stamp batteries.

The majority of members favoured this type of grinding plant, but the Regional Mining Engineer for Salisbury, Mr P. Garland, felt that the re-introduction of stamp batteries would be a backward step and was in favour of small ball mill production.

"A small ball mill would be far more suitable than a stamp battery," said Mr Garland, "and it would also be cheaper."

Stamp batteries are still in use at various mines throughout the country, but investigations have been carried out into the viability of introducing small ball mill.

Initial estimates for the cost of manufacturing a small ball mill ranged from $10 000 to $12 000 for a 1450 (the weight of the machine in pounds) model, which would be suitable for use on a working mine, to about $8 000 for a 1050 model for prospecting.

The Ministry is, however, considering a prototype, which may be put into the field for $5 000, but experimentation is still under-way.

The mortar-box of a stamp battery, the base of the stamp where the ore is crushed, would cost about $6 000 and the total cost of a stamp battery would be about $15 000 said a Ministry spokesman.

The spokesman added that rising costs had delayed the decision on what type of grinding plant would be most suitable, but it was hoped that an economical ball mill would be in operation shortly.

Zimbabwe's Mineral Mainstay

THAT MOST ALLURING of metals — gold — is and will continue to be a mainstay of Zimbabwe's economy. If the world price of this most valuable of commodities holds firm then it will play an increasingly important role in this country's future financial relations with the rest of the world.

Regardless of boom or recession gold is today proving a more stable form of monetary exchange than paper currencies.

Political or economic upheavals notwithstanding the security of investing in the world's most precious and valuable ore is unshaken.

Hence the need, according to Dr Bob Foster of Zimbabwe's Institute of Mining, for a major re-think on exploration in this country, or a new appraisal on the potential of former mining operations.

Dr Foster reports that until 1963 only 300 of 6 000 registered mines produced more than 10 000 oz of ore.

Of those, 30 were from banded iron deposits (ironstones) and from the total only 50 have shed more than 100 000 oz from aglomerate or vein-carrying rock.

As for the future, while he is optimistic about extraction rates, Dr Foster maintains it is virtually impossible to predict the potential gold output of Zimbabwe because of little information on why established or prospective mines have closed down in the past.

Even so, Zimbabwe is the eighth largest gold producer in the non-communist world and the main source of the ore in the continent outside South Africa which supplied 703,3 tonnes of gold last year out of 962,4 tonnes from the West.

Two kinds of gold bearing rock formations are found in this country — ironstones and felsic tuff, better known as aglomerates.

Firstly, the ironstones — banded iron formations — are basically chemical precipitates formed millions of years ago beneath the sea containing iron sulphides, oxides and carbonates.

These are known to geologists as "greenstones".

As volcanic rocks they are among the oldest to be found here and are a valuable source of gold.

The main mining area stretches from roughly around Gatooma down to Gwelo with another band between north-west of Bulawayo south to Gwanda.

It is this type of rock which Dr Foster maintains should be looked at again.

"We need now to re-interpret banded iron formations which have accounted for 12 percent of gold production to date.

"The problem is that they are low grade deposits, but more accessible. In view of the world price of gold today it should be economically feasible in most cases to mine them."

He maintains that geologists have misidentified these rock formations in the past, thinking them to be non-volcanic, whereas modern research has proved them to be the opposite.

The type of rock, from which 85 percent of Zimbabwe's gold supply is recovered, is in the form of veins formed by cracks in the earth's surface through which water flowed at temperatures of up to 600 C.

As the water rose closer to the surface it cooled and the minerals it carried in solution were precipitated on the sides of the cracks or fractures at between 400 C and 100 C, thus creating what are today quartz gold producing deposits.

So long as recovery continues to be economically feasible in Zimbabwe its value can only enhance the future prospects for this country.

Bright Future for the Industry

ZIMBABWE'S mining industry is poised for an economic boom following the lifting of sanctions. Several foreign and local companies had expressed interest to explore and mine a variety of minerals found in the country.

In an interview, deputy director of the Geological Survey Department, Mr Neil Harrison said there had been a number of requests from foreign companies wanting to know the whole range of existing minerals.

Local mining companies were interested in expanding their activities and increase production. "We have had inquiries from both local and foreign mining companies."

The main minerals found in Zimbabwe were gold, asbestos, nickel, copper, coal, chrome, tin, iron ore, silver and cobalt. Inquiries had been received from the United States, France, Yugoslavia, Romania, Mozambique, West Germany and South Africa.

Mr Harrison said one of the country's giant mining groups, the Anglo American Corporation had applied for a licence to prospect for uranium near Lake Kariba.

More interest had been shown in gold because of its high price on the world market. Mineral value was likely to increase and this would enable lower ore grades to be mined.

"What was uneconomic last year at low price might be economic this year at high price," Mr Harrison said.

If the price of gold slumped, there were other minerals to earn revenue. Gold contributed 25 percent of the country's mineral revenue.

According to Mr Harrison, there were 36 minerals mined in the country by large and small companies as well as individual miners.

Another mineral which had attracted prospectors and local mining firms was tantalite used in metal alloys. It existed in small quantities and was suitable for small mining operations.

Large companies would bring in more revenue to undertake exploration. Any prospecting company would spend money because it took up to five years for a large mine to be fully operational.

Fieldwork, discontinued in 1977 because of the war, would resume next year, said Mr Harrison. The exercise involved mapping out rocks throughout the country.

It defined areas of exploration by mining companies and narrowed their prospecting areas. The geological survey department offered consultancy services to the mining companies.

ECONOMIST WARNS ON PRICES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 13

[Text]

"WE are riding on the se of our pants," said Salisbury agricultural economist, Mr Eddy Cross, when discussing the Government's lack of firm policy on fixed crop prices.

Mr Cross, chief economist for the Agricultural Marketing Authority of Zimbabwe, was addressing overseas, and local, delegates on marketing, national and regional systems and infrastructure, at the international economic resources conference.

He said Zimbabwe had come to independence with a sophisticated and well based economy, that must under no circumstances be impaired.

Mr Cross outlined the policies and methods of the various marketing organisations including the Dairy Marketing Board, the Grain Marketing Board, and the Cotton Marketing Board.

He also said the Cold Storage Commission plays a major role in the marketing affairs of Zimbabwe, and that this year would account for a $160 million turnover.

Tobacco was run as a completely separate unit, because it was so important to the country. Zimbabwe, he said, produced 8 percent of world tobacco, and accounted for 15 percent of the world export figure.

He said the rumour that Zimbabwe was supplying Zambia with cheese and other products and thus depriving local markets was "claptrap".

Mr Cross warned those companies which operated monopolies to "look to your laurels" for no matter how well financed they were, their monopolies would not be secure in the future.

GOVERNMENT RENT CONTROLS WELCOMED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 13

[Excerpt]

THE announcement of Government - controlled rents for lodgers in the former African townships has been welcomed in Salisbury.

The Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, announced this week he was preparing legislation which would make it illegal for anyone to rent a room in the local government areas for more than $10 a month.

He also accused landlords of charging lodgers exorbitant rents at a time when the housing shortage was critical.

The decision was yesterday described by prominent people connected with African housing as "a step in the right direction".

The secretary of St Mary's Area Board in Chitungwiza, Mr Bonny Moyo, said his board welcomed the Minister's stand because exploitation by landlords had been "going on for several years in the townships".

"This caused many people to have no accommodation because they could not afford the rent."

Mr Moyo said there were more than 16 000 unregistered lodgers in St Mary's alone.

"These lodgers are being over-charged by their landlords. The charges range from $12 to $21 a month. And in many cases there are more than two lodgers in one room who are charged an exorbitant rent."

He added it was cruel for African landlords to take advantage of the house shortage in Salisbury and "exploit their own people like this".

He also said the overcrowding was causing disease.

Councillor Norman Henry said the Minister had done the right thing in principle to protect people from being exploited and also to "prevent overcrowding in the townships".

He said there were possibly other ramifications which would affect householders and possibly reduce the availability of lodger accommodation.

"But I endorse the Minister's move as a protection against those people who have been exploiting others."

He appealed to Mr Zvobgo to fully support the city council's housing inspectorate in implementing "this new ruling".

Mr R. Nyenya, president of the Zimbabwe Area Board Association, said he would like more details before he could comment.

"But I must say I am very disappointed that the Minister did not consult us before making his decision."

A Highfield lodger, Mr F Chinyemba, said this was the "most welcome news".

"Landlords have been exploiting lodgers. I have been paying $20 for a Black Hole of Calcutta-like room. This is cruel."

A Seki lodger, Lameck Zulu, said: "I am happy with the Minister's move. We are being exploited terribly."

PURPOSE OF ECONOMICS SYMPOSIA EXPLAINED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 12

[From the letters to the editor]

[Text]

SIR — Two important symposia are being held at the University of Zimbabwe this month.

The first — Zimbabwe, Land of Opportunity — began on Monday and ends tomorrow. It is an economic resources symposium and is being hosted by the Zimbabwe Promotion Council (ZPC).

The other is the economic symposium being hosted by the Zimbabwe Economic Society (ZES). Its theme is Zimbabwe: Economic Development Prospects and Perspectives.

Since the ZES economic symposium Press release published in The Herald, we have received numerous inquiries from your readers and others seeking clarification concerning the nature, purposes and relationship between the two symposia. This significant interest by the public to economic matters is very much appreciated by ZES but a significant amount of the inquiries have indicated some misunderstanding and in some cases confusion about the nature, character and purpose of the two symposia.

INVESTORS

The manner in which the two symposia have been presented to the public and the fact that they are taking place within three days of each other are largely responsible for the misunderstanding and confusion in the minds of the public.

The main purpose of the ZPC symposium is to inform and acquaint potential investors (largely foreign investors) of the economic resources of our country so as to enable them to appreciate the wide range of investment opportunities that this country offers. It is an investment promotion symposium.

The ZES economic symposium is broader and deeper in its coverage. Its main purpose is to analyse, discuss and suggest alternative strategies for economic development in Zimbabwe and its surrounding economic region.

The 40 papers to be presented by local as well as international economic experts will cover not only the major economic sectors of Zimbabwe, but will also cover, among other issues: Economic development strategies; in-industrial democracy, industrial and labour relations; development finance; regional economic co-operation; economic and manpower planning and development; and international economic assistance and development.

MEANINGFUL

An important set of papers will deal with the economic development experiences of, and lessons to be learned from, a number of African countries.

Attendance at the ZES symposium is open to any delegate who is interested in the subjects to be covered and registers to attend the symposium. The bulk of the more than 200 expected delegates will consist of junior and senior officials in commerce, industry, agriculture and government, as well as educationists and members of the academic community.

Because of this wide dispersion of background of the delegates, we have made efforts to ensure that the papers presented at the symposium will be delivered in a manner which ensures meaningful participation and contribution by all delegates.

It is our considered view at ZES that after a thorough briefing on, and a number of organised tours to see, our economic resources, potential investors attending the ZPC symposium may be interested in hearing what economists and delegates to the ZES symposium consider the prospects for economic development in Zimbabwe and its surrounding region are. Because of this, we at ZES decided about three months ago to move our symposium forward to within three days after the ZPC symposium so as to allow ZPC (especially foreign) delegates to attend our symposium.

I hope this helps to clarify any misunderstanding or confusion which may exist in the minds of the public concerning the two symposia. The two symposia are clearly very different and to a degree the ZES complements the ZPC symposium.

T. R. MUZONDO,
President
Zimbabwe Economic Society.

ABATTOIR, GOLD MINE WORKERS STRIKE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

WORKERS at the Cold Storage Commission's Fort Victoria abattoir and at the How gold mine near Bulawayo are on strike.

About 420 CSC employees have stopped work over the dismissal of four of their colleagues. The strike entered its eighth day yesterday.

Meat supplies have not been affected. Asked to comment, a CSC spokesman said extra staff had been engaged.

"Supplies of beef are continuing to be provided to Fort Victoria outlets," said the spokesman.

The strike, he said, resulted from the "legitimate dismissal" of four employees.

Our correspondent reports from Fort Victoria that the CSC's personnel manager, Mr G. P. Clark, and an industrial relations officer, Mr J. Chingwendere, are in the town in a bid to settle the dispute.

It is believed local MPs of ZANU (PF) addressed the strikers on Monday.

The strike-bound How Mine, about 30 km from Bulawayo off the old Essexvale road, has more than 400 workers.

The management of the mine--part of Lonrho Investment Company--would not comment yesterday on the stoppages.

The miners downed tools three days ago, but a committee to present their grievances to the management has not been formed. One striker alleged the workers had stopped because of "the attitude" of some members of the management.

Fears are being expressed by the Cold Storage management that the strike by its Fort Victoria employees could wreck chances of resuming cattle slaughter there on Monday as planned if a solution could not be found by this weekend.

The Bulawayo-based CSC personnel manager, Mr G. P. Clark, and a Ministry of Labour official, Mr J. Chingwendere, yesterday met for the first time representatives of the 427 strikers for seven hours in a bid to resolve the eight-day-old dispute.

Mr Chingwendere said talks were expected to resume today, adding that, with goodwill on both sides, a solution might be found soon.

STRIKES WIPED OUT MONEY SURPLUS

Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE post-election spate of unofficial strikes around the country during April resulted in Zimbabwe's trade surplus of more than $16m in that month disappearing completely to produce the second deficit since monthly records were started in January 1978.

Exports for May were down almost 10 percent at $65.8m while imports rose 15,5 percent to $66.2m, according to the latest Monthly Digest of Statistics.

The mining sector was hardest hit and export revenue dropped $3m with a further loss of $6.8m on sales of iron and steel ingots, bars and rods. Clothing exports were down by an average of 20 percent.

The only bright points were rises in the pharmaceuticals (up 190 percent), rubber tyres which rose sixfold, refined sugar with more than double, coffee sales which tripled and furniture exports, up 68 percent.

The maize shortage was supplemented by the importation of 2 830 tonnes from South Africa, a rise of 55 percent on April.

The biggest share of May's increased import bill, however, went to cars, lorries, accessories and agricultural equipment which accounted for $7.2m of foreign exchange. Petroleum supplies cost an extra 25 percent at $13.1m.

NO MERGER YET SAYS ANGLO

Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

HIPPO Valley's managing director, Mr Brian Bullett, assured shareholders at last Friday's annual meeting that until Barlow Rand decided on taking up 35 percent option in Triangle Sugar Corporation nothing could be done about considering a merger of these two huge sugar companies.

Business Herald disclosed last week that Anglo American Corporation had taken control of Triangle in early August in a R97.6 million swoop on Huletts Corporation in South Africa which itself controlled Triangle and its subsidiaries through a Luxemburg-based company, Baisierres Holding S.A. Anglo also controls Hippo Valley.

In the wake of this report the matter was raised at the meeting by Salisbury stockbroker Mr Bill Burdett-Coutts.

Mr Bullett, according to an Anglo spokesman, also said that the group would have to be convinced there would be benefits in putting Triangle and Hippo Valley under one roof, bearing in mind the amount of capital already employed and the thousands of staff involved.

This week the Secretary for Transport and Power, Mr Peter Lamport-Stokes, announced during his address to the International Economic Resources Conference on Zimbabwe, that a second and larger ethanol plant is to be built at Chisumbanje in the Lowveld.

The first ethanol plant, which cost $5 million, came on stream recently at Triangle.

The second distillery is being planned by the Industrial Development Corporation and when it comes into operation the proportion of ethanol blend in petrol will increase from 15 to 20 percent. Diesel will also contain 15 percent ethanol.

Sources said this week that finance will be provided by private enterprise, directly or indirectly through the IDC.

A suggestion that Anglo American might participate was not ruled out as the company is already an IDC shareholder.

TOURE ON GUINEA-BISSAU-GUINEA BORDER DISPUTE

London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 p 1730

[Excerpts]

The dispute over territorial waters between Guinea-Bissau and Guinea (Conakry) continues. President Sékou Touré has responded to the statement issued by the PAIBC, the joint ruling party of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau, which was critical of Guinea. Bissau, meanwhile, has sent envoys to a number of African countries to explain the problem.

After reminding the Political Bureau of the Central Committee of the Guinean Democratic Party of the role Conakry had played in giving help to liberation movements, President Sékou Touré described the issues at stake in the dispute with Bissau:

"The borders agreed upon by France and Portugal in 1886 constitute the official borders between the former Portuguese Guinea and the former French Guinea. We have been carrying out prospecting for seven years now without ever receiving any protests from our brothers in Bissau. But now that the imperialists know that Guinea's territorial waters conceal oil reserves, they want to use Guinea-Bissau to create problems for us. They are looking for weapons so that they can aim their bayonets at Guinea. We have until now replied with silence, that is why we have never talked about this problem, because there is an international law. Even if we took a bit of territory from Portugal in conformity with our law of 1964, has Guinea-Bissau any right to challenge our law 16 years later, considering that Portugal neither protested nor challenged us? Guinea-Bissau cannot legally do this because it has inherited an established reality.

"Our brothers in Guinea-Bissau inherited from Portugal, and therefore they can take only what Portugal passed on to them at the time of its departure. However, when we became aware that Guinea-Bissau was interested in the same zone, we passed another law bringing our borders back to parallel 10 degrees 40 minutes, although nobody asked us to do this. We thus returned to independent Guinea-Bissau the maritime zone we had taken away from colonialist Portugal. After the adoption of the new law, we sent a letter to the Guinea-Bissau authorities telling them that it was against Portugal that we had acted; Portugal said nothing, so normally you cannot protest, you can only accept what Portugal has passed on to you. However, we do not want our relations to be based solely on law. We are brothers, so we want to stick to the 1886 convention. We have returned to the borders fixed by the convention of May 12, 1886, which will henceforth be the official borders between our two sovereign states.

"They must surely have some anti-Guinean advisers and anti-Guinean powers behind them, unless an anti-Guinean faction has been formed within their leadership, a faction opposed to the African revolution that has been urging our comrades to act against us. We affirm that now more than in the past, the Guinean people and their Party State — always faithful to the African democratic revolution and always determined to defend legitimacy and legality as well as the interests of all peoples in general and of the African peoples in particular — are and will always remain the loyal and sincere allies of the people of Guinea-Bissau and of their national party, the PAIGC."

FRENCH INFLUENCE IN FRANCOPHONE AFRICA ASSESSED

London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 pp 1696, 1697

[Article by Alex Rondos]

[Text]

THERE IS A temptation to shy away from consideration of the franc zone, regarding it as just another finger in that invisible French hand which is said to control the fates of its African clients. The franc zone scarcely enhances the view that economic independence has been achieved in the former French colonies; rather in serving as the best example of "co-operation" between France and Africa, it has managed to perpetuate a state of psychological and economic dependence on the former metropolis from which it is difficult to escape especially as that dependence has been the avenue for the rise of a bourgeoise which was commented on at the end of the first part of this article.

The CFA (Communauté Francaise Africaine) franc is not recognised internationally. By a complex series of arrangements, however, which includes the deposit of reserves (a proportion may now be in dollars, gold or some other currency) at the French Treasury, the CFA franc becomes freely convertible into the French franc at a fixed parity. It has to be stressed that this arrangement makes France only the nominal guarantor of the African currency. The African states have to supply their reserves as the collateral anyway. Secondly, experience has shown that total reserves from the BCEAO, the West African issuing bank, the BEAC, its Central African counterpart, and the Malian Bank, have always managed to cover any deficits. Between 1975 and 1978 it was clear that while the Central African member states and Mali (which is not a member of the West African Monetary Union, UMOA) were in serious trouble, the West African reserves from the BCEAO were still healthy enough, though showing signs of deteriorating, to make up for the other deficits.

Since 1978, and although the most recent figures are not available, there is every reason to believe that the positions between the two main banks have been reversed with the West African economies in serious financial difficulties after a period of inflation and expansion. This year's experiences will only aggravate matters; Senegal has taken out a 60bn. CFA franc loan from France and the World Bank, as a budgetary subsidy. Ivory Coast has its own liquidity problems made worse by a heavy debt service and the unsuccessful policy of withholding cocoa sales which made deep inroads into the BCEAO reserves. The Sahelian states, including Mali, have another drought on their hands. Even Niger is now worried because there has been a sharp decline in uranium prices in the world market. In Central Africa matters are not totally improved with the Central African Republic, Chad, Congo scratching for a living and leaving the BEAC's fortunes depending on the performances of the Cameroonian and Gabonese economies.

The possibilities of France ever having to step in to the breach to support the currencies is remote because of the tough internal regulations of the issuing banks. As soon as drawings from the Central banks pass a certain limit, interest rates rise steeply and credits by the banks are severely restricted. Under the circumstances indigenous concerns are seriously affected because they cannot contemplate such interest rates for borrowing to develop enterprises, which leaves the way open for foreign interests to make the running in investment. In addition, the constraints imposed have tended to encourage short-term bank credits.

At a price therefore, the franc zone member states are their own guarantors. What makes the set-up — which would in many other contexts be considered an excellent instrument for regional integration — a particularly discouraging feature of the international economy, is the position of weakness from which they embarked on the venture — or rather continued it from before independence the nature of the franc zone seems to militate against any real improvement in the conditions of development in the African member states.

Under the franc zone regulations the CFA franc is not recognised as an international currency, though (as has been said) it is convertible into the French franc at a fixed parity. This creates a double constraint on the African members. First, it means that the CFA franc is the prey of fluctuations in the changes in value of the French franc. A French devaluation has profound effects on the trade balance and the balance of payments of the member states. There is evidence to suggest that in the last two years the French have considered monetary policies without adequately consulting the franc zone members. There are two other factors; French devaluations, especially in the early sixties, certainly strengthened the French position in the African countries and also compromised attempts by Francophone African governments to diversify their clientele. Their effects on trade are still limited because France remains by far the most dominant trading partner for all these countries. A French devaluation also influences the balance of payments by increasing the already considerable external debt of developing countries.

Every member state is following a different economic path to development, with different natural resources, but the adherence to the franc zone is so all-embracing that it creates serious difficulties if there is any move to revalue or devalue the CFA franc vis-á-vis the French franc. Togo has tended to favour a revaluation; Senegal has preferred, certainly until the rise in oil prices, a devaluation of the CFA franc, which would create more revenue from the groundnut crop and would make other Senegalese products more competitive on the international market. This severe limitation on the option for monetary policy has had to be compensated by modifications in fiscal policy. Some major changes in this direction were announced by Senegal last year.

The second important aspect of the franc zone is the free transfer of capital, made possible by the existence of the fixed parity. There is therefore no control over the repatriation of capital abroad and this is a basic impediment to any accumulation of capital domestically. It has enhanced the position of foreign capital in the banking system and has naturally left an open path for French capital into the country. In Ivory Coast it is estimated that over $200m. leaves the country annually under this agreement. Given the structure of foreign capital present in all the industrial sectors of Francophone Africa the free transfer has encouraged the investment by multinationals, based in France, through local subsidiaries and this has again stimulated the outflow of capital. In addition, countries like Senegal and Ivory Coast have a very high proportion of foreign technical assistants, especially in education. They, too, are free to export their salaries back to France.

MOZAMBICANS ENTERING SOUTH AFRICA TO FIND JOBS

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

Mozambicans, including ex-Frelimo soldiers, are slipping into South Africa and registering legally for work because of a loophole in the reference-book system.

South African authorities are aware of this but find it extremely difficult to control the influx of young Mozambicans who have work and not terrorism as their objective.

The main influx is through the Gazankulu homeland which shares a border and close tribal ties with Mozambique.

According to farmers in the areas close to the border, the men slip across the boundary in a deserted area at night and make for the nearest farm for food and shelter.

Most farmers, not wanting to employ foreign, unregistered labour, usually turn the infiltrators away.

Some, hard-pressed for labour, take the chance and engage the Mozambicans who are often prepared to work for a lower wage than South Africans.

Once employed, the Mozambican makes friends with other labourers on the farm. He tells them of his desire to settle in South Africa because of the lack of work in Mozambique, and asks for an introduction to the local chief.

If he is able to persuade the chief to accept him, he is given permission to settle in the area which then entitles him to a reference book.

His next step is to visit the local Administration Board offices where he is issued with the book.

Now a "legal" citizen, he applies for a job on the mines of the Reef.

Sometimes these men talk of their Frelimo days with friends on the mines but by and large they prefer to keep quiet about their backgrounds.

SMUGGLING OF KENYAN GOODS TO UGANDA 'GAINING MOMENTUM'

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 4 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] SMUGGLING is gaining momentum again.

Coffee — known as "black gold" in the heyday of smuggling a few years ago — is one of the major commodities involved.

Also in demand are tea and essential commodities such as bread, salt, wheat and rice.

Goods are being taken out of Kenya westwards through Busia and Malaba and northwards through Jawir, Mandera and Moyale.

The Marachi and Sofia sections of Busia have been closed and are patrolled by armed members of the General Service Unit. However, the smugglers continue to operate, even in daylight.

Cartons of essential goods are piled up along the Kenya side of the narrow Sofia Street. At dusk, they are pushed across the road into the Uganda side of the town.

Payments are made on the spot in Kenyan currency. The goods are loaded on Ugandan vehicles and taken away.

All this activity takes place only 200 metres from the Customs office.

Kenyan currency is, not surprisingly, in great demand in Uganda. A flourishing currency racket has therefore sprung up.

A young Kenyan involved in this racket said he gets a "handsome commission". He said the racket flourishes mainly because "those big people from Nairobi" want high prices for their goods.

Sources in Busia said essential commodities are sometimes bartered for kerosene and petroleum products from Uganda. The kerosene comes across in 20-litre jerrycans.

Eight wagons, some of which belong to Uganda Railways, are being held at the Nairobi station yard.

Five of them contain coffee and three have tea allegedly consigned by the Uganda Tea Authority.

Police sources in Nairobi yesterday confirmed that nobody had claimed the impounded commodities.

SWAPO REBELS ABDUCT STUDENT IN LUSAKA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Aug 80 p 1

[Text]

A STUDENT at the United Nations Institute for Namibia in Lusaka was yesterday abducted from the Longacres hostel at gun-point by a group of people believed to be supporters of expelled SWAPO vice-president Mr Misheck Muyongo.

The abduction was confirmed by institute director Mr Hage Geingob, who is a central committee member of SWAPO.

Mr Geingob said the student was picked up by a group of persons led by a former senior SWAPO official expelled from the organisation last month along with seven others including Mr Muyongo.

Mr Geingob said the armed men posed as Zambian police officers.

Lusaka police chief Mr Mwenda Muyunda said he had not received a report on the incident.

Mr Geingob expressed fear about the safety of the abducted student and reiterated the call made by SWAPO chief representative, Mr Ben Boys, that the Ministry of Defence must help in disarming SWAPO dissidents.

He said if the people who picked up the student were impersonating Zambian security officers his life was in danger.

Mr Geingob added that three students were on Wednesday night injured, two of them seriously after fighting broke out between SWAPO cadres and supporters of Mr Muyongo at the hostel.

Police were called in to quell the fracas which was sparked off by the decision of students loyal to Mr Muyongo to boycott the Namibia national day celebrations at the Evelyn Hone College.

The injured students were taken to the University Teaching Hospital for treatment but they have since been discharged.

Meanwhile, students at the institute yesterday boycotted classes in protest against the presence of two of Mr Muyongo's supporters.

They carried placards calling for immediate dismissal of chief security officer, Mr Bartholomew Simata and general services officer, Mr Gideon Matengu.

They resumed classes after Mr Geingob assured them the matter would be dealt with administratively.

Mr Geingob clarified the status of the institute in relation to the political developments in Namibia.

A SWAPO spokesman said full reports had been made to the Zambian Government on the incidents and the organisation had requested assistance in identifying the abductors of the student.

And in another twist to the growing crisis in SWAPO, some of the expelled members of the organisation are reported to have escaped to Botswana in a bid to set up office there and later move on to Namibia.

Expelled member of the central committee Mr Lemmy Matengu has now arrived in Botswana, according to SWAPO intelligence sources.

Mr Muyongo arrived in Lusaka from Botswana on Wednesday night. —Times Reporter/ Zana.

ZAMBIAN SPEAKER COMMENTS ON CPA CONFERENCE, AFRICAN FEARS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 4 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

AFRICAN governments are generally suspicious of opposition parties — hence the trend to impose one party states on the continent, Speaker of the National Assembly, Mr Robinson Nabulyato said in Lusaka yesterday.

But he defended Zambia's parliamentary system and said backbenchers now had more freedom to point out the shortcomings of the Government without fear as would have been the case in a multi-party system.

Mr Nabulyato who had just arrived from a conference of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association (CPA) in Botswana said Zambians had a right to change their leadership through the ballot.

"If the people want younger leaders there is no reason why leaders cannot be voted out through the ballot," he said.

The conference was attended by Nigeria, Botswana, Swaziland, Malawi, Kenya, Mauritius, Lesotho and Tanzania. Delegates discussed in detail the problems affecting parliaments in Africa.

The Zambian delegation included clerk of the National Assembly, Mr Mwelwa Chibesakunda and Kawambwa MP, Mr Titus Mukupo. Zambia relinquished the chairmanship of of CPA southern branch to Botswana, the host country.

"African governments are doing their best to be democracies considering the difficulties which they face and this includes both the multi-party states and the one-party governments," Mr Nabulyato said.

The conference noted that African governments were sensitive to criticism, particularly if such criticism was from opposition parties who were resented and treated with suspicion.

Mr Nabulyato said Zambia's one party participatory democracy had been effective and this had been proved on a number of occasions when MPs' criticism had offended some big shots in the Party hierarchy.

He appealed to backbenchers to continue with their good work in pointing out the wrongs of the Party and its Government because this was why they were elected.

ZIMBABWE RAIL CONGESTION HAMPERS SOUTH AFRICAN TRADE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Aug 80 p 32

[Article by Geoff Shuttleworth]

[Text] Trade between South Africa and its northern neighbours is experiencing fairly severe problems with congestion of rail traffic in Zimbabwe.

Cargo operators said that much of the traffic destined for Malawi and Zaire was affected by this, and road traffic via the Kazangula ferry in Botswana was very active. South African road haulers are however experiencing difficulties because they claim that Zimbabwe-based companies are receiving preferential treatment both at Kazangula ferry and at Beit Bridge.

A railways spokesman said that in rail traffic alone there were 3,535 trucks in Zimbabwe and 1,316 trucks north of the Victoria Falls bridge at August 14. The railways have assisted by lending traction units to Zimbabwe, Zaire and Zambia but said that both Zambia and Zaire were well within the limits of trucks in situ, as determined by the South African Railways.

Zimbabwe has set a quota for Zambia and Zaire on the amounts of goods to be dispatched. According to South African Railways statistics on August 14 there were 6,500 tons of goods being cleared daily from Mafeking and about 5,000 tons at Beit Bridge. The current backlog for Zimbabwe is 27,500 tons, 16,900 tons for Zambia, 6,100 tons for Zaire and 5,000 tons for Botswanna, making a total backlog of around 55,000 tons.

In Mozambique there has been a series of derailments recently and the railways there (CFM) has had to place an embargo on the flow of railtrucks. Those hurt by the embargo have been the north east Transvaal chrome producers, particularly the Barlow Rand and Gencorp mines. Some of the chrome is finding its way to export markets via Richards Bay and there is a backlog of shipments.

Trade sources say that the pressure on Zimbabwe's rail system is unlikely to clear for some time, because of experienced staff shortages, the shortage of traction units, the state of the country's rail links with Mozambique and the increase of traffic since the lifting of sanctions. They said that progress was being made on restoring the Zimbabwean side of the Maputo link and that the Beira/Salisbury was still operating at one train a day in both directions.

SA RESTRICTS RAIL SHIPMENTS THROUGH ZIMBABWE

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] FOR more than a month South African Railways has been restricting the number of its wagons allowed to be loaded with goods for shipment to or through Zimbabwe.

The partial embargo on the use of SAR wagons, combined with a heavy increase of freight traffic through Zimbabwe has created a four- to five-day backlog in loading here, Mr Nigel Lea-Cox, general manager of the NRZ, said in Salisbury last week.

"The situation causes concern, but there have been similar situations in the past and we have always managed to handle them," Mr Lea-Cox said.

The SAR restrictions were being enforced because the winter seasonal peak demand for freight wagons in South Africa was unusually high and had caused an acute shortage of wagons there, he said.

NRZ wagons were therefore being used to a greater degree than usual for loadings to this country from South Africa.

"Up to now there has not been any substantial difficulty in moving traffic at all, though the situation is starting to get tight," Mr Lea Cox said.

The amount of freight traffic moving through Zimbabwe had doubled over the last two to three months, from 30 000 to 60 000 tonnes a day.

The congestion on the South African Railways was expected to ease in about two months. Demand for the transport in Zimbabwe was also expected to ease at that time, NRZ officials said.

Mr Lea-Cox said that laying of track on the Maputo line between Mbizi and Chikombedzi should be completed and service restored to Maputo within two months.

A 63 km stretch of track had been removed last year.

"The line from Malvernia to Maputo is physically connected, but they still have some work to do with respect to restoring various facilities," Mr Lea-Cox said.

REPORTAGE ON EFFORT TO SAVE TAZARA RAILWAY

PRC Rescue

[Text] The Chinese government has come to the rescue of Tazara which a few weeks ago was facing an imminent collapse due to financial rescue manpower problems by providing a K10 million loan for the purchase of the much needed spare parts for locomotive engines and other rolling stock.

The Chinese have also guaranteed to provide experts for the repair work on the line which was damaged by heavy rains two years ago in Tanzania between Makambako and Malimba and steel material for the repair of the Chambeshi Bridge which was destroyed by rebel Rhodesian commandos last year.

The cost for repair work on the line between Makambako and Malimba which was washed away is estimated at K4 million and Zambia and Tanzania will provide the funds. The two countries will also provide money for the repair of Chambeshi Bridge.

Briefing the Press yesterday on the outcome of the tripartite talks. Minister of Power. Transport and Communications. General Kingsley Chinkuli. said the three countries. China. Zambia and Tanzania. identified the problems facing the railway line and that next year. Tazara will operate on a different footing. "It will be a new animal."

He said a team of experts from China will be arriving this month to appraise the situation prevailing in Tazara from a manufacturer's point of view and prescribe solutions.

The Zambian and Tan Zanian governments will also assist Tazara in collecting about K9.8 million owed to it mostly by Zambian importers as part of the solution.

"The two governments have pledged to urge debtors to expedite payment in order to enable Tazara in its national duty of repairing the line," Gen. Chinkuli said.

Tazara has also contracted a West Germany firm, NTU, to carry out an experiment in the repowering of locomotive engines to give them more power. The firm will also provide 14 locomotive engines, seven to be guaranteed by Zambia and the other seven by Tanzania.

"We hope this will also bring out a new lease of life in Tazara," said the minister.

On the technical agreement for the third phase, Gen. Chinkuli said there was no change in the agreement which will run till 1982 except that the figure of Chinese experts has been reduced from 750 to 150, he added, however, that should the need for more Chinese experts arise, the two governments will approach China for more assistance of personnel.

Gen. Chinkuli added that Zambia and Tanzania also agreed to improve the turn-round of wagons and ensure that those who detained Tazara wagons got penalized.

"We shall legislate in this direction and ensure that the culprits whether at the port of Dar-es-Salaam or Zambia Railways are punished. This is aimed at improving efficiency," he said.

Gen. Chinkuli also announced that Tazara will from October 1 increase the rates by 10 percent.

"And in future, rates in Tazara will be fixed by the management, taking into account the prevailing economic situation. This decision is because the Ministerial Council used to delay in implementing the rates."

He also added that in future, Zambia and Tanzania may approach the European Economic Commission (EEC) to find out what assistance they can offer to Tazara.

"Already we expect K2.1 million from EEC emergency funds for the repair of the Chambeshi Bridge. The Chinese government have no objection to where we get money for Tazara," he said in answer to a question.

PRC Friendship Praised

Lusaka ZAMBIA DAILY MAIL in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] A few years ago, President Kaunda referred to the Chinese as "all weather-friends." This expression is complete in meaning, and so far, the Chinese have earned this distinction.

The President coined the distinction during the inauguration ceremony of the Great Freedom Railway, Tazara, on July 14, 1976. He was trying to find an appropriate word to thank the Chinese for the wonderful job they had done.

It means friends you do not have to beg or go hand and knees to get attention or assistance when you encounter a desperate situation. Their door is always wide open to you any time.

The Chinese offered their financial material and human resources to Zambia and Tanzania to construct Tazara. They did this in the face of discouraging propaganda campaign by the West that Zambia and Tanzania had gone communist.

We are grateful to the Chinese that this dependable spirit and determination to see that Tazara succeeds is still strong. Without their genuine friendship, Zambia would have not survived the hostile imperialist machinations.

Now, the Chinese have offered to provide a further K10 million loan to get the line out of its current operational difficulties.

With this amount, Tazara can once again look to the future with confidence. And according to the Minister of Power, Transport and Communications, General Kingsley Chinkuli, the railway will operate on a differenc system.

Although he could not elaborate, it cannot mean anything more than greater efficiency and better service.

A contingent of Chinese experts is coming to overhaul the operations of Tazara and correct any faults along the line. In addition, they will carry out repair work.

There is one other thing. The amount of funds tied up in debts is one of the problems facing Tazara, and it is a good thing that this problem was also discussed thoroughly by the Council of Ministers.

The governments of Zambia and Tanzania have now agreed to assist Tazara in collecting unpaid debts. The people, who have used Tazara but have not paid for the service have contributed to the problems of the system. They must make voluntary payments or risk prosecution.

The railway cannot operate successfully without funds. It has got employees to pay, rolling stocks to repair and purchase and general maintenance for the line. All these require money.

There has been a complaint about importers, who detain wagons and cause delays in the transportation of goods from the port. The proposal to have legislation to this effect under which culprits will be punished is overdue.

Since persuasion and commonsense cannot prevail on the users of Tazara, the solution is to legislate against any act which disrupts the service. The deliberations on Tazara were worthwhile.

But when all the decisions have been implemented, the workers on Tazara will also need to make their contribution by exerting themselves a little more.

Priorities To Be Set

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Freddie M'ule: "Tazara Must Be Helped To Improve"]

[Text] The Tazara Board of Directors must also sit down and map out their own strategies to enhance line performance. If Tazara hopes importers will go to them while there is a shorter and faster route elsewhere, then they ought to examine their priorities.

The salvage operation launched last week to rescue the Tanzania-Zambia Railway (TAZARA) from impending collapse, leaves little or no doubt about the dire operational and financial straits that this four-year-old organization is embroiled in.

A new loss of nearly K20 million in four years, locomotive performance problem, shortages of spares, liquidity constraints and scarce skilled manpower, all seem to have teamed up to undermine the efficiency and profitability of TAZARA.

Zambia, Tanzania and China are no doubt faced with a multi-facetted problem of trying to put the almost derailed organisation back on its tracks; justifying its viability and trying to wipe from memory, the possibility of this multi million Kwacha showpiece project ending up as a mere jumbo-sized liability.

The high level tripartite meeting which opened in Lusaka last Monday and the preceding meeting of the TAZARA Council of Ministers, both underscored the urgency of the problem and the necessity of finding a permanent solution to this problem.

As emphasised by Tanzania's Minister of Transport, Mr Augustine Mwingira, and Zambia's Minister's of Power, Transport and Communications, General Kingsley Chinkuli, the crux of the matter hinges on TAZARA's survival and the curative measures that will be taken to save it.

Coming only four years after the railway was handed over to Zambia and Tanzania by the People's Republic of China, there will undoubtedly be those prophets of doom who forecast "operational inefficiency" who will be wagging their fingers in the faces of the two countries, saying: "We told you so.".

That, however, is not exactly the issue at hand. In any case, when plans to build the railway were first mooted, not many people, especially in the Western world, gave it much chance. Nearly all of them told Zambia and Tanzania it could not be done until it was done and they were meant to swallow their words.

To every nascent organisation, teething proolems are normal. But whether or not those problems are left to develop into a cancer is the real point. In fact, it is a point where the line needs to be drawn between facts and fantasy and to a greater extent, politics and economics.

The case of the Tanzania Zambia Railways is that of economics - although not necessarily simple economics. The one single issue is that TAZARA is not operating economically.

According to the official diagnosis of the TAZARA issue, the current state of affairs is a result of land formation failures; poor performance of certain locomotives; shortage of spares; cash flow problems and the scarcity of skilled manpower.

It has been established especially in the past that certain areas where the line passes become impassable especially after heavy rains. This consequently incapacitates the railway in that operations have to be halted to let nature take its course while it bores a hole in the company's finances.

In April and May last year, TAZARA traffic was halted due to floods which completely submerged part of the line and flooded two tunnels.

On locomotive performance, despite the irony of the short time of TAZARA's operations, it is understood that some of them were "too old" and needed to be replaced or complemented. There was, for instance, in July 1978 a time when 500 wagons loaded with 9,000 tonnes of copper and zinc and 548 tonnes of lead were stranded between Nseluka and Chozi stations due to shortage of locomotive engines.

The shortage of spares, too, despite the factor of after-sale services has been serious especially considering the distance involved and the fact that getting them from other sources may not work due to differences in specifications.

In November 1977, TAZARA had at one time 350 wagons awaiting repair and that, considering there were only 2,100 wagons inherited at July 14, 1976, when the railway was handed over, plus the usual problems of wagon turn-round, obviously gave TAZARA another problem to look at.

The shortage of skilled manpower is even more serious in the light of the fact that Chinese help is temporary and will eventually have to be withdrawn completely thereafter making it imperative for skilled local workers to take over.

Indeed, it has already become evident, with the gradual withdrawal from the system of the Chinese experts, that more time was needed to train more Zambians and Tanzanians to take over.

The staff are new and most of them still learning. They have to handle unfamiliar and specialised equipment and need good time (than four years) of reorientation to attain appropriate standards for the efficient operation and maintenance of the railway.

Returned

At least 1,000 Chinese experts were left at the hand over time to train local personnel. They were seconded for a two-year period and most of them have since returned home.

Besides the cash flow problem, there are many other issues though not among the most pressing which, however, have just as potentially devastating an effect. There was a strike in late 1978 which cost an estimated K68,000 and the consequent marooning of some 78,892 tonnes of cargo between Nakonde and Kapiri Mposhi.

Another strike which lasted eight days followed in March 1979 costing TAZARA K1 million and the sacking or suspension of some 51 of the 3,000 labour force on the Zambian side. Some were later reinstated.

It is obvious, therefore, that beneath the veneer of TAZARA's not-so-bad image is a rather not-so-good industrial relations record. And unless this is considered in the same light as the other "major problems" TAZARA may still be plunged into bad times.

The performance of TAZARA shows a magnificent potential that in concurrence with General Chinkuli, the viability of the line cannot be doubted. However, there is a great difference between potential and actual output.

The idea to construct Tazara began in the early sixties although earlier still it formed part of Cecil Rhodes' grand design of a Cape to Cairo railway.

TAZARA was suggested to be a catalyst to the economic development of the areas it would pass through; to strengthen inter-state economic, political and cultural co-operation; to diversify Zambia's outlets to the sea and provide a link to the sea for landlocked Zambia that did not pass through hostile minority-controlled countries.

In fact, the need for Tazara was further enhance in 1965 when Ian Douglas Smith and his colleagues declared unilateral independence in the then Rhodesia, (Zimbabwe) thus severely restricting Zambia's traditional access to the sea.

A few years later, the Zambia-Rhodesia border was sealed. On the western side, the Benguela Railway was closed too due to disruptions caused by a liberation and later civil war.

Tazara was built and completed in 1975. It was handed over to Zambia and Tanzania on July 14, 1976. That Tazara's significance is self-evident is obvious. One would look at the fact that for instance, in April 1974 the still uncompleted line was assigned to transport goods from Dar es Salaam to Mwenzo (11 kilometres inside Zambia) on an emergency basis. In eight months thereafter, Tazara had hauled 534,270 tonnes of cargo.

At the time of Tazara's hand over, the line had 2,100 wagons, 100 passenger coaches, 102 diesel hydraulic locomotives (85 of 2,000 horse power and 17 of 1,000 horse power) for the main line and shunting respectively. And then of course, repair shops were constructed in Mpika (Zambia) and Dar es Salaam (Tanzania).

On the capacity side Tazara was initially supposed to carry 4,000,000 tonnes of cargo annually. But equipment provided at the hand over was only adequate for half that tonnage annually – one million tonnes both ways to be achieved by running five pairs of goods trains per day.

After the line started operating fully in 1977 problems started surfacing. These of course were considered quite normal for a flegling organisation. However, they gradually built up and were compounded by many other factors including lack of quick remedial action.

Two years after the hand over (August 1978) protocols were in fact signed in Dar es Salaam to solve Tazara's problems mostly caused by lengthy delays in wagon turn round and shortage of rolling stock. Delays of wagons especially on the Zambian side have been known to be around 35-40 days when normally they should take about three weeks.

The October 6 reopening of the southern route must have posed as the most immediate threat to Tazara although in the circumstance, it would provide healthy competition to help the organisation gain experience.

Congestion and inefficiency at the port of Dar es Salaam made it imperative for Zambia to seek alternative routes or face a possible economic catastrophe. And with the rains just about to set in, it was imperative for Zambia also to divert the much needed fertiliser to a route that would speed its delivery into Zambia.

To date, however, Mr Mwingira has criticised Zambian exporters and importers for being reluctant to use Tazara. This was, however, rebutted by Minister of Works and Supply Mr Haswell Mwale who gave breakdowns of cargo at Dar, en route there or awaiting unloading as compared to the position at the South African port of East London.

It was obvious that Tazara was still being utilised although on a much lesser scale. There were many importers and exporters who had been victims of the Dar es Salaam port shortcomings who felt the need to divert their route southwards.

Achieved

According to the Bank of Zambia annual report for 1979, although Dar handled 49 per cent of Zambia's foreign trade last year, both import and exports fell. On the other hand, traffic on the southern route which passes through newly independent Zimbabwe, accounted for 41 per cent – a considerable improvement from the nine per cent achieved in 1978 for the two months of using the route.

The drop in the use of Tazara was according to its report mainly due to its poor performance. Included in the problems were the strikes, floods and the sabotage action of former rebel Rhodesian commandos.

It is evident therefore that unless Tazara improves or is assisted to improve, it will be a burden to the economies of both Tanzania and Zambia.

Solutions lie in tackling the problems that have been outlined by the Council of Ministers and the Tripartite meeting delegates.

Tazara needs more money; more business; more spares; less line problems; good locomotive performance; more skilled manpower and good industrial relations. For Zambia and Tanzania, Tazara is not a mere railway line, but a great symbol of the great things than can result when great peoples put their heads together.

The Tazara board of directors must also sit down and map out their own strategies to enhance line performance. If Tazara hopes importers will go to them while there is a shorter and faster route elsewhere, then they ought to examine their priorities.

If indeed Tazara wants business, they have to stand up and go after it. This little world is a rather competitive one. If as has been said Tazara IS viable, there is no need why it should not be a profitable venture. And that is as far as one can go with speculative "ifs".

Let all those involved perhaps realise the importance and necessity of keeping Tazara afloat. Economic independence also entails free lines of communication and Tazara happens to be one of them.

According to General Chinkuli: "The situation prevailing in Tazara at the moment is so serious that unless immediate remedial measures are taken, this vital organisation is bound to grind to a halt in the near future."

As grim but pertinent as that may sound, it would also do them a lot of good to recall President Kaunda's address during the ceremonial hand over when he said: "What TANU and UNIP with the great people of China have victoriously joined together, let no man or nation put asunder."

It may sound like a worn line from the vows of holy matrimony, but it does marry two hard facts together: that Tazara is facing serious problems and that solutions to those problems need to be found without delay.

CHIPATA, LILONGWE RAIL LINK TALKS CONTINUE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] A seven-man Malawi delegation led by Power Transport and Communications Minister, Mr Henry Harawa, arrived yesterday in Lusaka from Lilongwe for talks with Zambian Government officials on the construction of a railway line between the two countries to strengthen transport links.

Speaking to reporters on arrival at Lusaka airport, Mr Harawa, who was welcomed by Minister for Public Works, Mr Haswell Mwale, said the two countries were determined to expand transport and communication links between them.

He said UBZ had been given a license to operate a bus service between Nakando and Chitupa in the Muyombe area.

Mr Harawa said during their stay in the country the delegation, which includes chairman of Malawi Railways, Mr Richard Katengeza, would discuss matters of "mutual interest."

"Malawi and Zambia have a common policy in transport and other fields and we feel that we should periodically meet and discuss problems which arise between the governments of the two countries," said Mr Harawa.

He said the question of constructing a rail line between Chipata and Lilongwe would feature prominently at the talks which open today at Mulungushi hall.

Mr Harawa said experts from both sides would work out concrete plans on how best to implement the project which, it is hoped, would be jointly financed by Zambia and Malawi and the European Economic Commission.

But he could not indicate when the project would start.

The Malawian delegation would also hold talks with Zambian transporters, UBZ officials and experts from Zambia Railways.

AIR FREIGHT BETWEEN SA, OTHER AFRICAN STATES TO INCREASE

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 26 Aug 80 p 31

[Article by Geoff Shuttleworth]

[Text]

Airfreight between South Africa and African states to the north has suffered a downturn in volume recently, but sources believe that this traffic will pick up fairly considerably towards the end of the year.

The change in volume and pattern of airfreight was brought about primarily by the ending of hostilities in Zimbabwe and the subsequent reopening of many of the land routes.

They noted that while many of the land routes and particularly the rail route through Zimbabwe are suffering from congestion at present, they do not believe that when land routes are less congested that there will be a significant fall-off in airfreight.

By that time there will possibly have been a significant effort by South African exporters to use Zimbabwe as a springboard and forwarding station for the rest of Africa.

In addition airfreight will never be replaced because its speed and efficiency and also lack of pilfering places it at a significant advantage over rail routed goods in particular. By way of an example a freight forwarder in Durban said that on one maize rail truck only six bags of maize were finally received in Zambia.

Shipping routes and services in ports are being reactivated, particularly in Mozambique. But they expect this really only to affect bulk cargoes.

Trade by airfreight has suffered particularly in the case of Zambia and Malawi which were landlocked by the war in Zimbabwe and because of Mozambique's inability to handle and process the flow of goods. Zairean traffic was also affected to a lesser degree.

In the case of Zambia two Boeing 747 flights a week was the order of the day but this has dwindled to two a month and in Malawi four Hercules a month now make the trip whereas in the past there were usually around three to five planes a week.

In Zaire there are less charters than regular flights and a Boeing 707 is about to carry out a regular flight instead of the more irregular Hercules or Boeings before. The SAA is believed to be making approaches at setting up a scheduled cargo service between South Africa and Zaire which will join Iberia, Sabena, Swissair, UTA and other airlines operating there.

Another change which has come about in Zaire has been the rerouting of cobalt.

Previously the entire production of cobalt — Zaire is the world's largest producer — was airfreighted to world markets by Sabena. The price fall and the build-up of stock has allowed for this change in freighting.

ZAMBIAN RAIL STOCK ORDER WON BY SALISBURY FIRM

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] A Salisbury firm, Morewear Industries, has won a $5,5 million contract to supply 250 railway goods wagons to Zambia, a company spokesman said yesterday.

In an interview, he said the wagons would be supplied over nine months. "We will have to expand our labour force by hundreds to cope with the work."

The contract would be signed when a Zambian Ministerial delegation arrived this month. "We hope to finalise all the formalities soon."

It was the first time since UDI that his firm had won such a large contract. The tender was won against stiff European competition, he said.

A Government spokesman confirmed the contract, saying it had been the result of Zimbabwe's membership of the ACP and the EEC. "Many more such opportunities are expected to come up in future."

The Morewear Industries' spokesman said the wagons would be paid for by the EEC which had recommended buying the rolling stock from Zimbabwe.

The company also makes vehicle bodies and trailers.

The contract is expected to speed up the delivery of Zambia's goods from Zimbabwe and South Africa.

VISIT OF LIBYAN DELEGATION REPORTED

Cotonou Joint Commission Meeting

Cotonou EHUZU in French 4 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by F Houehou]

[Text] A delegation of the Libyan Arab Socialist People's Jamahiriya arrived last Saturday in Cotonou to participate in the proceedings of the 2d meeting of the Benino-Libyan Arab Joint Commission which opens this morning in Cotonou.

Under the leadership of the secretary general (minister) of the Peoples' Committee Public Office, Brother Mohamed Al Mabrouk, the delegation was welcomed at the Cotonou-Cadjehoun International Airport by our minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, Comrade Ifede Ogouma Simon.

In the main hall of the airport, the head of the Libyan Arab delegation expressed his thorough gratitude to the Benin people for the warm and fraternal welcome his delegation and he himself had received. Brother Mohamed Al Mabrouk then evoked the different subjects which will occupy the Commission's attention, namely: economic cooperation, the Agricultural sector, fishing and mining.

Then calling attention to the fact that the participation of the 2 countries in common projects will serve the interests of the 2 peoples, the head of the Libyan Arab delegation expressed his satisfaction at the solid bonds and good relations which unite our two revolutions: the great Al Fateh Revolution of September 1st and the great Benin Revolution of 26 October 1972. Evoking the history of the Revolution of the valiant Benin People, the Libyan minister emphasized the interest that his country takes in the impetuous development of our struggle for the edification of socialism in spite of the aggression and attempts at colonial reconquest by international imperialism. He then expressed his satisfaction at the ever increasing success the struggling working People of Benin are achieving over their enemies, both domestic and foreign.

After having conveyed the chalorous greetings of President Mu'ammar Qadhdhafi, head of the Great Revolution of September 1st, to our great comrade in arms, President Kerekou and that of the Libyan Arab People to the Fraternal People of Benin, Brother Mohamed Al Mabrouk stated principally in conclusion: "We hope to have fruitful discussions, which will be crowned with success, with our Benin brothers so that we can bring about economic and cultural complementarity between our two countries."

Reinforcing Libyan-Benin Friendship

Cotonou EHUZU in French 5 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] "The current session will make it possible for us to draw up concrete measures which, taking into account our successes and our failures, will promote the future development of our relations of cooperation in all spheres, in the thoroughly understood interest of our two peoples and our two Revolutions."

Our minister of foreign affairs and cooperation, Comrade Ogouma Ifede Simon thus emphasized the great importance of the 2d meeting of the Benino-Libyan Arab Joint Commission whose proceedings began yesterday morning at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation in Cotonou.

"These Sittings," the minister continued, "will make it possible to institute an exhaustive balance sheet of all actions undertaken in common or individually by the two Benin and Libyan Arab Parties since the 1st session was held in Tripoli in 1979."

Expressing his joy at welcoming in the free African land of Benin the delegation of the Libyan Arab Socialist People's Jamahiriya, Comrade Ogouma conveyed to each and all the cordial welcoming wishes of our great comrade in arms President Kerekou and those of the National Executive Council.

Evoking the results of the Tripoli Session, the minister indicated that it had translated into action our will and our common determination to move forward in developing and deepening the bonds of friendship, cooperation and solidarity which unite the People's Republic of Benin and the Libyan Arab Socialist People's Jamahiriya, two countries enamored of peace and justice, two countries struggling for their true independence against foreign domination.

After having brought to the fore the importance our Party and our Revolutionary State attach to this meeting which remains first of all a significant step in the development of bilateral cooperation in all spheres, the minister declared himself convinced of the deepening of the bonds of friendship, cooperation and fraternity which unite the Benin and Libyan Arab peoples.

Recalling the guiding principles which underlie the foreign policies of the two presidents who are brothers and friends, Mathieu Kerekou and Mu'ammar Qadhdhafi, namely: mutual respect of each other's independence and sovereignty--mutual advantages--non-interference in the affairs of the other--and national dignity, the minister emphasized the determination of the two heads of state to work for the development of relations of friendship, cooperation and solidarity with our two peoples.

In conclusion, Comrade Ogouma said: "We are persuaded that the edification and reinforcement of our cooperation are necessary for the development of the revolutionary struggle of the African peoples for the unity and true independence of our continent."

Libyan, Saharan Officials Received

Cotonou EHUZU in French 6 Aug 80 pp 1, 6

[Article by Pothin Gnanvi]

[Text] In Cotonou yesterday our great comrade in arms, President Kerekou, gave audience successively to brothers Mohamed Al Mabrouk and Salek Ould Bobih, respectively head of the Libyan Arab delegation which has just participated in the proceedings of the 2d meeting of the great Benino-Libyan Joint Commission and minister of Health of the Saharan Democratic Arab Republic.

Interviewed on leaving the president's office, the head of the Libyan Arab delegation, Brother Mohamed Al Mabrouk said that he had come to inform the Head of State of the results of the 2d meeting of the great Benino-Libyan Joint Commission. "This visit," Brother Mohamed Al Mabrouk indicated, "made it possible for us to become better acquainted with the experience acquired by the Benin Revolution."

In conclusion, the head of the Libyan delegation expressed his satisfaction at the militant understanding which characterized his conversation with the head of state, President Kerekou.

Answering in his turn questions from the press, the Saharan minister of health, Brother Salek Ould Bobih, who had paid a courtesy and get acquainted visit to the head of state said that he carried a message from his government to the head of state.

Queried about the recent Moroccan attack perpetuated against the locality of Boulanwar in Northern Mauritania, Brother Salek Ould Bobih said that it was chiefly aimed at destabilizing the region and spreading confusion on the eve of the meeting of the "Committee of Wisemen" entrusted with finding solutions to the conflict between Morocco and the Western Sahara.

The Saharan minister then emphasized the thorough availability of his people to accept any negotiation with a view to a peaceful settlement of the problem of the Western Sahara which is, first of all, a problem of decolonization.

REPORTAGE ON VISIT OF NORTH KOREAN CULTURAL MINISTER

Visit to Factories

Cotonou EHUZU in French 31 Jul 80 pp 1, 6

[Article by Ephrem Dossavi]

[Text] Comrade Yi Ch'ang-son, Korean minister of culture and art, and Special envoy of Marshal Kim Il-song, president of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), who arrived last Tuesday in our economic capital, Cotonou, at the head of an important delegation of Korea's party and state, yesterday visited the city of Cotonou and several production units.

Early in the morning, Minister Yi and his delegation accompanied by the Beninese officials went to the martyrs memorial where they were greeted by militants of both sexes of the Beninese revolution, lining up in impeccable order, shouting revolutionary slogans, and singing to the glory of the 16 January 1977 martyrs. The minister placed a wreath at the foot of the memorial then observed a minute of silence to the memory of our martyrs. Afterward the delegation proceeded toward the Red Star Square via the Labor Exchange and the Hall of Sports. At the Red Star Square the minister appreciated that architectural masterpiece and asked the precinct chief of Cotonou V who was accompanying him, about its pecularities.

Next, the delegation visited SONICOG (National Company for the Fatty Substance Industry) in Cotonou III. At the factory gate workers formed an honor line, welcoming the DPRK delegation with revolutionary slogans and songs. The management committee of the company then showed our guests to the meetings room, where Gedeon Dassoundo, SONICOG director general, flanked by close collaborators and management and trade union officials, greeted the delegation in the name of the management committee. Dassoundo gave the delegates a general report on the company before inviting them to tour its installations.

Minister Yi, DPRK chief delegate, who followed with attention the many explanations given him, was much pleased with the atmosphere which prevails in the factory. He noted that through SONICOG the factory untiringly works for the well-being of the Beninese people, and that the workers are eager and resolved to step up the production of their factory.

Last leg of the visit, "La Beninoise." There, a special atmosphere reigned: tam-tam, slogans, songs, etc. Management committee members promptly showed the DPRK delegation to the different sections of the brewery. Later, in the conference room, Denis Yabi, director general of the company, told the DPRK delegates that their visit came at a crucial moment for the Beninese revolution characterized by the campaign to increase production launched by our vanguard party, the People's Revolution Party of Benin.

The director general of "La Beninoise" retraced the history of the brewery, providing details on its production capacity, its activities, its administrative organization, and its prospects. Moved by the warm welcome, Minister Yi thanked all the personnel for it. He was glad to take note of the workers' enthusiasm about their job, and of the diligent compliance with the party's passwords. He was satisfied with the measures of nationalization decreted by the Beninese government which, he added, fit in the logic of revolutionary struggle.

Moreover,the DPRK visiting delegation will be received in audience today by our minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, then by that of Popular Culture and Alphabetization before being ushered tomorrow morning into the office of our great comrade-in-arms, President Mathieu Kerekou.

Visit to National University

Cotonou EHUZU in French 1 Aug 80 pp 1, 8

[Article by G. Menai]

[Text] Yi Ch'ang-son, DPRK minister of culture and art, who arrived last Tuesday in our country pursues his visit to Benin. Yesterday afternoon, he went to the Abomey-Calavi university campus. He was greeted by Nathaniel Mensah, rector of Benin National University (UNB), along with the university secretary general and student representatives.

In his greetings, the UNB rector pointed out that Benin and DPRK are rather close to each other despite geographical distance. The Beninese people, he said, are in intellectual communion with the DPRK people, and support their praiseworthy efforts toward peaceful and independent reunification of their fatherland. Mensah expressed his joy in receiving Minister Yi, since "DPRK shows constant solicitude toward Benin National University." The rector made a detailed report on the organizational structure and operation of the university. This account aroused keen interest with our guest, who asked several questions to which answers were given.

The first vice president of the university cooperative gave Minister Yi the militant greetings of UNB students. He then filled the minister in on the organization, the role, and the objectives of the cooperative, before voicing all the gratitude of the students to President Kim Il-song for endowing their campus with a modern wing.

In his reply, the DPRK minister thanked the university authorities for their warm welcome. He was keenly impressed by the sense of organization at UNB, and by its successful achievements. He concluded that UNB takes on a capital importance for Benin since it contributes to the formation of national cadres. That success of all undertakings depends on cadres gives rise to the need for training ideologically and technically competent cadres to ensure harmonious development.

Later, escorted by the rector the DPRK minister visited the cooperative and various faculties on campus.

The DPRK minister was received yesterday morning by Ogouma Ifede Simon, minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation, and by Capo-Chichi Tonakpon Gratien, minister of Alphabetization and Popular Culture.

End of Visit

[Article by A. Akuete]

[Text] The DPRK delegation led by Yi Ch'ang-son, minister of culture and art, which arrived in Benin on 29 July, left Cotonou yesterday late in the afternoon.

Speaking to the press in the VIP lounge at Cotonou-Cadjehoun airport, Minister Yi first of all appreciated the warm welcome extended to all DPRK delegates during their stay in Benin. He thanked Beninese authorities for that welcome, then stated that he was pleased to see that all the Beninese people are actively supporting the DPRK people in their struggle to reunify their fatherland.

Minister Yi recalled the convincing successes achieved by our people in all fields, pledging to transmit the feelings of friendship of the Beninese people to the DPRK people and to their beloved leader, President Kim Il-song.

Elaborating on his talks with Gratien T. Capo-Chichi, our minister of Alphabetization and Popular Culture, the DPRK minister declared, "In the future we can strengthen our cooperation in the cultural field."

It should be recalled that the DPRK delegates who were received last Friday by our great comrade-in-arms, President Kerekou, were seen off on their trip home by Ogouma I. Simon and Gratien Capo-Chichi, respectively minister of Foreign Affairs and Cooperation and minister of Alphabetization and Popular Culture. His Excellency Son Tchang-son, DPRK ambassador, was also present.

UNION-GOVERNMENT CONFRONTATION ENDED

Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 20 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Kwapeng Modikwe]

[Text] A natural death has been declared on the current confrontation between the Government and union management.

Officially opening a two-week International Seminar for Trade unionists in the African Region on Monday, the Chairman of the Botswana Federation of Trade Union. (BFTU) Mr Benson Ratsoma noted that such death would however only come through a good union administration and education of industrial discipline.

Mr Ratsoma further told the seminar which is being held at the Trade Union Centre in Gaborone, that industrial discipline did not only lie with union management and Labour Ministries.

He said increasing productivity for development in industry could only be fully achieved if all parties namely managements, employes and government has a good machinery for consultation and not confrontation.

"Because of that" he noted" parties concerned would have a good case for productivity bargaining in their collective bargaining agreements."

The BFTU chairman further said the subject of productivity has sadly been neglected in the existing agreements of many unions and to achieve that, he added, it needed a proper administration of union funds and proper allocation of available human resources.

Other speakers at the seminar included Mr I. Nedziwe, the representative of Union in the Africa Region, Messers L. Kratz and I. Johansson both union education officers from Geneva.

The Seminar will be officially closed by the Secretary of the BFTU, Mr P. Tihaodi on August 30.

PREPARATIONS FOR 1981 CENSUS REPORTED

Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 12 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] Botswana's second population and housing census, since independence, is scheduled for August, 1981.

This was announced by the then Vice President and Minister of Finance and Development Planning, President Dr Quett Masire in March this year.

The Census Office is this month launching a training programme and carrying out a pilot Census in 12 of the 14 Census Districts throughout the country.

More than 72 people will be trained to record the information required of all persons, and work on the pilot census is scheduled to start next week, August 18.

Of the 72, there are 58 enumerators composed of teachers, students and agricultural extension workers and 14 supervisors also chosen from among teachers and senior extension workers.

Senior supervisory staff is made up of census and statistician officers.

Training at most of the census districts will be carried out August 18 - 20, and the pilot census August 21 - 25. The districts that will be covered on the above dates include: Chobe, North East, Kgalagadi, Kgatleng, Gaborone, South East, Kweneng South District and Selibe-Phikwe.

At Ngamiland work starts earlier. Training began yesterday August 11 and will continue until the 14th. The pilot census will be taken August 14 - 20.

In the Central District training is scheduled for August 20 - 22 and Pilot work August 23 - 27.

Ghanzi will be among the last. Training starts on August 22 and ends August 24. The pilot census will be held August 25 - 29. The following on page 2 is the full schedule for the census districts and their enumeration areas:

District	Area	Training	Pilot - Census

TRIBAL LAND BILL--The House of Chiefs welcomed the Tribal Land Amendment Bill yesterday but appealed to the Vice President and Minister of Local Government and Lands, Mr Lenyeletse Seretse, to see to it that the landboards membership comprise capable men. The Bill seeks to give the Minister the power to vary the membership of any landboard by an order published in a Government Gazette. Presenting the Bill, the Minister said it was expected that with that amendment, the problems currently affecting landboards would be reduced. Welcoming the Bill, Kgosi Seepapitso IV of Bangwaketse appealed to the Minister to examine very carefully before appointing anybody to the membership of land boards. It should be established whether such appointees are physically capable of holding the job. He cited as an example the landboard in his district as comprising mostly of old men who are physically weak. [Excerpt] [Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 20 Aug 80 p 1]

STAFF APPOINTMENTS--The President Dr Quett Masire has announced staff dispositions affecting three top Government officials. A circular from the Permanent Secretary to the President says that Mr S. A. Mpuchane, who is currently Administrative Secretary in the Office of the President has been appointed Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Local Government and Lands. It adds that Botswana's Ambassador to the United States in Washington DC Mr Bias Mookodi, has been appointed Administrative Secretary in the Office of the President. Mr Mookodi will assume duty on or about October 13, while Mr Mphuchane will move to Local Government and Lands when he has handed over to Mr Mookodi. The circular further says that Deputy Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Local Government and Lands Mr E. M. Ontumetse will act as Permanent Secretary from the time Mr B. K. Temane, who holds the position, departs on study leave until the arrival of Mr Mphuchane. [Text] [Gaborone DAILY NEWS in English 21 Aug 80 p 1]

CUBAN MACHINERY ARRIVES--Jimma (ENA)--The ten million Birr road building machinery donated by the Government of Cuba to Socialist Ethiopia has started reaching here from the port town of Assab to be deployed in road construction projects. The grant includes dozers, graders, loaders, water and fuel tankers, mobile garages, service cars, carrier trucks with trailer, tractor and an ambulance unit. The equipment will be used for the construction of two feeder roads in the coffee producing regions of Kaffa and Illubabor. A road construction task force has also arrived here along with the machinery to handle the equipment while another is due to arrive from the port town. It is to be recalled that the grant by Revolutionary Cuba was made in appreciation of the National Revolutionary Development Campaign in progress in the country. NATIONAL CRISIS IS ECONOMIC, NOT CONSTITUTIONAL

[Text]

AMONG the matters arising from the Ghanaian Parliament's rejection of two nominees to the Supreme Court — Chief Justice Apaloo and Mr. Justice Abban — perhaps the most important is the readiness, indeed haste, with which some people have spoken of "constitutional crisis". The minority opposition parties walked out in protest at what they felt was presidential manipulation of Parliament to get rid of two members of the senior judiciary in a manner which flouted the constitution. Their warning was that the President had created an unnecessary constitutional crisis which could prejudice the durability of the Third Republic.

The view from the government side, however, is totally different and a little more disturbing. Mr. E. D. Mahami, chairman of the Parliamentary Appointments Committee, dismissed the relevance of the opposition writ on the Chief Justice's case filed before the Supreme Court and said it was the business of Parliament alone. Indeed, the future work of the highest court in the land was not to thwart Parliament's present work in approving the members of that court. Even more serious, however, were the reported words of the PNP's publicity secretary, Mr. Kofi Batsa. Blaming the minority parties for instigating a constitutional crisis, Mr. Batsa told them not to delude themselves into thinking they could bring the government down by a vote of no confidence. He warned that the PNP could decide to go it alone if the other parties did not play the democratic game, and said those parties would be responsible for the consequences of open confrontation.

It seems rather over-muscular to taunt the opposition with the fact that they can do little more in Parliament than to make noise: the government has a clear and disciplined majority there, and its ministers and policies can hardly be said to be answerable to Parliament. Without getting lost in questions of principle, Mr. Mahami did not give a clear response to the significance of the visit by two Cabinet ministers to the Speaker during a recess after which the debate on Mr. Justice Apaloo was continued. On the other hand, whatever the constitution may deem with regard to a sitting chief justice, it is a good thing for all Supreme Court judges (and indeed, all senior officials) to pay their taxes along with the rest of Ghana's citizens. It is unfortunate for Mr. Justice Apaloo that his cupboard had to be opened in this way, without also revealing what conflicts there may have been in the past between him and senior members of the ruling party. There is also more behind the explanation of why Mr. Justice Abban was rejected than "bias in arriving at the decision in the Kowus case". Ghana will not gain from one or two cupboards being opened while all the others remain firmly closed.

Perhaps the main conclusion to draw from this episode in Parliament's life is that there is no crisis in Ghana other than the economy. No party, including the government, can claim to have the shining light to guide Ghana out of its long, dark tunnel. There is some truth in the assertion that it is the responsibility of the opposition parties to make Parliament a vigorous body and not a rubber stamp and closed debating club of little practical consequence. The first anniversary of PNP government is coming up soon, and mere addition of the total of foreign loans revived or received will not provide matter for celebration.

INTER-PARTY FEUDING, DETERIORATING SITUATION DEPLORED

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 29 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Yaw Boakye]

[Text] My apologies to Chinua Achebe for taking the title of his book as my headline. I cannot help it; there is no better description for the current events.

So many roundabouts are being constructed here and there; the result is a traffic jam and for Heaven's sake, the noise is becoming intolerable.

The Third Republic got off the ground on a healthy note--political parties sought or formed alliances to diffuse frightening differences of opinion: Parliament mainly thrived on decisions by consensus. Unity was the principal objective though not at the expense of the clear identifies of the political parties and even in diversity, hope for compromise was not remote.

But things have started to fall apart. The like and the unlike poles are moving wider apart and the country is gradually sinking is a quagmire of hopeless exchange of words, some of which are childish indeed.

The newspaper pages are being filled daily with stinking attacks and counter-attacks by political opponents. Patience is wavering and restraint has almost become a hated word. Who is really calling the tune and who is paying for what?

While the politicians seriously engage themselves in the war of words, the condition of the roads continues to deteriorate; prices continue to soar high; shops continue to beg for goods; the industrialists pray to save their factories from collapse; the motor workshops continue to turn out their customers for lack of spare parts; the land is waiting to be tilled.

Altogether, nothing very pleasant.

Every political party wants to be heard on every issue even if there is only hot air to be blown; no party wants to take kindly to a statement of another party as if they are engaged in a fierce electioneering campaign trying to undo one another. Yet, the elections are three years away. The campaign has heated up too early; and the people to whom the campaign is directed, the people to pass judgement, are struggling to exist, not to live.

The cause for the friction is not far fetched. The People's National Party wants to assert its mandate entrusted to it by the majority of the electorate. The party controls the majority in Parliament; the Presidency is in its hands, a situation which places the party in a comfortable position to insist that its wishes are done.

The other parties, on the other hand, view that with such a majority, it will be suicidal if the People's National Party is not held in check or is not made to follow strictly the basic law of the land to cut off any excesses of power.

Majority cannot consistently be right and the minority cannot always be wrong--it is a fact of life. Common sense cannot deny its support for this assertion. Nothing is more threatening to the survival of democracy than the insistence of the majority to trample over the minority by its sheer strength and might.

Past experiences have shown that where power is absolute, innocent citizens of different political opinions whose only mistake is to do a conscientious job fall victims to baseless suspicion and unjustified harassment.

The political game we have settled for must be played at all cost, but let it be played according to the rules.

In the rebuilding of our nation, a nation with a shattered economy, a faceless image and impoverished conditions, no individual is too big or too small; no individual is omnipotent, no individual is worthless and no contribution is insignificant. Party membership cannot be the overriding factor in deciding on who is big and who is small or who is right and who is wrong.

What is needed is cooperation in all fields to ensure the attainment of the desired goals of the society. But it stands to reason that cooperation cannot be achieved through force or coercion; cooperation is based on understanding, respect and trust.

In the absence of such understanding, respect and trust, things have to fall apart.

PNP'S INTRA-PARTY BICKERING SHOULD STOP

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 11 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Party Unity--A National Demand"]

[Text] As the debate on who should cooperate with whom in the administration of the country continues with renewed interest, one fact must serve as a guide to the ruling People's National Party.

It is the fact that the PNP administration holds office under the banner of Kwame Nkrumah, in spirit, and that the PNP's success or failure depends on the degree in which the ideals of Nkrumaism are fulfilled.

Some argue that the Government is only hastening slowly and that a year in office is too short a time to make a correct assessment of what the administration has in store.

However, time is still not on the side of the Government--the people are growing impatient, rightly or wrongly, for more action.

The lamentations on the regrettable national economic situation are justified, but they do not seem any longer to draw sympathy from the people. The election pledges should be fulfilled.

The party can achieve this not through petty jealousies and the hunt for positions, but through a united front and dedication to the ideals and objectives of Kwame Nkrumah.

The 'pull-him-down' signs within the party itself must give way to a healthy form of cooperation among members to present a united front, if the PNP administration should succeed.

The party must close its doors to the kind of personal jealousies that strengthened the hands of the 1966 assassins and made it possible for their coup to succeed.

As an amorphous group, the PNP cannot be completely free from petty squabbles, or ideological differences; but this should not be allowed to create animosity and hatred among party members.

Indeed, Ghana can ill-afford the luxury of petty party bickerings to the detriment of national progress.

BANE OF INTER-, INTRA-PARTY FEUDING SCORED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 22 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Politics--Factionalism and Extremism"]

[Text]

FACTIONALISM, buttressed by unwieldy extremism, has been the bane of the political life of this country. Unless Ghanaians resolutely abandon the selfish and parochial attitude to national issues, the tranquillity needed for the economic recovery would be eluding us for a time.

In the factories, the markets, the churches and even inside the political parties, one can clearly see a gradual return to the destructive tendencies which produced the country's present economic woes.

Under such conditions, the law becomes operative only when one's oxe is gored, damn the others.

The same conditions can drive a Government into a go-it-alone policy, for better or for worse.

May we have none of it.

Since the return to civilian rule, the "Times" has been urging all sections of the society on the need to tackle issues facing the nation with dedication and singleness of purpose.

A sense of unity must permeate the actions of all the political parties, be they in power or not, if the nation's desire to achieve economic prosperity is to be realized.

The fun of party politics can be expensive if it is allowed to take a greater portion of the nation's time

HARMONY

It is equally necessary that even internal strife in the various parties should give way to harmony in order to create a congenial atmosphere for the onward march in unity to national prosperity.

The ruling party, for example, needs undisturbed peace in its ranks if the nation should benefit fully from its administration.

So could the minority parties operate effectively and be of use to the State only if they kick against petty party bickerings.

As we stated in an earlier comment, the ruling party, understandably, has on its hands certain basic ideological questions, which need solution, in its own interest. The party, quite noticeably, has not rid of itself the evil habit of power struggle.

But we still maintain that as a ruling party, it would not be in the national interest if members submerge national issues under its own internal quarrels. There must be time for everything.

The nation should not be bothered with the prospect of being an unhappy spectator to such an exhibition of political commotion.

Our advice equally goes to the minority parties to set their own house in order to enable them to function without prickles on their seat.

Indeed, the nation deserves the kind of peaceful and quiet atmosphere needed in a post-war situation, to help her lift off from the doldrums in which she finds itself.

The mere struggle for positions or power is no answer to Ghana's pressing problems.

HOPE EXPRESSED ABOUT NEW DISTRIBUTION SYSTEM

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 16 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Streamlining Distribution System"]

[Text]

THE Minister of Trade and Tourism, Mr F. K. Buah, in his determination to ensure fair and equitable distribution of consumer goods yesterday announced a new distribution system.

Under the system, National, Regional and Constituency Committees are to be set up throughout the country to ensure improved distribution of consumer goods.

We are sure the consuming public, particularly those in the rural areas, will fully support the Minister in this difficult exercise. The system will also contribute towards eliminating middlemen and profiteers from the distribution trade.

The problem of eliminating trade malpractices from our economy cannot be under-rated because such evils have had serious consequences on the country's economy.

In a country like ours, there is bound to be hardships in pursuance of our economic goals. These include shortage of certain essential consumer goods and raw materials to keep our factories and industries going. However, when we consider the frequency of the changes in the distribution system, the first conclusion is that there is something definitely wrong with the wholesale and retail trade in the country.

Various methods adopted in the past to improve our distribution system have failed because there have been many loop-holes which have been exploited by middlemen.

There is no doubt that the new system, apparently drawn from previous distribution systems and experiences, will go a long way to thwart the activities of blackmarketeers.

The Minister was optimistic that the new system would remove past lapses. The success of the entire operation however, will depend on the selfless and dedicated service of the members of the various committees to be set up. Unless they exercise the utmost vigilance on unpatriotic middlemen the whole exercise, like previous ones, will fail. Goods, for Constituencies, may, for instance, be diverted for sale elsewhere for the benefit of a few selfish individuals.

It is hoped the new system will contribute towards the stabilisation of our internal distribution system once and for all for no useful purpose will be served if we always run away from the hindrances of one distribution system only to meet similar impediments in another.

JOURNALISTS, PUBLIC ASKED TO HELP PRESS COMMISSION SUCCEED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 13 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Of Press Freedom and Politics"]

[Text] Colonel FG Bernasko, leader of the Action Congress Party, called at the weekend on the Press Commission to plunge into serious work "to save a situation."

Fortunately, the commission has plans to tackle its assignment without delay. And on Monday, it held its inaugural session, with promising signs of fulfilling its mission.

The Press Commission as an institution, by itself, cannot conjure freedom like rain from the heavens if all concerned in maintaining the sought-for freedom do not cooperate to maintain the respectability and authority of the commission itself.

It is, therefore, necessary that journalists and the public at large cast away all prejudices and help the commission to achieve maximum success in its assignment.

Any attempt to drag the commission into personal political confrontations with the authorities, under the guise of press freedom, would be as unhelpful as making the commission a willing tool of the Government.

Happily, the calibre of members of the commission is such that one can rest assured that no amount of external influences or pure political sentiments can sway their way of thinking.

It is also our hope that political readers, will not unnecessarily disturb the work of the commission, which cannot be said to be unrepresentative.

We congratulate Mr Kofi Badu on his election as chairman of the commission. His election is, indeed, further proof that members of the commission are completely aware of the high standard of service required of them.

There is all reason to be confident that Mr Kofi Badu will bring his time-tested qualities of intelligence, diligence, and honesty and his long experience in the frontline of the fight for responsible press freedom to bear on his steersmanship of the performance of the commission.

GOVERNMENT SUPPORT FOR STATE ENTERPRISES ADVOCATED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 15 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Why State Enterprises Suffer"]

[Excerpt] Much of the public prejudice against State enterprises emanates from the general lack of a concern to get down to the real roots of the unsatisfactory performance of many of the enterprises.

To most Ghanaians, the State enterprises are not making money, and that is all there is to it. But the real story is more involved than that simplistic condemnation.

It is true that many of the State enterprises established by the CPP Government came at a time when there weren't enough qualified men to man them most efficiently.

But the establishment of those enterprises at that time was a vital economic necessity because the aim was to lay the infrastructure for the long-term economic development of the nation.

And the Government showed its awareness of the need to get qualified men to man the enterprises by the serious attention it gave to manpower training.

The value of the State enterprises and manpower training programmes has been demonstrated abundantly by the fact that many of the enterprises have eventually turned out creditably under the management of competent Ghanaians.

Therefore whilst the original basic problem for the viability of most State enterprises was the absence of men with the required qualification and experience to man them, now that problem has been overcome.

Support

That original problem has been replaced by another basic problem--inadequate Government support. It is not necessary to mention any particular State concern, for, the lack of adequate support is common to all of them.

The performances of most GIHOC and GNTC divisions, for instance, show that with the necessary Government support forthcoming, the two giant national economic organizations can perform far better than they do now.

Additionally, since most of the State enterprises are large employment organizations, it is socially vital that they should be kept solidly on their feet all the time.

UPDATE OF OAU CHARTER ADVOCATED

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 18 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "OAU and Border Disputes"]

[Text] The Organization of African Unity "Good Offices Committee" on the dispute between Ethiopia and Somalia meet in crucial session in Lagos today to attempt a permanent solution to the irksome border conflict between the two neighboring countries.

No one needs under-estimate the task to be performed. Border disputes, it should be pointed out, are not readily solved on sentimental phraseologies and some down-to-earth assessment will need to be undertaken by the committee if a solution of a lasting nature should emerge.

But there is an ironic lesson here for Africa. Had the OAU developed to the stage where it could exercise political direction, these border disputes would not have erupted into the major conflicts we are having on our hands today.

The truth is that the charter of the OAU has been overtaken by the tempo of events.

Conflicts between African countries only go to the benefit of Africa's enemies. They are those who stand to gain by them--by the divisions the conflicts impose and by the hatred they inflict upon ourselves.

It is necessary therefore that OAU does everything in its power to remove all sources of conflict among African states.

WORLD BANK LOAN TO OVERHAUL TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

Accra DAILY GRPHIC in English 7 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Breda Atta-Quayson]

[Text] The Government is to obtain a World Bank loan of 33 million dollars to overhaul the country's railway transportation system.

This will involve the rehabilitation of railway plants and equipment.

Mr Harry Sawyerr, Minister of Transport and Communications announced this in a speech read on his behalf by Mr ID Luri, Principal Secretary of the Ministry at a three-day conference of the Ghana Association Travel and Tourist Agents (GATTA) in Accra yesterday.

He disclosed that in the last financial year the government committed ¢5 million for track works. This year it has provisionally approved ¢26 million for further track works. The amount will also be used for the purchase of essential spare parts, repair of locomotives, replacement of signalling system and repair of terminals and buildings.

Mr Sawyerr said the government was also going to float a ¢25 million stock to raise additional funds for the railway rehabilitation project.

He explained that the World Bank loan would be used to engage Canadian and Indian experts to work in both in-line and advisory positions in the management of the Railways and disclosed that agreements had already been concluded in this respect.

The West German Government, the Minister said had granted Ghana a total loan of 78 million Deutsch Marks to be used in developing Volta Lake transportation system.

He said the programme to be pursued would include the provision of essential port facilities, the purchase of vessels, the construction of workshop and the improvement of roads connected with the lake transport system.

Mr Sawyerr further said that the Kotoka International Airport was going to be face-lifted. Extension works would also be carried out at the Kumasi Airport and a new airport built in Takoradi.

He said the government was bent on providing adequate, reliable, efficient, safe, comfortable and cheap transport services for the people.

In this connection, Mr Sawyerr said 200 Tata buses were on order to augment the fleet of the Omnibus Services Authority whilst large quantities of spare parts had been ordered to serve the existing vehicles.

FRG DELEGATION BEGINS DISCUSSIONS ON AID

AB021350 Accra Domestic Service in English 0600 GMT 2 Sep 80

[Text] The West German economic delegation now in the country yesterday held preliminary discussions with the minister of finance and economic planning, Dr Amon Nikoi. The discussions form part of this year's consultations on economic cooperation between the governments of Ghana and West Germany.

The leader of the German delegation (Dr William Eichmann), said his government supports the principles of self reliance and appreciates the efforts being made by the government to place the economy on a sound footing. (Dr Eichmann) announced that a total of DM 70 million had been earmarked for economic development and technical assistance for 1981. He suggested that instead of the annual discussions, consultations should be held every 2 years to give time to both parties to find enough priority projects for policy deliberations. (Dr Eichmann) said a study fund has been established to train experts. He however regretted that funds set aside for projects had not been fully utilized, and he called on the government to find ways of utilizing such funds more effectively.

On his part, Dr Nikoi said the government is trying to settle Ghana's debts systematically. He expressed his gratitude to the West German Government for its assistance, especially in agriculture. He hoped cooperation between the two countries would continue and that the delegation would carry home some of the country's problems for feasibility studies and subsequent assistance.

BRIEFS

FOREIGN-LANGUAGE BROADCASTS STILLED--Meanwhile, it is rather sad that what was once a forceful voice in the decolonization struggle of Africa is now silent--the External Service of the Ghana Broadcasting Corporation. Established in June 1961 by the late President Nkrumah the External Service which used to broadcast in six languages--English, French, Portuguese, Arabic, Swahili and Hausa--has been compelled to close down because of the inactivity of the transmitters at Tema. Consequently the views of Ghana on current world issues can no longer be heard outside her borders. Ghana Television is also suffering from the country's foreign exchange constraints. For the past two months, it has not been possible to use local films because the film laboratory had broken down. Thus, television news is not different from the radio news bulletin. Lively programmes like Agricultural Front cannot be shown at a time when the Government has launched a two-year crash agricultural programme. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 11 Sep 80 p 1490]

LOAN RATIFICATION--Parliament has ratified three foreign loan agreements between Ghana and three international financial institutions. Ghana thus becomes a beneficiary of $6m. US loan from the OPEC Fund for the Volta River Authority and $29.5m. US loan from the International Development Association for the Volta Regional Agricultural Development Project. The third loan of ₵35m. from the Agricultural Development Bank and the African Development Fund is to finance an oil palm plantation and also to advance loans to small-scale food crop farmers and fishermen. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 25 Aug 80 p 1628]

CONSTITUTIONAL CRISIS EVENTUALITY DENIED--Mr Kofi Batsa, chairman of the PNP Publicity Committee, has said it is a delusion for anybody to think he can embarrass the government by instigating a constitutional crisis. GBC quoted Mr Batsa as saying that no minority party should delude itself into thinking that it could bring the government down by a vote of no confidence. Mr Batsa was speaking at a Ghana-Romania Friendship Society symposium on the theme of "the relevance of an ideology in the country's socio-economic development." Mr Batsa said in Ghana's present socio-economic crisis, it was basically sound to adopt the policy of participatory government and seeking cooperation and concensus whenever possible. But if other parties would not play the game with the PNP, they would bear the responsibility which open confrontation would unleash upon all. The PNP could decide to go it alone but such a policy would not benefit the country, he said. Mr Batsa felt that Ghanaians could see through recent events and "judge who is trying to play politics with the country's misery." [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1677]

SINGAPORE CREW FOR BSL--A number of foreign crew from Singapore have arrived in the country to join hands with some "qualified Ghanaians" to man the Black Star Line (BSL) vessels. Mr Harry Sawyerr, Transport and Communications Minister who disclosed this in an interview with the "Graphic" in Accra yesterday would not tell the number of the crew. He, however, stated that they had gone straight to the vessels, adding that more crew would be coming in due course from India. The Minister noted that by the end of next week most of the vessels would have set sail. [Excerpt] [Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 11 Aug 80 p 1]

USSR BOOK DONATION--The USSR Embassy in Ghana has presented a collection of 230 books and teaching aids on the Russian Language and Literature to the Department of Modern Languages, University of Ghana, Legon. YOUTH FARMS ESTABLISHMENT--The Government has given approval for the establishment of youth farms to be financed with loans from rural banks as part of the two-year agricultural crash programme. As a first step, a seven-member inter-ministerial committee of experts drawn from the Ministries of Agriculture, Labor, Youth and Social Welfare, Education, Local Government, Rural Development and Cooperatives, Finance and Economic Planning, Transport and Communications, Natural Resources, Fuel and Power Science and Technology has been set up to draw up guidelines for the establishment of the farms. Mr FQ Amegah Minister of Labor, Youth and Social Welfare, who announced this at a press briefing in Accra yesterday, however, emphasized that the farms would be based essentially on the principle of private participation rather than state participation. Outlining the objectives of the scheme, the Minister said that it would be the contribution of the youth to the national effort in arresting the general food shortage in the country. It would also be an inducement for the youth to make their living through farming in the rural areas thereby curbing the drift of the youth to urban areas. Furthermore, the Minister said the scheme aimed at encouraging self-employment and self-reliance among the youth and improving the quality of rural life. He stressed that the Government would provide land preparation services on credit terms, arrange assistance from the Ministry of Agriculture in the form of counselling loaning of seeds, fertilizers and other facilities, and act as the main buyer of produce from the youth farms. The Government, the Minister said, would also assist with the provision of storage facilities and give incentives which would guarantee the success of the scheme. CMB PERSONNEL DISMISSED--Fifty employees of the Cocoa Marketing Board, including 17 senior officers, have been summarily dismissed for their alleged involvement in various malpractices such as smuggling and fraudulent deals. The senior officers, all stationed in Kumasi are, in addition, to refund a total of ¢204,498.38 which they illegally acquired through the preparation of vouchers for "ghost" laborers and defrauding the Board of 323 bags of sealed cocoa. The other 33 employees made up of drivers, security guards and purchasing clerks, who operated mostly along the border areas, were found to be involved in the smuggling of cocoa across the border. NKRUMAH INITIATIVES RECALLED, PRAISED--Events in recent years have vindicated Osagyefo Dr. Kwame Nkrumah in that if projects which he started had not been abandoned the people of Ghana would now be beneficiaries of many of them. Speaking during an inspection tour of the Kpong hydro-electric project, President Hilla Limann added that Dr. Nkrumah's critics said at the time that the most of the projects were prestigious, but they should now have realised how myopic they were and how far-sighted Dr. Nkrumah was. The President, therefore, urged Ghanaians to learn to recognise or even praise the good work of political opponents and stop the "pull-him-down" politics of the past which "have taken the country nowhere." Dr. Limann said "carping criticisms without suggestions as to alternatives are not the way to build a peaceful and healthy nation... Our independence and sovereignty shall be compromised unless we can erect a strong economic foundation at home. The completion of this project and others to follow will therefore help us build such firm domestic foundations." [Excerpt] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 p 1732]

FINANCIAL SITUATION--Money supply in the 12-month period ending April 1980 increased by 55 percent compared with a 20.6 percent rise for the corresponding period last year. The Bank of Ghana also announced that the urban local food price index rose by 10.2 percent in April compared to a 7.4 percent decrease the preceding month. The increase, it said, was the result of price increases in many food items, especially bread, maize, kenkey, gari and rice. Ghana's net uncommitted gold and convertible foreign exchange reserves rose at the end of April to ¢234.3m. from the provisional March figure of ¢186.2m. The level of reserves in April 1979 was ¢139.1m. [Excerpt] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 p 1734]

PRESIDENT MOI PARDONS FOOD HOARDERS FACING LOSS OF LICENCES

President's Remarks

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 26 Aug 80 pp 1, 32

[Excerpt] FOOD hoarders facing loss of their licences were yesterday pardoned by President Moi.

The President said he had taken the decision because too many people were involved.

He recalled that he had asked for a list of hoarders. But when it was given to him he found it too long. "I therefore decided to pardon them."

But the President warned: "If they repeat their illegal habit again, they should not blame me."

President Moi was addressing thousands of wananchi at the official opening of the New Nyali Bridge, the longest concrete bridge in Africa.

His warning to food hoarders was greeted with cheers.

The President appealed to the people to live by the country's principles and respect each other. He advised them to beware of those who did not follow the Nyayo philosophy of peace, love and unity.

Prosecution of Hoarders

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 1 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] THE Ministry of Commerce last week released a list of convicted hoarders, smugglers and other wrongdoers who were pardoned by President Moi. They could have lost their trading licences had it not been for the President's act. But, despite the pardon, a number of questions remain and we raise them because they are being discussed by wananchi all over the Republic.

First, the list comprises people and firms taken to court, charged and convicted. If they were convicted the public would like to know how many were fined or jailed, or both. It is also important to know what happened to the goods which they were hoarding or smuggling.

The Ministry's list also seems incomplete in other respects. It is not clear why there was no mention in it of some districts where hoarders have already been taken to court, charged and sentenced. But even more important is a question being raised by wananchi: Is this a complete list, since it essentially comprises ordinary Kamaus, Ochiengs and Langats and no "big fish" of the kind Parliamentarians were told during the last sitting as being among the culprits? Parliamentarians, including some Ministers, clearly told this nation that smuggling was being carried out by big fish. Have these people now stopped this trade? Or did they escape the net? Or is the list incomplete?

Whereas the pardon is in keeping with the President's policy of emphasising love, unity and peace at all times, it has raised more questions than provided firm answers in regard to the Government's policy on hoarders and smugglers. It has been explained that if the licences of all these people were withdrawn this would have led to wananchi face unnecessary hardships. Let us then grant many more licences to other individuals so that in future this concern for services rendered to wananchi will not be an issue in decision-making.

In the past the licensing process was essentially seen as a source of wealth or patronage for the politically influential. This should not be so since, more often than not, the politically influential are not good businessmen. Such a system lends itself to corruption and an extremely inefficient — and therefore expensive — distribution system which forces the poor wananchi to pay unnecessary charges for goods. Students of the Kenyan economy argue consistently that distribution costs are not only already high but that they are rising even faster because of a system dominated by political traders who understand politics but not trade.

We have said before that the issue of basic food and essential manufactures is too important to play politics with. We have said too, and in no uncertain terms, that those who hoard and smuggle are essentially working against the stability of our society and Government. We would like to repeat this for the benefit of those who have been forgiven and we urge the prosecution of anybody, be they influential or not, if they are caught in future.

At the same time, there apparently are grounds for fundamental objection to the manner in which licensing is being conducted in some parts of the country. There have been reported instances of late where all licences have been cancelled in an administrative area. Usually, this action is announced by a member of the provincial administration. The announcement of withdrawal of licences is usually coupled with a related announcement that the Administration will be involved in the granting of all new licences. A variation on the theme is where licences for a specific product, rather than all trading licences, are withdrawn. In this latter case the authorities seem to schedule the withdrawal each month of different licences for specific items.

There have been complaints by wananchi that these general licence withdrawals are disrupting trade. It seems these actions are not based on trade exigencies or ability, but rather that some influential persons are using the Administration to deny licences to some other individuals for political reasons. Some wananchi complain that traders can get their licences back if they take some politicians and administrators as sleeping partners. These manipulations of the licensing system only make the distribution system more expensive, with the costs eventually being passed on to wananchi in the form of higher prices. There is no reason why wananchi should continue to support these bloodsuckers.

In these times of inflation, the ordinary mwananchi needs a fair deal from the State if he is to continue with the task of building the nation. To give him such a break all those who increase the costs he has to pay for essentials should be taken severely to task.

To protect hoarders and smugglers is to court public anger and resentment. In future, therefore, we urge the single-minded prosecution of all hoarders and smugglers.

MOI ANNOUNCES MEASURES TO SUPPORT AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 30 Aug 80 pp 1, 24

[Excerpt] THE Government is to spend Sh. 700 million on an integrated agricultural development project.

Of this, one-third will be spent in Coast Province.

President Moi announced this when he opened this year's Mombasa Show at the Jomo Kenyatta Showgrounds, Mombasa, yesterday.

The President said the project was part of the newly-formulated food production policy being implemented by the Government.

"Let me affirm that food production for self-sufficiency must be regarded as a key objective in overall economic planning, with policies and programmes directly geared to an increase in agricultural output."

President Moi pointed to the recently increased producer prices for maize, wheat, pyrethrum, cotton and meat products. These, he said, represented compensation for increased input costs.

The President said additional credit facilities, especially for smallholders — to stimulate the use of better quality materials and adoption of modern techniques — had been made available.

He declared: "A part of the overall objective is, of course, economic health and vigour in all our rural areas. Economic development must mean the development of people and we shall, therefore, give even more stress to rural development because it is there that most of our people live."

Commenting on the integrated agricultural development project, now entering its second phase, President Moi said: "The basic objective of this undertaking is to provide services and facilities for small-scale farmers and, at the same time, to exert public enterprise for the removal of constraints on productivity."

The President said the project embraced food production, water conservation, supply of fertilisers, machinery and other inputs, expansion of co-operatives and credit institutions. It also covered power and communications, education and research.

He said: "In the development and promotion of national interests, a great deal will depend on our farmers. But the Government, on behalf of all the people, is doing more than its fair share to inspire and support agricultural production."

He continued: "On a countrywide basis, I require and expect extension workers to assist all our smaller-scale farmers to make the fullest use of the facilities and services provided.

"Alleviation of poverty is the main objective of our current Development Plan. And everyone must realise that this aspiration can only be met through expanded production and actual creation of wealth."

President Moi also called for greater co-operation between Government lending institutions, which give credit to farmers, and commercial banks.

He said: "I know that the commercial banks recognise the importance of agricultural credit. However many of them may not have the expertise and infrastructure for lending to farmers, especially the small and medium farmers.

"This problem could be overcome if commercial banks lent money directly to those organisations set up specifically for agricultural development."

The President said that, among such institutions, were the Agricultural Finance Corporation, Agricultural Development Corporation, the Co-operative Bank and the Kenya Farmers' Association.

"These institutions are closer to the farmers," he said. "At the moment, they do not have adequate resources to support farmers. Arrangements should be made through which commercial banks could lend to these institutions which, in turn, would increase their lending to the farming community."

MOI EXPRESSES DISSATISFACTION WITH SPLINTER CHURCH GROUPS

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 22 Aug 80 p 10

[Text] FREEDOM of worship is one of the rights guaranteed by articles of the Constitution of Kenya, and at the attainment of independence, about 1,000 sects were registered under the Registration of Societies Act. Today, officials at the office of the registrar of societies contend that there is no telling how many religious sects exist in Kenya. Partly because of the mushrooming of religious sects in the country, the government of Kenya has not been in a position to carry out investigations about the credibility of such sects — most of them splinter groups from established church groups — or that of their leaders. In the past, the government has only been worried by the activities of religious sects which it felt might undermine national security or development. In fact, only two religious groups have been banned for their activities in Kenya. The Dini ya Msambwa sect of Elijah Masinde was banned soon after independence for "preaching hatred" in the country, while in 1973, the government became concerned with the activities of the Jehova's Witnesses, and the sect was deregistered, only for the ban to be lifted sometimes later.

There is now evidence that the government is not going to view the mushrooming of religious sects with the same indifference as it did in the past. Addressing a fund-raising meeting at the Machakos African Inland Church last weekend, President Daniel arap Moi did not leave his audience in doubt what he felt about splinter church groups. Hitting out at disgruntled leaders in the church, Moi told them to quit the church if they could not carry on well with others. The president expressed his displeasure with church leaders who gave themselves big titles and observed that splinter groups always caused hatred in the church. He warned that the government would no longer register such groups because that would be tantamount to complicity in dividing the people.

The involvement of the church in politics has been a bone of contention between some church leaders and politicians, and there has often been controversy over where to draw the line between political activities and the role of the church as a moral agent in society. The president pointed out that where some church leaders formed splinter groups and caused hatred in the church, some people thought the government was behind them because it had allowed the registration of such groups. By all indications, church leaders seeking to have a breakaway church of their own will not have it easy in future. ■

EDITORIAL CLAIMS GREATER FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION UNDER MOI

[Editorial by Hilary Ng'weno]

[Text] IT is two years today since President Jomo Kenyatta died; two years which have seen a gradual transition from the Kenyatta era to the Nyayo era of President Daniel arap Moi. Within such a short duration of time there is little that a nation can do to change its basic characteristics. A lot that Kenyatta left remains intact today. Parliament remains supreme. The judiciary is free and independent. The rule of the law is the law of the land, and that is as it should be. But other things also have remained unchanged. Despite the strong condemnation which has been uttered during the past two years, corruption in high places continues unabated. So does tribalism. And that is not as it should be. The only consolation in this respect is that public pronouncements against corruption today sound a little more forthright than in the Kenyatta years. Hopefully, some action will one day be taken to reduce this particular menace to the country's stability.

There have, of course, been changes since Kenyatta died, some rather painful while others have been welcome. The country's economy has been buffetted a great deal by global inflation and by mismanagement at home. During the past eight months, shortages of essential commodities have made a mockery of Kenya's great reputation among African nations for economic development. And, as the country's leaders themselves admit, the near future is just as bleak as the recent past. But against this painful reality there is the enormous sense of freedom which now prevails in the country in comparison with the authoritarianism of the Kenyatta years. There is greater freedom of expression now under Moi than there ever was under Kenyatta, and to the extent that responsible exercise of freedom is a measure of maturity it may be true to say that Kenyans have at last come of age. That they have been able to do so only two years after the passing of the father of the nation may perhaps be a tribute to the tutelage they had under Kenyatta as well as to the tolerance of his successor.

CABINET ANNOUNCES INCREASE IN BREAD, MAIZEMEAL PRICES

[Excerpt] Bread and maizemeal prices rocketed last night.

The cost of a standard loaf and a 2-kg. packet of maizemeal went up by -/40 each.

The increase was approved yesterday by the Cabinet which met at State House, Mombasa. The meeting was chaired by President Moi.

A 500 g loaf will now cost 2/- instead of 1/60; maizemeal will cost 4/20 instead of 3/80 for a 2-kg. packet.

A 2-kg. packet of wheatflour will cost 6/70 instead of 5/55, an increase of 1/15.

The producer price of a bag of wheat goes up from 135/- to 150/-, while that of a bag of maize rises from 80/- to 90/-.

In recent weeks, there had been reported shortage of wheatflour, and more than 13,000 workers in the baking industry stood to lose their jobs as a result of the crisis.

Members of the Bakers' Association made efforts through the administration to get the millers to allocate them more flour.

The bakers had complained that they required 700 bags of wheat in Nairobi alone per day, but only got 100 bags between them.

The Government controls the prices of ordinary white bread, ranging from 250g, 500g and 1,000g to 1,500g loaves, as well as the 500g enriched (Premium) bread, currently selling at 1/70.

A NATION survey yesterday afternoon found that rice, including pishori, was again being sold in the open-air markets.

Traders were selling the pishori rice at 6/- a cup. Two cups of rice when weighed amounted to 3/4 kg.

A kilo of rice is 4/80 at controlled prices.

Also found in plenty in the open-air markets in Nairobi was wheatflour being sold freely.

MINISTER ON ELECTRIC POWER SELF-SUFFICIENCY

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 2 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] Kenya will invest more than Sh. 4.7 billion in the power industry in the next eight years.

The aim is to make the country self-sufficient in electricity.

Several hydro-electric plants will be built. The first one is to be commissioned in July next year.

This was announced in Mombasa last night by Energy Minister John Okwanyo.

He said the Sh. 400-million geothermal plant at Olkaria, to be opened next July, will produce 15 megawatts.

This plant will be followed by another of the same size which will be completed by the middle of 1983. The second unit will cost Sh. 260 million.

The Minister was presenting long service awards to workers of the Power and Lighting Company at Nyali Beach Hotel.

He said his Ministry wanted to give Kenyans power as cheaply as possible.

Hydro-stations

A power plant with a 40-megawatt capacity will be built at Masiga. They hydro-electric station is expected to be commissioned in October 1981.

Under the current Development Plan, Sh. 2,832-million hydro-electric power plant will be built at Kiambere--some 40 km downstream from Kindaruma power station.

This will be followed by the development of the Turkwell plant in Turkana District in 1988 which will generate 120 megawatts.

The Turkwell station will cost Sh. 1,300 million.

The Government will also intensify exploration for resources such as oil, natural gas, coal and uranium.

He said plans were also being prepared for better use of firewood and charcoal.

"The Government is also devising and introducing better methods of using biogas in addition to harnessing of wind and sunlight as sources of energy," he said.

COFFEE EXPORTS STILL 'NUMBER ONE CASH EARNER'

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 22 Aug 80 pp 35-36, 39-40

[Text] EVER since the 1977 world coffee boom resulting from a heavy frost that affected Brazil, the major world producer, things haven't been quite the same for their Kenyan counterparts.

World prices have fallen considerably since 1977. Although the average price for Kenyan coffee was slightly higher in 1979 than in 1978, there were serious price fluctuations during that year. While there has been relative stability at a generally satisfactory price to growers since the latter part of 1979, it is by no means certain that this stability will continue or that the average price can be expected to increase in line with world inflation.

The weather element has tended to worsen the sense of uncertainty in an industry that is Kenya's number one cash earner. The year 1979 was characterised by inadequate, intermittent and poorly distributed rainfall. The results of this were reflected in the low coffee crop totals (the lowest in three years) caused by poor crop setting.

In contrast, incidences of the October/November 1978 short rains together with distribution were fair and the period was largely characterised by below normal sunshine in nearly all coffee growing districts, thus causing marked reductions in evaporation. However, the rains were short-lived and the January to March 1979 period was marked by prolonged drought except in the eastern highlands, which had isolated showers.

A 12.5 per cent drop in the volume of coffee produced in the 1978/79 year as compared to the previous year came as no surprise. With only 74,337 tonnes delivered, the year was actually 26.6 per cent down from the 1976/77 total volume of 101,218 tonnes.

Much of the drop was in the plantation sector where performance was generally down by 20 per cent (or 6,876 tonnes) compared to 1977/78. For particular districts, the drop in quantity was significant, for example, 45 per cent for Mitubiri, 42 per cent for Makuyu, 33 per cent for Donyo Sabuk and 27 per cent for Nyeri. Only smaller coffee districts like Machakos showed marginal increases which, however, could not influence overall performances.

The co-operative sector performance for 1978/79 on the other hand tended to counterbalance with a minimal 3.5 per cent drop against a background of significant increases in Bungoma (71 per cent), Kisii (45 per cent), Meru (6 per cent) and other minor co-operative districts with 10 per cent increases. Poor performances in this sector were, however, recorded in Embu with a volume drop of 38 per cent, Kirinyaga 26 per cent, Kiambu 18 per cent and Murang'a 8 per cent.

In general, sector contributions to the volume delivered during 1978/79 were plantations 36.1 per cent and co-operatives 61.9 per cent with a balance of 2 per cent emanating from miscellaneous coffees and sweepings.

A programme that is expected to considerably enhance smallholder coffee production throughout the country was initiated in July 1979 to provide one redeeming feature in a series of shortfalls. It was during the 1978/79 coffee season when plans were drawn up and an agreement reached on financing between the Kenyan and the World Bank. The five year programme which will benefit from some 27 million dollars from the World Bank entails, among other things, factory construction, rehabilitation, farm input loans including labour, training facilities for both staff and growers and support services and facilities such as equipment, vehicles and buildings, and coffee research facilities at the Coffee Research Foundation.

Thirty two coffee processing units have been authorised for construction in the Coffee Board of Kenya's programme of services. Eleven coffee factories authorised earlier for construction were completed early last year bringing the total processing units in the co-operative sector to 568. In response to growing pressure from farmers to have mechanical facilities for parchment coffee, arrangements were initiated at the Coffee Research Foundation to install testing facilities which would determine the local applicability of various types, prior to recommending any for use in the field. Such units are seen as necessary by growers especially since natural solar drying of the coffee was hampered by erratic weather conditions.

The services the Coffee Board renders are invaluable. It was the first parastatal organisation in the country, having been established in 1933. After independence it gradually changed its composition to keep pace with the new era and the aspirations of local farmers.

Licencing is a major area of the board's concern. It operates at two levels. At the farm level the board licences coffee nurseries, coffee planting, coffee factories, smallholders and coffee societies. The board maintains a register of all growers and gives each of them a mark to distinguish their crop. The register, which is revised annually indicates whether the growers are big plantations, smallholders or co-operatives.

At the second level the board approves millers. The most important millers are the Kenya Planters' Co-operative Union (KPCU) which handles around 90 per cent of the crop. The board also licences coffee commission agents who are a vital link between them and the planters financially as a channel for all payments. KPCU is a principal commission agent.

The board licences warehouses and coffee brokers. Under the coffee act of 1972 the board has to execute policy matters, general administration and field services. It also has to ensure that the quality of Kenya coffee is maintained. Quality can be lost in factories and in warehouses and the board has a number of inspectors to make sure that this does not happen.

During the board's annual coffee conference held in May this year to adopt its annual report, several issues were raised by farmers regarding the industry. Most disturbing was the recurring issue of council cess which is unpopular. Certain coffee co-operatives last year resolved to seek the total abolition of council cess partly in view of the rising costs of coffee production and the unpredictable prices of the commodity.

By March this year coffee prices on the Kenyan market were fixed at shs 28,000 per tonne. According to the Cofffee Board of Kenya's monthly bulletin the major obstacle was variations in the cost of fertiliser, an important bearing on the farmer's profits. A doubling of the costs could easily cause a 20 per cent drop in profits and indeed these prospects worried the farmers.

During this year's conference farmers pointed out that county councils continued to collect coffee cess for the maintenance of roads leading to the factories when in fact the job was not being carried out.

The other recurring issue which came up during the conference was the question of government subsidies on farm chemicals and fertilisers. Rocketing inflation has made price increases in fertilisers inevitable. Indeed the only way out of an imminent loss in profits was to urge the government to subsidise such agricultural requisites so as to sustain production and quality.

Other issues discussed during the conference included export tax, neglected and mismanaged coffee farms, coffee research services to planters water supply in coffee areas, supply of electricity to coffee factories and secondary roads in coffee growing districts.

One issue which has since become very prominent in the industry is the introduction of harmful and bogus chemicals. In June this year certain farmers expressed concern about a chemical which they claimed had caused them a 50 per cent crop loss. The chemical, which they condemned as harmful, is a fungicide sprayed on coffee trees to control coffee berry disease. Its use was suspended in 1978 after the fungi were found to have developed resistance to it. Although there were no studies carried out to determine the extent of crop loss caused to farmers due to the use of the chemical before it was suspended, experts believed that it was considerable and the continued use of the chemical could have ruined the coffee industry within a couple of years.

In July, the following month, coffee farmers were reported as having lost coffee yields estimated at millions of shillings after spraying with ordinary limestone chalk sold to them by firms under the pretext that it was chemical protection against coffee berry disease. Doubts over the efficiency of the spray first surfaced towards the end of last year when several co-operative societies and large scale coffee plantations around Kiambu and Thika began complaining that their coffee was still vulnerable to the disease despite regular spraying.

Samples of the spray were subsequently sent to the National Agricultural Laboratories at Kabete and the results of tests showed that the spray powder was part Difolatan (a relevant chemical) and part limestone (chalk). Since then a government bill has been proposed to see that individuals who import agricultural chemicals, without prior approval by the ministry of agriculture, will face heavy jail terms and fines.

The bill, to be known as the Pest Control Products Bill seeks to empower the ministry to prosecute individuals and groups of individuals who do not comply with its regulations.

At the moment the government maintains a plant quarantine station at Muguga, which controls the importation of plants while its agricultural laboratory at Kabete controls the importation of agro-chemicals. However, the government claims it has no legal powers to act upon those who refuse to comply with recommendations regarding either the application or withdrawal of imported chemicals or plants.

The bill has been prepared and will be introduced in parliament when it re-opens.

Meanwhile the Coffee Board of Kenya has since reacted to the precarious state of affairs. Its deputy general manager, P. M. Katingima, stated in the July issue of their monthly bulletin, that a year is barely over since the days of anxiety and sleepless nights due to coffee smuggling and now they have to face this more serious menace. "The industry is now a playground for chemical racketeers who are selling chalk disguised as Difolatan or washing blue as copper for control of coffee disease," he stated.

'RACKET IN FARM CHEMICALS' THREATENS COFFEE CROP

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 26 Aug 80 pp 1, 32

[Text] KENYA may lose up to a seventh of this season's coffee crop because of a racket in farm chemicals.

Some 97,000 hectares are planted with coffee and of these, 68,000 are grown by smallscale co-operative farmers.

During the 1978/79 season, 74,000 tons of clean coffee earned Kenya £102 million.

But now, farmers have been duped into buying chalk and washing blue under the guise of chemicals to protect their crops from disease.

As a result, the coffee is vulnerable to coffee berry disease and leaf rust.

"We are expectingg a substantial drop in crop production because of this racket as well as weather fluctuations," Coffee Board deputy general manager P.M. Katingima said yesterday.

He estimated production would fall by between 10 to 15 per cent.

He advised farmers to beware of "unscrupulous suppliers who have been selling sub-standard or completely fake chemicals".

He said they should only buy from reputable distributors and, even then, "insist on having the chemicals tested".

A weekend survey showed major coffee growing areas had been affected by the racket.

The situation is so serious that Central PC David Musila has warned all farmers to "examine every packet or tin of chemical" they buy.

The hardest hit areas include Kiambu, Murang'a, Nyeri and generally means delaying or rescheduling programmes or undertakings in other areas," he said.

"The whole year-to-year business of development involves making a choice between projects that on paper seem to have the same priority."

"But", he said: "I am convinced that the decision to proceed with this project was sound. This is because over and above the other benefits I have described, I know that in the whole region there must evolve for our people everywhere new market outlets and new opportunities for employment and investment."

The President stressed, however, that "the motorists need not feel that they have been singled out for brutal treatment, since in fact the charge that they will be asked to pay for this vastly improved facility compares very favourably with charges levied for passage across the old Nyali Bridge."

He then referred to the requests for a permanent link between South Coast and the Island: "This must come in due time, when the balances and choices that I mentioned earlier determine that such a moment has arrived."

He said the opening of the bridge signalled his Government's continuing commitment to speed up the development of the whole Mombasa area.

He said this was in recognition of the town's importance as a gateway to the nation as well as in its own right.

President Moi thanked the Japanese Government for its £12m loan which had made the bridge possible.

He praised Sumitomo Construction Co. for completing this large-scale project within the estimates of time and cost.

He noted that the company had also trained hundreds of Kenyans employed on the job.

He said the bridge was "a significant national asset and an important element of our countrywide infrastructure".

The 400 metre-long bridge has six lanes and footpaths going both ways. Work on it began three years ago.

ESSO RESUMES SUPPLIES TO KENOL

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 21 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] ESSO has resumed supplies of refined oil to the Kenya Oil Company.

Kenol chairman Reggie Alexander said he was "most delighted" and hailed the decision by Esso as a move in the right direction.

He declined to comment on the nature of the new agreement reached with Esso.

By yesterday, Esso officials were tight-lipped on the matter and efforts to reach the managing director, Mr. Schneeberger, were unsuccessful

A source at Esso, however, confirmed that supplies of refined oil to Kenol were resumed on Tuesday.

Last Friday, Esso had, for the second time, cut supplies to Kenol, halting its operations throughout the country.

Mr. Alexander said Kenol had suffered losses for about five months before Opec announced new oil prices.

Such factors, he said, had made it difficult for Kenol to meet its commitments.

NYANDO MP URGES REVIEW OF SUGARCANE PRICE

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 26 Aug 80 p 27

[Text] KENYA may have to import sugar again if urgent measures are not taken to review the price of cane.

Nyando MP Onyango Midika said yesterday, that he had held extensive discussions with sugarcane growers in western Kenya and had concluded:

"It is only in Kenya, among the sugarcane growing countries of the world, that farmers are so badly paid and neglected."

Asking the Government to seek financial assistance from the World Bank to rehabilitate the entire sugar industry, Mr. Midika suggested that farmers needed incentives in order to grow more sugarcane.

He gave a detailed comparative analysis of the production cost for the farmer and the overhead cost for the factories that crush sugarcane.

He pointed out: "The review to increase the price of sugarcane per tonne should be achieved without having to increase the loss to consumers."

Justifying his demand for a review pricing, Mr. Midika cited:

- Input costs have risen sixfold since the last price of Sh. 133 per tonne was fixed;
- Cost of transportation of cane has risen by 8/-;
- It now costs the cane farmer 206/- to produce one tonne from which one bag of sugar is made.

Mr. Midika called on the Government to pay the farmer 220/- a tonne and to place responsibility for distribution of sugar with the Kenya Sugar Authority instead of KNTC.

EAP&L ADDS FUEL OIL SURCHARGE ON ELECTRIC POWER RATES

Details on Surcharge

[Article by Norbert Manywa]

[Text] THE East African Power and Lighting Co. Ltd. has slapped a hefty fuel oil surcharge on electricity tariffs.

The new surcharge is backdated to July 1, and is reflected in the August electricity bills.

Numerous consumers have complained to the NATION about the size of the increases.

One user of electricity said the current increase was the steepest he had experienced over a long time and wondered why an essential service like electricity should ever take more than a third of the incomes of the majority of its users.

The surcharge is calculated on scale at 13.9 cents per kilowatt hour.

The measure, applicable to both industrial and domestic consumers, will not help the Government keep inflation under 15 per cent. If anything, it will fan inflation.

A senior official of the Ministry of Energy admitted the rises were steep, but pointed out that the EAP&L needed funds to meet commitments made to the World Bank that it would achieve an investment return rate of 6 per cent in 1980.

He added that the only way in which the company could get additional funds was through a surcharge.

The agreement with the World Bank specifies that the rate of return on investment will be 6 per cent in 1980, 7 per cent in 1981-82 and 8 per cent in 1983-84.

But it was not clear why the EAP&L had not spread out the adjustment when it made the commitment in 1978 instead of invoking the precipitous rise at the eleventh hour two years later.

Fears are now being expressed that, unless the company is restrained from making such high rises in its tariffs, the Government programme of rural electrification will not be successful.

The company's chairman, Mr. J.K. Gecau, could not be reached yesterday to comment on the new rises.

This year, the EAP&L and its subsidiaries will command a consolidated net profit of Sh. 118 million. And, although a shortfall will be expected as a result of the drought early this year, which left the company's hydro plants dry, EAP & L still expects a modest profit of Sh. 16 million.

Explanation of Surcharge Rapped

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 29 Aug 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] The East African Power and Lighting Co. Ltd. has yet again slapped a surcharge on its customers, ostensibly necessitated by its promise to the World Bank to ensure a rate of return of 6 per cent in 1980. This rate is slated to increase in subsequent years and the implication of the EAP & L action is that it will go on raising charges in order to meet Bank rates of return on investment specifications.

The EAP & L is a public utility pure and simple. As such, it exists to provide efficient services to its customers, as the Chairman, Mr. J. K. Gecau, said recently. But serving the public efficiently is not synonymous with levying a stiff surcharge on its customers, as the EAP & L has just done without warning, particularly in these days of rising costs and extreme inflation. In the recent past, on the heels of the problems in February and March this year, when the public was never given a coherent and systematic explanation for the power cuts, we have been told that the company was on a sound footing. When there were Press reports suggesting that the company was recruiting overseas they were denied and we were further told that it had local personnel to do all the necessary work. One assumes that they are also competent to manage the finances of the company without resort to outsiders.

In spite of the sometimes contradictory statements about the abilities and plans of the company, many continue to argue that all is not well with the electricity industry. The basic problem seems to be its inability to plan ahead within itself without over-reliance on consultants. Plans, of course, are useless unless they are systematically followed up by adjustments, as necessary. Ironically, what goes as the National Power Plan is nothing more than a series of consultants' reports. And consultants, as everyone knows, are not always motivated in the best interests of the countries they are expected to help. It is in this context that we object to the explanation that the newest surcharge was necessitated by the need to meet a World Bank demand. One likes to think that the energy policies and affairs of this country are handled by the people of this country. Why, then, must the Bank be telling a national organisation how it should manage its affairs? It may be true that the Bank has financed some projects related to power generation, but does that give the Bank management rights over the power industry?

When the power crisis was with us earlier this year we wrote in these columns that the electricity industry, being a public utility, should explain to its consumers what problems it was facing and not just spring surprises on them. The context then was the debate on the cause of the shortages. The same point is relevant, and much stronger, with respect to finances. We know that the EAP & L is a public company and we, therefore, assume that there is not--and should not be--an overwhelming demand or desire for it to make profits.

The reasons for this argument are as follows: If power is too expensive we will not succeed in attracting large-scale industrial users whom we need to generate employment in our economy. Already a significant number of industries are making plans to relocate in Zimbabwe, which has abundant and cheap power. The cost of power in Kenya has therefore been seen in the regional context and not in terms of some narrow analysis of profitability. If there are silent partners in the power company who are pushing for profits they should be thrown out. The profits made in the past should be used for any cash which the company might now need.

At the same time, we need cheap power to begin to attract small-scale industries, particularly in the small urban centres. This is a point of view which is looked askance by the power industry but it must always be kept in mind. When the EAP & L produces statistics to show that there are too few customers in these areas who will become consumers at the current price of power, it does not tell us anything at all about how many possible customers there could be at cheaper power costs.

The other reason why we need cheap power is simply in terms of the ordinary household consumer, essentially in urban areas. With generally static salaries this year, plus inflation, it is unrealistic to increase the cost of electricity as the company has. This surcharge will significantly add fuel to the inflation we are already experiencing--with a resulting deterioration of the standard of living. Why should this industry damn the general economic well-being?

More realistic management of the power company will, we feel, lead to more rational use of machinery, financial and manpower resources--thereby leading to lower costs in the whole industry. If money, people and machines are used more efficiently the whole industry will be put on a sounder basis and give better service. Whether that is done now is for others to decide and execute, but we are clearly of the opinion that there is no good reason for the company to slap such a heavy surcharge on the public--whatever the World Bank says.

If it can be shown that the company needs extra cash for projects, something it has yet to convince the public about, then this should be raised over an extended period so as to lessen the inflationary impact on the general economy and on the man in the street. Already, following the increases this week in the prices of bread, maizemeal, wheat flour and electricity, manufacturers and others are talking of raising retail prices to the consumer. This mortal, already so hard hit he does not know if he is coming or going, cannot be expected to absorb much more without commensurate increases in salaries.

LADA POPULAR ON KENYAN MARKET

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 28 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] A RUSSIAN passenger car Lada, has become popular on the Kenyan market.

Lada, built by Fiat under licence in Russia, is expected to become one of the inexpensive cars on the Kenyan market a NATION survey has shown.

Car dealers in the city could not immedintely release the number of Lada cars, bought on the market but simply said "the car sells like hot cakes."

They said that as small cars became increasingly popular, the Lada finds an easy market.

The dealers said that since importation of cars has been restricted by foreign exchange quota, the smaller cars have been the dealers choice. This enabled them to obtain more cars and meet the increasing demand.

One dealer said the demand for cars has been increasing fast "There is no hope that the supply will be enough to satisfy it," he added.

The recent duty increase on large cars has reduced their number on the market and increased the demand for smaller ones, the survey revealed.

Dealers reckon that in the next five years or so, the number of large cars on Kenyan roads would fall considerably.

Before the advent of the Russian Lada car on the Kenyan market, local dealers have been going for more competitively priced small Japanese cars.

1974-1980 ARAB AID NOTED

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 30 Aug 80 p 9

[Text] KENYA has received aid totalling $261.67 million from Arab countries and their sponsored agencies in seven years.

The Kenya-Arab Friendship Society, quoting official Arab sources, yesterday said the aid was between 1974 and 1980.

But it does not include a "substantial financial assistance" pledged to Kenya by the United Arab Emirates this year, the society said in a Press statement.

The society said the total included aid given directly to Kenya through bilateral agreements and in the form of indirect loans provided by financial institutions supported by Arab funds, which included the International Monetary Fund.

The main donors were named as Saudi Arabia, Iraq and the United Arab Emirates. Others were the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa, the Fund for Arab and African Technical Assistance, the Special Arab Aid Fund for Africa (SAAFA), Kuwait, the Islamic Solidarity Fund, Opec Special Fund, the IMF (81.5 per cent from Arab sources) and the Industrial Development Bank.

The loans cover various development projects in Kenya. Some of the projects are textile and paper industries, water and health projects, rural development, social services, sugar mill, tea factory, hydro-electric project, roads, sewerage and funds to enable Kenya meet her balance of payment.

The society hailed President Moi's recent visit to Iraq and the United Arab Emirates which resulted in pledges by Arab oil producers to supply petroleum directly to Kenya.

DICTIONARY OF MASAI LANGUAGE, FOLKLORE REVIEWED

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 2 Sep 80 pp 10, 11

[Text] MAA: A Dictionary of the Maasai Language and Folklore. By Fr. Frans Mol. Produced by Marketing and Publishing Ltd. and sold worldwide through the Catholic Bookshop, Nairobi. Casebound with four-colour jacket: 192 pages. Sh. 100 a copy.

MAA is the outcome of 16 years field work by a Dutch White Father, Frans Mol, who has been working with the Maasai in Kenya for nearly 20 years. He is a little over 45 years in age, unassuming and is today one of the best spokesman for the Maasai people.

Unlike most Westerners who consider the Maasai to be "primitive" and "uneducated" Frans Mol has empathy and encounters wisdom in the Maasai. This is the reality of his life working and living with them.

He has been with them in Kilgoris, Lolgorien, Emarti, Loita Highlands, Ammanga and Rombo in Kenya.

Unlike the scholarly works produced by pundits at Schools of African and Oriental Languages or at departments of African Studies in universities abroad the mainstay of Frans Mol's study has been the people with whom he has been working and for whom he has developed an endearing attachment and love.

The Maasai are complex and all that a layman is concerned about is that they are a reality, and a living purposful entity, in the populations of Kenya and Tanzania. Time was when all the area we now call Nairobi was Masailand. So even now the Maasai exhibit traits of being all supreme and all-knowledgeable.

Education has had its impact and many of the present leaders who have suffixes of Ole are by tribe of Maasai origin. A key personality whom we encounter in newspapers and see on television is Mr Stanley Oloitipitip, who is the Minister for Local Government and was previously the Minister for Home Affairs.

A former Vice-President of Kenya, Mr. Joseph Murumbi is of Maasai origin and has now settled in the Maasai Mara region where he is engaged in enriching personal study and in plans to develop a massive ranching complex in the Maasai Mara.

Maa is an attractive book of 190 pages and typeset throughout in two columns to a page. This makes for reading like that of a Dictionary. But Maa is not just a dictionary of the Maasai language. It is the most well balanced and the most comprehensive introduction which anybody may wish to have of the Maasai people.

While all those who go to Amboseli and Kajiado and to Narok and to Maasai Mara may marvel at the Maasai people and show great interest in studying them there is no better, no immediate and no inexpensive way of beginning than by investing 100/- only in a copy of Maa. Schools ad colleges, and likewise libraries and reading rooms thoughout Kenya would do well to obtain copies of this valuable book for their libraries and reading rooms.

It is hoped that overseas where the Massai are so often talked about and mentioned, often derisively, attempts will be made so that Maa becomes the textbook on the Maasai, our graceful and all-so-overpowering people who add colour to life in Kenya and who in turn show us that all that is modern and all that is current need is not timeless. Their culture and their way of life is an eternal oddessy into the realm of eternal glory. — WRM

NORWEGIAN, EEC AID TO TURKANA

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 3 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] SEVERAL development projects in Turkana District will benefit from a more than Sh. 40 million aid from Norwegian Aid Agency.

The aid will be spread over four years.

The European Economic Community will also assist the district with 5,000 tons of maize for farm construction and between Sh. 5 and Sh. 10 million worth of equipment. The equipment needed will be decided on by the local District Development Committee.

Beneficiaries of the Norwegian aid are agriculture, health centres and forestry projects in the Turkana region including West Pokot District.

The good news was broken to members of the District Development Committee during their meeting with a planning team from Nairobi.

Leading the seven-man team of senior officials from the Ministries of Health, Economic Planning and Development, Agriculture and Natural Resources, the deputy chief economist in the Ministry of Economic Planning and Development Mr. J. H. O. Kidenda, said the Government would embark on a concerted plan to implement the projects.

ODINGA DEPARTS ON OFFICIAL VISIT TO UK

[Text] MR. OGINGA Odinga, chairman of the Cotton Lint and Seed Marketing Board, left for Britain last night.

This is his first trip to the UK in 13 years.

He will be out of Kenya for a three-week official tour.

Mr. Odinga, one-time Vice-President of Kenya and leader of the now defunct Kenya People's Union (KPU), last visited Britain in 1967 when he went there to launch his famous book Not Yet Uhuru.

A spokesman for Mr. Odinga said that, while in Britain, Mr. Odinga would hold detailed discussions with Ralli Bros. and Coney Ltd., together with their subsidiary company, the British Cotton Growers' Association.

The reason for Mr. Odinga's visit to Britain, the spokesman said, was to acquaint himself with the British cotton industry.

Yesterday morning, before his departure, Mr. Odinga paid a courtesy call on the British High Commissioner, Mr. J.R. Williams.

Mr. Odinga was appointed chairman of the Cotton Lint and Seed Marketing Board last November.

Since his appointment, he has urged Kenyans to take farming seriously and to follow the advice of Government officers so as to increase output.

BANKS LOSING MONEY THROUGH CASH FRAUDS, FORGERIES

Nairobi THE WEEKLY REVIEW in English 22 Aug 80 p 30

[Text] KENYAN banks are again losing millions of shillings through cash frauds and forgeries. In two national banks, the Kenya Commercial Bank and the National Bank of Kenya, large funds are mysteriously disappearing while in their custody. At the moment the greatest concern is not the cash actually lost, but that most of the money which is lost is through frauds and forgeries involving people working in the banks.

During President Moi's visit to the Kenya Commercial Bank headquarters in Nairobi last week, the bank's chairman, Mr. Philip Ndegwa, said that the bank had lost some shs. 1.7 million through frauds and forgeries, and a further shs. 1.6 million through cash shortages, in the last financial year. Said Ndegwa, "This is the Kenya Commercial Bank alone. . . . if we were to add losses from other banks the figure would be many times greater".

Besides banks, large firms and parastatal organisations have reportedly also been targets of this wave of crime. Except for the Kenya Commercial Bank, none of these victims have officially disclosed the amount of money that has been "stolen" through fraud and forgery but sources agreed that generally the losses have been through two methods. The first method involves monies which are normally left in the banks on the penultimate date of payment of salaries. Normally, both officials of the bank and a client scrutinize the amount of money involved and certify that the sum is correct in respect to the payroll. Both the parties then endorse the contents and the cash is left overnight for collection the following day. At the time of collection, either the entire payroll or a significant fraction of the payroll is found missing from the bank's custody. According to sources, the banks do not necessarily take responsibility in spite of the fact that clients are normally advised to take precautions by leaving the money in banks.

The second method is the most widely practised and involves forgeries of signatures of officials of prospective victim organisations on banker's cheques which are then cashed. For instance it has been reported that a few weeks ago, the Kenya Posts and Telecommunications was deprived of shs. 2 million through this method. At the time the KPT officials apparently went to the bank on realising the irregularity and confirmed that a cheque had been forged. The cash payment had already been made.

When cases of fraud and forgery caused quite a stir among banking chiefs four years ago, some of them attributed the involvement of bank employees in the racket to social circumstances. But others, among them the up-coming African managers, attributed the problem to factors existing within the banks. At the time they said that some banking staff were defrauding their respective banks because of frustration arising from outdated rules and lack of a clear structure for mobility. Under the circumstances, some of the employees are forced to use fraudulent means. ■

KENYAN-ETHIOPIAN AIRLINES EXPANDING SERVICES

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 3 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] Addis Ababa, Tuesday--Kenyan and Ethiopian airlines will begin operating daily flights between Nairobi and Addis Ababa from November 1.

The decision to increase services was reached here yesterday following a two-day meeting of aviation experts from the two countries.

The meeting had been convened to review co-operation in aviation as recommended by the Ethiopia/Kenya inter-Ministerial joint consultative meeting held in Mombasa last March.

The meeting also agreed that the two carriers should begin implementing pooling arrangements by November 1.

In order to make the two carriers economically viable, they will explore possibilities of joint commercial arrangements on existing as well as on agreed new routes.

Other agreements include technical and training co-operation on preferential basis, search and rescue, callibration of navigation aids and exchange of aeronautical information.

The Kenyan delegation to the ministry was led by Mr. R. S. Nyaga, Deputy Secretary in the Ministry of Transport and Communications.

SAMBURA RESIDENTS CLAIM AREA HIT BY FAMINE, DC DENIES CLAIM

[Text] Samburu residents claim the area has been hit by famine.

The gloomy news was brought to the NATION yesterday by a resident who trekked from Maralal to Nairobi by foot and bus to draw attention to the plight of his district.

Mr. Letayo Lereete said little rain had fallen in the area since April 1978 and that cattle, goats and camels had to be taken to Boran where there was little pasture.

He also claimed that maizemeal, when available, cost 10/- a packet and that a sack of Unga cost 160/-.

Samburu DC H. Z. Ambuka has promised to take "immediate" action to ensure maizemeal is sold at the controlled price.

Speaking on the phone from his Maralal residence, the DC told the NATION he had just received a signal from Mwamba DO and would act "immediately".

Mr. Ambuka said there was no food shortage in Samburu. "I am not aware of the problem, but I will carry out an inspection," he said.

Supervision

He said traders collected food from Isiolo and Nyahururu which was distributed under the DO's supervision. He said this ensured wananchi bought food at the controlled price.

The DC denied allegations that retailers had increased the price of maizemeal or that residents had to come to Maralal for supplies. "The food is taken to them," he said.

Meanwhile, residents of Wamba, Samburu District, are trekking many miles to get maizemeal because traders at the township have allegedly stopped collecting supplies from Nyahururu depot.

Boycotted

Two Kanu officials from the area told the NATION yesterday that traders had boycotted the commodity because retail prices were uneconomical.

Wamba Kanu sub-branch chairman Lekoki Lemelita, and Samburu district executive officer John Kalasinga, explained that traders felt it was expensive to fetch maize flour from Nyahururu about 300 kilometres away.

The traders, the two leaders said, were demanding to be allowed to sell a kilogramme of yellow maize flour for 1/60 but that the DC had told them to stick to the controlled price of 1/20.

STRONG SECURITY FORCE ALONG BORDERS 'STABILIZING FACTOR'

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 25 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] Since the government of the People's Redemption Council came to power four months ago, the Military leaders have been very concerned about the security of our borders.

On his recent visit to Harper, Maryland, the Head of State made it one of his first duties to visit the border post at the Cavalla River between Liberia and the Ivory Coast.

He expressed concern to the Minister of Defense, and plans were worked out to strengthen the security patrol along the Cavalla.

Growing concern for security along our borders should not lead anyone to believe that we are becoming increasingly suspicious of our neighbours with whom we have nurtured and maintained long and established friendship.

It is just that the time is now ripe, as everyone realizes, when the security of the state should receive maximum priority.

In the early days of the revolution, many in Liberia were uneasy at the reactions displayed by some of our neighbours.

The principles of non-interference which is enshrined in the Charter of the Organization of African Unity and to which every member country has subscribed, was overlooked and a committee was set up to look into the "Liberian situation."

Again, certain demands were made on the PRC Government, which amounted to outside interference. Naturally, these heightened suspicions in certain quarters, leading to the new regime becoming quite security-conscious.

Now, we have learned that the United States Government, a long time friend and ally of Liberia, is contemplating granting military and economic assistance to Liberia. This is good news.

While this government does not foresee engaging in any armed conflict with any of its neighbours, yet a strong security force deployed along its borders would serve a stabilizing factor in this revolutionary period of our history.

Anyone wishing to stir up trouble in order to destabilize the country, would think twice after finding out how militarily prepared we are to meet any foe or repel any aggression from without or within.

Secondly, what are friends for if, in time of national needs, they are unable to come to our aid and assistance? To make the Liberian Revolution a success and bring about a new society for social justice and equal rights, the economy of the country must be boosted and its security must be assured.

The Liberian Revolution is directed towards bringing reforms in our society to benefit every segment and promote growth in all avenues.

We expect those whose friendship we have long shared to help us in our noble design so that Liberia would emerge out of the revolution a true land of liberty with freedom and justice for all.

MINISTER DETAILS FOREIGN FINANCIAL AID, ECONOMIC PROBLEMS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 25 Aug 80 pp 1, 11, 12

[Article by J. Blamo Robinson]

[Excerpt] The Liberian Government is to receive financial assistance from foreign sources totalling 128 million dollars for 1980 and 1981.

Out of this amount, the American Government is expected to pump in 20 million dollars to be used for food, medicines, agricultural development, rural broadcasting and military equipment; while the West German Government would provide 23 million dollars to cover agricultural and forestry development, port rehabilitation, water development and road assistance.

The remaining 85 million dollars is expected to come from the International Monetary Fund to cover the proposed budget deficit of 75 million dollars.

This was disclosed by Planning and Economics Affairs Minister Togba-Nah Tipoteh when he addressed the National Press Club on the state of the economy at the Ducor Hotel Saturday night.

The expected financial assistance from these three sources was the outcome of the high-powered mission sent to the United States, West Germany and the IMF to negotiate with them on behalf of government in a bid to put the economy back on a sound footing.

Dr. Tipoteh told the press that with such assistance, he was optimistic that there would be no major obstacles in the passage of the 372.5 million dollar 1980/81 national budget, which has a near 20 percent increase over the last one.

He disclosed that shortly after the removal of the former administration, some international financial swindlers, seeking to take advantage of the new regime's urgent need for financial resources, entered the local scene with bogus offers of hundreds of millions of dollars worth of loans.

"True, the government is in great need of money; however, the crucial amount needed is in the order of 25 to 30 million dollars for easing the cash problem until the revenue situation improves and public expenditure controls begin to work efficiently. The government decided not to deal with the swindlers," he explained.

The Minister made it clear that while government had taken some definite measures to counter the destabilisation impact on the economy as generated through the "crisis of confidence" problem, the nation continued to feel the negative impact of the financial squeeze.

He said prices had risen significantly because of slowdowns in importation which had decreased the supply of goods considerably in the midst of rising demand.

He said another squeeze on the national treasury had been government's decision to set the minimum salary of soldiers at 250 dollars and 200 dollars for other government employees in an attempt to reduce the burden of the high cost of living on low income workers.

As a result of this financial squeeze, coupled with reduction in the supply of some goods, the Minister made it known that prices will rise even further as government employees spend nearly all of the 34 million dollars additional income.

He said the solving of the crisis of confidence problem was paramount because "we need to have our economy working first of all before we can plan and implement projects to reduce significantly the burning problems of massive unemployment, high cost of living, falling stands of living, an extremely high infant mortality rate, low productivity and gross inefficiency in the management of the public sector.

MINISTER CALLS FOR REPEAL OF PRC DECREE ABOLISHING STRIKES

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Aug 80 p 8

[Article by Napoleon Teage]

[Text] The Minister of Planning and Economic Affairs, Dr. Togba Nah Tipoteh, has called for a repeal of PRC Decree No. 12, which abolishes workers' right to strike because it contravenes the convention of the International Labour Organization (ILO) to which Liberia is signatory.

Speaking last Saturday at the Ducor Hotel, Dr. Tipoteh said the right of workers in Liberia to strike was fundamental and that the rights of workers, like the rights of other people, must always be respected.

He attributed most of the strikes by workers since the revolution to what he called a "pouring" out of frustration.

Dr. Tipoteh, who was addressing members of the Liberian Press at its regular monthly meeting, also noted that while it was true that workers have the fundamental right to strike, it was equally true that strikes should not be encouraged for the mere purpose of creating industrial unrest.

He said this would have a negative impact on the economy of the country as government's revenues drop drastically.

The nation's chief economic planner said that Decree Number 12 stemmed from what the "PRC considered a measure to end threats of closure" by several business enterprises as a result of mounting labour unrests following the coup.

Dr. Tipoteh observed that it should never be forgotten that the "working people of this nation of ours are the strongest supporters of the revolution."

He asserted that the task of the PRC Government was to promote workers rights by serving as a catalyst in the process of converting what he referred to as "long standing workers frustrations" into energy for increased workers' productivity.

"We have to work towards the repeal of Decree Number 12 if we want to have the continued confidence of the Liberian people in particular and the international community in general," Dr. Tipoteh said.

The history of Liberia, he noted, was filled with examples of how laws directed against workers "do not reduce workers."

What minimizes workers' uneasiness, Dr. Tipoteh pointed out, was the establishment of conditions under which workers could organize freely, be free to choose their own leaders and negotiate with management within the framework of the labour laws of the country.

Dr. Tipoteh also disclosed that since the April 12 revolution, some 21 doctors (most of them Liberians) have resigned their jobs at the JFK Medical Center and other hospitals and fled the country.

He said government is currently identifying means by which "to close the gap between what it says and what it does."

Earlier, the Chairman of the Press Club, Mr. J. Blamo Robinson, welcomed the people and said that their mass turn-out at the meeting was an indication that they were all greatly concerned about the state of economy of the country.

PRC CALLED UPON TO REQUEST MAJOR CREDITORS TO WAIVE DEBTS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 27 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] Speaking at a crowded press meeting last weekend, Economic and Planning Minister, Dr. Togba Nah Tipoteh touched on many salient issues pertaining to Liberia's economy.

Considering the ailing economy that the PRC has inherited, most of the issues raised by the Minister come as little surprise.

However, one sore point that Dr. Tipoteh laid finger on was what he called "crisis of confidence." To many business people, when such a description is labelled on any economy, the need to rectify it becomes a paramount preoccupation of any government that knows where it is going.

As the eminent Economic Minister himself acknowledged, the "crisis of confidence" which the April 12 brought in its wake, has given rise to a situation whereby "investors drastically reduced their level of participation in Liberia's economy."

This has led in turn to what Dr. Tipoteh called a "financial squeeze" which has rendered the Liberian economy bereft of adequate supply of money "to meet the basic requirement of the economy."

This is no doubt a gloomy economic state of affairs. It becomes even gloomier against the background that the country has since 1974 ceased to enjoy the 5 per cent rate of economic growth it used to.

With the present investment stagnation, increased capital flight and the frozen commercial credit lines, we cannot help but scratch our heads over the state of our economy.

The economic mistrust and bickering that has ensued between business concerns and their creditors (particularly commercial banks) has only added fuel to the smouldering economic jam now experienced by our economy.

Already there are reports of inadequate supplies of certain commodities, baby-milk being one of them, just because creditors remain jittery in opening up their credit lines to our businessmen.

Given this dismal picture of the economy, it becomes very clear, even to the most optimistic fortune-teller, that the People's Revolutionary Council Government will have to move very fast to head off the unwelcome economic stalemate that usually accompanies social upheavals of the kind here in April last year and April this year.

This becomes even more compelling when considered against the fact that of the $700 million that Dr. Tipoteh (in his first press meeting after the coup) said Liberia owed to foreign debtors, $40 million is said to be due in this month!

In this particular case, we call upon the PRC to explore the possibilities of not only rescheduling some of our loans, but also requesting our major creditors, particularly the U.S., to waive our debt obligations. Indeed the urgency of our economic plight makes this sacrifice on the part of our creditors a minuscule.

This is just a short-term solution. The long-term strategy is to grapple with the "crisis of confidence" that is so apparent in the business sphere.

As international political situations cannot be artibtrarily divorced from both domestic and international economic considerations, a point stressed in the six-point proposals submitted recently by bankers, and echoed over the week-end by the Economic and Planning Minister, the first step toward abating the nervousness that has gripped our economy is to solve the political issue.

By so doing, we are convinced that both external and internal help will come in handy.

CURFEW LEADS TO 'ALARMING INCREASE' IN BURGLARY IN MONROVIA

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 25 Aug 80 p 12

[Article by Mike J. James]

[Text] An alarming wave of burglaries has hit Monrovia, reports reaching our news desk indicate.

"Unless the government takes firm steps to secure business establishments during curfew hours, we might wake up one day and find all the stores empty!"

These were the words of the proprietor of a leading department store which was recently swept clean by burglars in a daring midnight operation during which they burst their way through a heavy steel door and safe, making away with goods and cash estimated to be over $65,000.

The proprietor, Mr Rizkallah Serhan of Serhan Electronic Store on Broad Street, explained that businessmen all over the city "are terribly worried over the rate at which burglaries have become more devastating and frequent.

He pointed out that government should not only say that businesses are protected, but should actually take positive steps to see that they are protected, especially by deploying soldiers and police to strategic areas of the city.

Unless this is done soon, Mr. Serhan warned, there is a good chance that burglars could drag the country's economy to a complete halt.

Since a dusk-to-dawn curfew was imposed on the country shortly after the April 12 military coup, there has been an alarming increase in burglary incidents, leaving a sizeable number of businessmen crying over the shoulders of the PRC Government.

Observers believe that the emptying of streets during curfew hours have been largely responsible for luring a bumper harvest of robbers to lucrative stores where they carry out their sinister operations unmolested.

There are suspicions among the public that some armed personnel have been involved in some of the burglary operations.

AMBASSADORS EXCHANGE WITH USSR--A spokesman for the Lesotho Prime Minister's Office in Maseru has denied that the intended exchange of ambassadors between Lesotho and Russia has suffered a setback since last week's talks between the Prime Ministers of Lesotho and South Africa at Peka Bridge. He was reacting to a Rand Daily Mail report yesterday that there had been a setback to the proposed exchange. Earlier this year it was announced in Maseru and Moscow that the two countries had agreed to establish diplomatic relations at ambassadorial level, and were to exchange ambassadors. The spokesman at the Lesotho Prime Minister's Office did not disclose when the proposed exchange would take place. The percentage of Christians in Lesotho--more than 75%--is one of the highest in Africa. Many are strongly against the establishment of diplomatic relations with Russia and Cuba. IRAQI-MALAGASY COOPERATION DESCRIBED

Iraqi Ambassador Visits Health Minister

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 7 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] Sem Al Kassab Nisan, Iraqi ambassador to the RDM [Democratic Republic of Madagascar], paid his first courtesy visit to health minister Dr Jean Jacques Seraphin yesterday morning.

It was merely a courtesy visit, but one which enabled the two men to talk about the public health situation in Iraq and to discuss possibilities of cooperation between the two countries.

The ambassador informed the minister that malaria, schistosomiasis and cholera have been eradicated in Iraq. Drainage of ponds and lakes is one of the methods used by the Iraqi Government to combat the first two diseases mentioned.

With regard to the training of physicians, 1,500 doctors are graduated each year from the University of Baghdad, where there are four medical schools. There are three medical schools in provincial locations.

Thirty thousand physicians work for the Iraqi Government. They are all government employees (there are no private doctors). The ratio of doctors to people is 1:3,000.

The minister expressed his interest in the methods of combating malaria and schistosomiasis used by the Iraqi Government to eradicate those diseases.

He also requested guidelines for cooperation between the two countries with a view to outfitting hospitals with laboratory and X-ray equipment, for example.

Views were shared concerning the measures to be taken to initiate cooperation: there must be an exchange of practical knowledge. Malagasy experts will visit Iraq to learn about the Iraqi health organization and Iraqi experts will visit Madagascar for the same purpose.

Finance Minister Receives Ambassador

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 7 Aug 80 p 2

[Text] Sem Alkassab Ihsan, Iraqi ambassador to Madagascar, paid a courtesy visit to Mr Rakotovao Razakaboana on Wednesday afternoon, 6 August. The two men talked about the possibilities of new agreements between Madagascar and Iraq at the time of implementing the second plan. It must be noted that Iraqi-Malagasy cooperation is promising, particularly following the summit of non-alined nations in Havana and President Didier Ratsiraka's official visit to Baghdad, occasions which enabled our distinguished leader and President Saddam Hussein to give concrete shape to the ideas expressed. Thus Iraqi aid to Madagascar, Mr Takotovao Razakaboana pointed out, was implemented quickly to offset the large oil bill posing so many problems for Third World countries which do not produce petroleum. Iraqi cooperation is even more appreciated, Mr Rakotovao Razakaboana concluded, since the proposal was immediately followed by action. The two men subsequently exchanged views on the organization of the ministries of finance and economic plans in their respective countries.

NEW RAILROAD TRUNK LINE INAUGURATED

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 11 Aug 80 pp 1, 5

[Text] "Chemins de fer mahavita azy!" was the compliment paid on Saturday at Ambila-Lemaitso by representatives of the Revolutionary Government to the Malagasy National Railroad System's [RNCFM] entire staff, to General Director Adolphe Rakotoarivony, to the lowest worker and naturally to the supervising ministry headed by Mr Jean Bemananjara.

It was the occasion of the inauguration of the first section of the railroad bypass between Brickaville and Ambila-Lemaitso (12.635 km). That praise is most appropriate in view of the RNCFM's efforts to renovate and modernize its equipment and production methods for the purpose of improving rail traffic, which occupies a very important place in our economic revolution.

The reason itself for this bypass is self-explanatory: eliminating the limitations resulting from the very cumbersome features of the old line's layout and contour.

This bypass project will also make it possible to stop using traction engines, which will favor economy of fuel, train crews and maintenance personnel and savings in the case of railroad maintenance expenses. An improvement in the quality of service is also expected: a 40-minute gain in time, considering on one hand the elimination of operations in stations to couple and uncouple the traction engine and the increase in speed on the other hand.

Finally, this new line will result in a profitability rate of almost 11 percent when it goes into service.

Some Figures

The Ambila-Brickaville line to be put into service includes, among other things:

Infrastructure: Length: 8,338 meters. Earthwork: 382,000 m^3 of cuts and 788,000 m^3 of fills, or 120,000 m^3 of earthwork per kilometer. Largest fills: 24 meters above natural terrain. Structures: a 150-meter bridge of prestressed concrete over the Pangalanes (154 million Malagasy francs); a 90-meter bridge of prestressed concrete at PK [expansion unknown] 6.352 (116 million Malagasy francs). These two structures required only 2,810 m^3 of concrete and 205 tons of steel. Water drainage structures: 95 meters of concrete pipe and 627 meters of metal pipe, including some 3.5 meters in diameter, 4,680 meters of masonry drainage ditches.

Superstructure: Track of steel rails, grade 70, type S 40, weighing 36.5 kg/m, welded in place by aluminothermy process. Sleepers at the rate of 1,660 ties per kilometer, made of native timber impregnated at the RNCFM's Andasibe Forest Industrial Complex. Ballasting: 600 m^3 per kilometer.

Cost of Line

Earthwork: 611 million Malagasy francs, including 214 million from outside assistance and 397 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

Drainage Structures: 92 million Malagasy francs, including 63 million from outside assistance and 29 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

Pangalanes Bridge: 154 million Malagasy francs, including 104 million from outside assistance and 50 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

Bridge at PK 6.352: 116 million Malagasy francs, including 80 million from outside assistance and 36 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

Superstructure: Rails, ties, ballasting: 117 million Malagasy francs, including 90 million from outside assistance and 87 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

Total: 1.150 billion Malagasy francs, including 551 million from outside assistance and 599 million from the RNCFM's own funds.

The System

The RNCFM's staff numbers 4,639, with 43 engineers and management personnel. Its 1979 sales amounted to 7 billion Malagasy francs. The system's length is 1,030 kilometers, including 900 kilometers of main lines. Its equipment includes: 33 locomotives, 12 railcars, 92 passenger cars and 1,224 freight cars. Comparative performance per 850-CV [expansion unknown] operational traction unit: 1971: 13.5 million traction units; 1979: 14.5 million traction units. The year 1971 was used as a reference year, since the RNCFM's performance per traction unit that year ranked first in Africa according to the UIC's [expansion unknown] classification.

STABEX ALLOCATION FOR VANILLA REPORTED

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 12 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] The European Communities Commission has just signed an agreement with the Democratic Republic of Madagascar for transferring 2.845 million UCE [EEC account units], ot approximately 830 million Malagasy francs, to offset the reduction of revenue from vanilla exports to EEC countries in 1979.

Under the Lome agreement, the signatory nations have set up a system (called STABEX) for assuring revenues from the exportation of certain products to EEC countries. The purpose of this is to alleviate the disastrous effects of unstable export revenues. The transfers made offset the losses in export revenues for the products covered. They will be repaid to "STABEX" only when revenues have again reached their normal levels.

This system was an innovation in relations between industrialized and developing countries. It continues to be a model for such relations, a model on which the Lome Convention II has established a system more complete than before.

Madagascar is involved in the case of the following products: hemp, coffee, vanilla and cloves. The transfer just decided is the third from which Madagascar has benefited. Hemp enjoyed compensation measures in 1977 in the amount of 1.763 million UCE, or 488 million Malagasy francs, and the following year cloves enjoyed a transfer of 1.139 million UCE, or approximately 320 million Malagasy francs.

AGRICULTURAL SITUATION SEEN AS GENERALLY GOOD

Crop Situation Detailed

Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] MZUZU
Monday

MAIZE yields being generally better than had been anticipated in the wake of the drought that affected parts of the Southern Region, there was however ample maize supply in all areas of the country, says a Ministry of Agriculture and Natural Resources monthly report for July.

The report, which is compiled by the Ministry's Headquarters in the Capital, reflects a generally favourable growth and local marketing performance of four of the nation's main crops: Maize, groundnuts, tobacco and cotton.

Under 'maize' the report says: "Maize yields were generally better than anticipated in the main growing areas of the Central and Northern Regions. Sales to ADMARC markets continued, but many farmers were holding back some for fear maize may become scarce later in the year."

While the early planted maize crop was maturing, the report states that planting of the winter crop gained momentum during the month. Stalk borer disease, which was the main problem for the growers, was checked by measures which were employed to contain the attack.

Because of these satisfactory maize growth and marketing records, "there was ample maize supply in all areas," the report adds under 'food situation.'

Shelling, grading and marketing were the main activities for groundnuts farmers. But market for RGI variety in the Phalombe area was yet to start, adds the report which is dated August 19.

For tobacco farmers, grading and marketing continued. In the case of Burley and Flue-Cured Tobacco, nurseries and bigger fields were also being prepared, whereas for Western Tobacco, other activities included mulching and burning nursery stalks.

Picking, grading, marketing and stalk uprooting were the main engagements for cotton growers. Sales of cotton in the Shire Valley were more than had been anticipated, the report says.

Maize, groundnuts, cotton and tobacco are four of five crops which account for a greater part of agriculture's foreign exchange earning force in Malawi. The fifth is tea which has not been dealt with in the July report.

But the two-page report covers such other crops as rice, macadamia and cashew nuts, millets and sorghums, fruits and vegetables, root crops, wheat, pulses and coffee.

July saw the start of dry cassava preparations in the Southern Region. Local marketing of sweet potatoes continued while the dimba Irish potato crop was being planted.

Kwenengwe ADMARC and the canning factory in Mulanje continued purchasing fruits and vegetables from smallholders and, the report says, various types of fruits and vegetables were still available in all parts of the country.

Transplanting of the winter rice crop started, marketing was completed in the Southern Region, but continued in the Central and Northern Regions. Harvesting of other millets and sorghums tailed off during July.

Planting of dimba pulses was continued while the growth of the earlier planted crop was good, according to the report.

For coffee farmers, picking and spraying were the main activities during the month of July. Marketing of cherries progressed well.

The growth of wheat, which ranged from the booting to the ripening stages, 'was satisfactory.' Birds scaring was the main occupation for wheat farmers, the report says, adding: "irrigated wheat at Likangala in Zomba was very encouraging."

Clearing fire breaks was the main engagement for cashew and macadamia nut farmers during July. Young bushes were doing well while old trees continued flowering and fruiting.

All this farming activity was happening in the background of generally cloudy and cool weather.

Chiperoni conditions continued in the Southern Region and slight showers were experienced in isolated high grounds of the Northern Region throughout the North. —MANA

Self-Sufficient in Seeds

Blantyre DAILY TIMES in English 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] Blantyre Tuesday

THE National Seed Company of Malawi Limited (NSCM) has intimated that despite the adverse weather conditions which affected much of Malawi, adequate seed has been produced from the main seed production areas in Central Region, which, together with the previous year's reserve seed stocks, ensures that Malawi is again sufficient in all varieties of its major agricultural crops, such as maize, tobacco, beans, groundnuts and soyabeans. This has been disclosed in a Press release.

Particularly pleasing is the supply situation of the main maize variety — MH12 — bred and produced for the major maize production areas in Malawi, and it is in ever-increasing demand by the smallholder sector as a high yielding cash crop. This variety has compared most favourably with the old control variety of SR52 previously grown in Malawi, in both Ministry Research Branch trials and the commercial sector, and demand in the rural areas is expected to "take off" dramatically over the next few years.

The new NSCM factory at Kanengo, one of the most modern in Africa, is now fully operational and much of this year's stocks has already been processed and packed, allowing early delivery to ADMARC depots in all areas of the country, to ensure the farmer has access to his seed supply in plenty time for planting.

According to the Press release new developments by the NSCM for the farmer include arrangements with a foreign seed company to allow production of their hybrid sunflower and hybrid sorghum varieties for use in Malawi. These hybrid sunflower varieties in particular have performed well in observation trials last season, and will be put out on a wider scale this coming year.

At a time when much world attention is being focussed on the use of sunflower oil, not only as a source of vegetable oil, but also as energy, it stated, these new high-yielding, high oil content varieties could well have a most important part to play in future agricultural development in Malawi.

Further tentative lines being looked at by NSCM include investigations into vegetable seed production of some of the major horticultural species grown in Malawi.

Whilst maximum attention is being paid to the internal seed supply situation, the NSCM is building up export trade links, not only with neighbouring countries, but also the European market, and already contracts have been arranged with a UK seed firm, for the supply of bean and cucumber seed. It is NSCM's intention to build as much as possible on this export trade, and hopefully seed sales could become a major foreign exchange earner for this country.

All seed is produced to exacting field and laboratory standards, processed and packed in NSCM's ultra-modern factory, packed to meet customer demand, to ensure a quality product to the farming community. While many factors affect crop production, the use of quality tested seed cannot be overstressed, especially as the seed input is generally but a small part of the total costs of production of a crop.

All NSCM seed stocks are available throughout Malawi from all ADMARC depots, as well as the NSCM factory at Kanengo, Lilongwe, and through the Agricultural Trading Company Limited (ATC) in Limbe.

TRAORE URGED TO GIVE UP POST OF PRIME MINISTER

Dakar AFRICA in French Jun-Jul 80 p 35

[Text] The situation looks pretty bad. Moussa Traore is grasping at something, no one knows exactly what, but it may just be a certain sense of honor: He does not want to admit defeat. But the sense of honor is rather misplaced: Indeed, it is a question of honor no longer, it is simply obstinacy.

Civil servants are accustomed to waiting long weeks for their salary--when it comes. They are, therefore, discouraged and are literally accomplishing nothing. There is no sense of solidarity with a regime now regarded as incompetent and evil, there is no sense of civic duty.

Retirees who receive their pension every 3 months stand in line at the windows, and blessed are those who stand in line first, because, inevitably, there comes a time when windows close: There is no more money, come back tomorrow. Older people, moreover, have a tough time: If they happen to have a grandson or grand-nephew whose whereabouts are unknown, then one can see that feelings of love are non-existent.

The proximity of exam time has given the regime some respite; this period will be increased by vacation time. In such circumstances, the great majority of candidates will inevitably succeed. This does not mean that they will do well during their examinations, since their studies were rather botched. It does not bode well for the future. It is entirely possible that equivalency will not be granted elsewhere for the 1980 Malian baccalaureate.

No matter where one looks, the future appears bleak. Reportedly, there is one recourse, a lone one, which is being whispered around during the long evenings in the huts: Moussa Traore should take a step backwards, he should divest himself of two elements in his triple crown. He is chief of state, head of government and minister of defense. Let him remain chief of state: The Malian people, who regard him as a victim of his entourage, would agree to that, so long as he would choose a prime minister who would not be the king's man, who would command respect and restore honor to Mali.

No one can understand the situation; no one admits it can last. A difficult month of October awaits at the end of the vacation period.

RAILWAY SYSTEM UPDATING TO USE PORTUGUESE COOPERATION

[Article by Jose Caetano]

[Text]

MOZAMBIQUE intends to recruit nearly 3 000 artisans and technicians from Portugal to help in the planned modernisation and expansion of the Mozambican railway system and ports, according to informed sources in Lisbon.

The Portuguese technicians will fill posts in the various technical departments of the newly created Southern Africa Transport Commission which is based in Maputo.

The establishment of the Transport Commission was one of the decisions taken at the Summit of Southern African States in Lusaka last April.

The intended recruitment will cover a wide variety of badly needed skills and will include railway maintenance and repair crews as well as trained staff for the handling of cargo at the Mozambican ports of Maputo, Beira and Nacala.

The unreliability of the Benguela railway line and severe operational problems on the Tazara line linking Zambia to the Tanzanian port of Dar es Salaam have forced Zaire and Zambia to re-route a substantial portion of their imports and exports to Mozambique ports.

At present Zaire is almost exclusively dependent on South African ports.

The Tazara line, built five years ago by Chinese engineers, has been neglected lately because of Zambia's complaints of slow and careless handling of cargo at the Dar es Salaam port. The 1 860km line cost R440-million to build.

Two months ago the Tanzanian Minister of Transport and Communications, Mr Augustine Mwingira, asked Zambia for an undertaking that it would export 45 000 tons of copper a month through the line in order to make possible the realisation of the projected R55,6-million revenue for the year 1980-1981.

Others countries that are planning to increase their use of Mozambican ports are Zimbabwe, Malawi, Botswana and Swaziland.

SWAPO SPLIT IS ANALYZED

Lusaka SUNDAY TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 31 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Patu Simoko]

[Text]

A REVOLUTIONARY programme does not promise any free ride to anyone. It demands either death or victory from every cadre.

Of course I am aware that the poet Paul Dehn wrote during a war that: Rock of Ages Cleft for me; let me hide myself in thee. Though I know all men are brothers, let the bomb fall on others."

If he was serious then Claude Mackay, another poet, has the better message: "If we must die, let us nobly die... For their hundred blows, let us deal one death blow [even if], Pounced to the wall, dying but fighting back."

This article, if you guessed, is on the split in the South West African Peoples Organisation, SWAPO. It is either the expelled vice-President Misheck Muyongo and his followers are right, or Sam Nujoma and his remaining members are the ones in the right.

And the truth must be told without delay.

Both SWAPO and Mr Muyongo's revived Caprivian African National Union, CANU have given their sides of the story. What is needed is an interpretation of the arguments — or is it tell-tales — without prior partisanship.

However, what cries for priority of mention is the implication of the split on the Namibian independence dispute.

One hopes that Mr Muyongo is totally convinced that his decision to form CANU is in the best interests of the one million-plus suffering Namibians.

But against this hope the shattering reality is delivered: the New party is for the East Caprivian tribe — or at least largely so.

The tribe has a population of only 30,000 people. That would not be a crucial factor in the analysis but...

The South African government which has held the territory under serfdom for more than 65 years has now been demanding that Namibia should be an independent federal state.

In persuance of this plan Pretoria has established a client regime of the Democratic Turnhalle Alliance whose official policy is independence "on an ethnic basis".

Some parties in the DTA coalition are the National United Democratic Organisation led by Chief Riuraka of the Herero, and the National Democratic party which claims support from the Ovambos.

The DTA's bantustan principles are shared firmly by three other parties of the eight internal political organisations — with some of the remaining others demanding that Namibia should at independence be incorporated into South Africa.

Is CANU's decision that the party should fit into this bantustan plan? The best one would do is not to speculate that the party has so decided, but to ask Mr Muyongo to explain how CANU would remain out of the plan.

In all fairness let it be said that Mr Muyongo has at least made public his reasons for forming a party for the Caprivians.

He says his supporters were discriminated against in the army ranks, in missions abroad and there were eliminations of his men in SWAPO camps.

"Over the last 16 years my supporters, whom I brought into SWAPO, and I have struggled to change SWAPO into a national organisation. We would like to remind those of you who would like to look at this expulsion with contempt for me and my colleagues that we have tried our best to co-operate with SWAPO within the framework of the merger of 1964," he said.

Mr Muyongo charged that his CANU followers with SWAPO were reduced to nothing, about 100 per cent of the leadership in the national executive committee, central committee and missions abroad were Mr Nujoma's supporters.

Students of political science may wish to support Mr Muyongo on the theory that incumbent leaders (the status quo), always frustrate young, intelligent and emergent leaders because "once in power people always want to remain in power."

But like all theories, that sounds rather speculative unless backed up by supportive information that some emergent leaders were being suppressed. In any case the danger with theories is that one would end up giving explanations to leaders which did not in fact exist.

What is more, SWAPO's challenge to Mr Muyongo's complaints is that 18 per cent of the members of the Central Committee are East Caprivians, far in excess to their proportion to the national population.

The detained SWAPO vice president, Mr Brendan Simbwave for whom Mr Muyongo was acting is a Caprivian. The deputy Secretary of defence Mr Richard Kapelwa is also a Caprivian.

As regards missions abroad, the SWAPO chief representative to Algeria is a veteran freedom fighter commander, Mr Ignatius Mufalali, who comes from the same tribe as Mr Muyongo.

And Commander Fredrick Matongo, another Caprivian, is the SWAPO chief representative in Iraq.

With a bit of hindsight we learn that when Mr Muyongo and eight other party officials were expelled recently the SWAPO central committee said it was for offences including counter-revolutionary activities and a plot to cut up the country into bantustans.

Since that 'expulsion' statement was made more information has surfaced, and if it is wrong, Mr Muyongo should say so in the interest of truth.

All along SWAPO has been launching attacks against the Pretoria occupation forces from the Zambian soil. But with the collapse of the fascist Portuguese government and the indepedence of Angola, the freedom fighters opened another front from Angola.

Factor

In the same way that Robert Mugabe's ZANU-PF realised when they shifted from Zambia to Mozambique, SWAPO found the new border much more effective for logistical reasons.

In 1978 a decision was made that the freedom fighters should move their headquarters from Lusaka to Luanda. Another compelling factor was that thousands of Namibians fleeing from the intensifying war flooded Angola, and they now numbered 40,000.

However, SWAPO found that they would not shift to Luanda although the new government welcomed them because of lack of immediate accommodation. It was only in January last year that accommodation was ready.

The information which Mr Muyongo would have to challenge is that the SWAPO central committee met, including himself, and decided to move, leaving in Zambia only one senior official.

The official remaining behind would be Lucas Bohamba, the national treasurer.

It is understood that everybody was given a two-month deadline in which to shift to Luanda. Party President Sam Nujoma had himself shifted there in 1976 and in his absence vice President Muyongo took charge of operations.

Perhaps he was frustrated that he was not the one chosen to remain behind, and instead Bohamba did?

It is reported that Mr Muyongo decided to stay in Zambia, and then wrote to the government asking for accommodation in Lusaka. According to SWAPO member of the central committee, Mr Hidipo Hamuntenya, the request was turned down.

Mr Hidipo says the central committee met in April this year "basically to deal with the Muyongo problem".

Mr Hidipo claims that when the party vice President realised that the central committee would not rescind the decision to have everybody in Luanda Mr Muyongo stopped Caprivians from doing so.

About January this year he started moves to withdraw some Caprivians from the camps and at least 15 travelled to Lusaka where they lived for five months.

Mr Hidipo says they were forced to return to their bases after the Zambian government intervened.

The SWAPO official says the Zambian government is in possession of correspond- possession of correspondence between Mr Muyongo and a Caprivian chief asking him to make arrangements for his (Muyongo's) return to Namibia.

Is that really so? If it is, then three major problems will have been created.

His return to Namibia as leader of the East Caprivians will enhance Pretoria's plan to create a republic of bantustans in the territory. Since South Africa is campaigning to have the United Nations derecognise SWAPO as the only legitimate representative of the Namibian people, Pretoria will co-opt Mr Muyongo while he still has fairly good credentials.

Then the first plot of imperialism will have succeeded.

It should be remembered that South Africa will announce any time now that she is read to go to a negotiation table with SWAPO.

Agreed

Since the internal parties have already agreed to be part of the South African delegation, Mr Muyongo will also sit on the South African side of the table.

Secondly, it should be conceded that Mr Muyongo has some following among guerrillas now in the SWAPO camps. In the tradition of revolutionary struggle — drawing blood from the enemy whatever the colour — nobody should be surprised if there will be fighting in SWAPO camps.

It happened between rival guerrillas in Angola, Zimbabwe, Mozambique and the world over.

The third point is in regard to the principle of leaders of liberation movements having to leave with or close to their fighters. Even if the charges that Mr Muyongo refused to move closer to the war areas are false, since the information has been given as the main cause for the expulsion, people are bound to make comment.

It will be recalled that Zambia has had bitter experiences over interval uprisings in some liberation movements. There was the Nhari rebellion in ZANU six years ago.

Freedom fighters travelled all the way from their bush camps to Lusaka to try and take over the party leadership then held by the late Herbert Chitepo. Many people were killed at Chifombo camp.

When Herbert Chitepo himself was summarily murdered an internal commission of inquiry into the cause of the dissension established that the freedom fighters complained of:

● "Short supplies of essential commodities and war materials at the front such as food, clothing, shoes and provisions for the fighting forces." But back in Lusaka the party leaders lived in comparative comfort and, in fact, some were to be seen betting on horses in one of the business houses.

● "Those in charge of operations in the military high command were completely out of touch with what was going on at the Front. The military high command were not, therefore, in a position to appreciate the difficulties the frontline fighters were facing or to assess what was involved."

Corruption

Instead they preferred to have power and promotion without having to perform the duties attached to that.

● There were also cases of corruption and preferential treatment for some cadres.

To correct this and to improve the morale of the fighters the commissioners, from 13 African countries, recommended strongly that:

"A liberation movement should ensure that leaders of all freedom movements permanently worked and lived in the camps and bases.

In this way they could solve problems in the party before they got out of hand. A revolutionary leader should not ask his subordinates to work in conditions under which he himself could not work."

If that is the problem with SWAPO then the position is quite clear. Zambia's chairman of the political and constitutional Sub-Committee of the Central Committee Mr Reuben Kamanga has been quoted as saying that the nation will not support any splinter, reactionary movements.

He is reported to have said specifically that the Government would stand firm behind Sam Nujoma.

And that is precisely what the 13-member commission of inquiry recommended. Specifically, the commission said: "There should be control over break-away, dissident or splinter groups from a movement as to their existence or operations."

The position regarding the current dissentions in SWAPO, therefore, seems to be quite clear.

One only hopes whatever set-backs will have been caused to the struggle for Namibia's independence the SWAPO fighters will stand firm against the enemy, and even if outnumbered, "penned to the wall, dying and fighting back" — their victory will be certain.

NATIONAL PARTY LEADER ADDRESSES ISSUE OF INDEPENDENCE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 27 Aug 80 p 2

[Text]

THE WHITES of SWA have never accepted a one-man-one-vote election and they did not accept a one-man-one-vote government, Mr A H du Plessis, leader of the National Party in SWA, said last night at the offical opening of the 38th NP congress.

Mr Du Plessis, addressing about 500 people, said the NP did not "prefer" to have independence. The Whites, he said, did not feel the need for independence. They merely accepted independence as a measure to get SWA removed from the international agenda.

It has been said that there wouldn't be ethnic elections in Owambo now because conditions there didn't allow elections, Mr Du Plessis said. But two years ago they did have elections in Owambo and that could only mean that conditions have deteriorated in the meantime. Mr du Plessis quoted a senior military officer as having said that Swapo would win an election if they should take part in such an election now.

He referred to the fact that the struggle against Swapo was said to be 20 percent military and 80 percent political and wanted to know what had happened to the DTA's political struggle.

The Whites in SWA have always been the ones to make concessions and sacrifices, Mr du Plessis said and reiterated that the country should return to the principles of 1977, through which such a great degree of stability was created.

The Whites should take no notice of rumours that the November election would play no role in the country's present political order.

VILJOEN CITES IMMEDIATE PRIORITIES FOR NAMIBIA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 27 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The one thing that impressed him most about SWA was the degree of cooperation between members of the various population groups and that was something he would definitely miss, the AG, Dr Gerrit Viljoen said in Windhoek yesterday.

Dr Viljoen addressed a Press conference shortly after the announcement that he had been appointed as the new South African Minister of National Education.

Dr Viljoen said the immediate priorities in SWA were the easing of the current gap between White and Black education, the promotion of house ownership for all, the establishment of small industries in independent areas and the development of Owambo.

He would be leaving SWA with mixed feelings, Dr Viljoen said, especially in view of the fact that there were still many challenges left such as a possible new initiative in the international settlement negotiations.

Dr Viljoen emphasised the fact that the ethnic elections in SWA in November would make no difference to the existing order as these would be elections for representative authorities with specified powers. The only change to the present division of functions could be brought about by the National Assembly, he said.

Experience in SWA has proved that the abolishment of apartheid was not as far-reaching as it might have seemed in the past and South Africa might keep in mind that it could be easier to look towards the voluntary grouping of ethnic groups in the abolishment of apartheid in that country instead of statutory measures.

Dr Viljoen said he would not be leaving SWA before October 7 when all the new ministers in the SA Cabinet take up office. He had not been notified yet who the new AG would be.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY REQUESTS UNIVERSAL COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 27 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

NOTICE WAS given in the National Assembly yesterday that the assembly would request the AG to proclaim or, if necessary request the State President to proclaim, legislation through which any existing limitations in the Defence Act of 1957, regarding race or colour, be removed as far as national military service is concerned.

At the same time provision should be made for any citizen of SWA who is not undergoing to military service in compliance with the Defence Act, and who is not younger than 16 years of age and not older than 25 on January 1, 1981, register for military service at the earliest practicable date.

Currently only the Whites in SWA are subject to compulsory military service although use has been made of volunteers from other population groups in various areas of the Defence Force.

ASSEMBLYMAN PROPOSES UNIVERSAL NATIONAL SERVICE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 28 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

WINDHOEK: SWA/Namibia needed general conscription of all races because in the battle for its existence, the Territory should use the full potential of its population, Mr Appie Louw, Chief Whip of the DTA in the National Assembly said in Windhoek yesterday.

Mr Louw was introducing a motion calling for national service to be instituted in SWA/Namibia for men of all races between the ages of 16 and 25.

He said a great deal had been done to eliminate racial discrimination in the Territory. People of all races could use public amenities and could live anywhere.

It was only fair that members of all races should be involved in defending their country.

Black and Brown units were already voluntarily on military service which proved that the Black and Brown Southwesters were not averse to doing military duty, Mr Louw said.

The only SWA/Namibians opposing conscription were Swapo supporters whose organisation was the reason why steps had to be taken to defend the Territory.

Some South Africans argued that South Africans were dying on the SWA/Namibian border for the sake of the Territory alone.

But they were wrong. They should realise that, strategically speaking, it was easier to defend the northern border of SWA/Namibia than the Orange River on the SWA/Namibian border with SA.

SWA/Namibians were also involved in the defence of the Territory and general conscription would further involve them.

"The Defence Force is not a machine which simply destroys... it also builds," Mr Louw said.

Defence force training could be invaluable for the people of SWA/Namibia.

In terms of the present legislation, the National Assembly would have to ask the SA State President through the AG to institute national service for all races.

Seconding the motion, Mr Richard Xoagub (DTA) said that although SWA/Namibia was not yet a sovereign state, it had gone through most of the stages of development of such a state needed.

It was only logical that a Territory on the brink of sovereign independence should form its own military force.

The SWA Territory Force was already something to be proud of, he said.

"The successes of our Territory Force are already unbelievable and I wish them more success." Such success would be needed in future as international pressure on SWA/Namibia increased.

Black and Brown SWA/Namibians were deeply involved in power sharing in the Territory and should also share in the Defence of their country.

"The time for white supremacy in this country is gone forever.

The HNP member, Mr Sarel Becker, said Blacks in SWA/Namibia who wished to defend their country should be organised into separate units.

It would be impossible to build a defence force from members with different cultural and racial backgrounds. There would be no unity in such an army.

NATIONAL FRONT MEMBERS SEEK ASYLUM IN ZIMBABWE

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 27 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

WILLIE KUSCH, Chairman of NANFYLE, the NNF Youth League, and five other members of the NNF have asked for political asylym in Zimbabwe.

The six refugees were part of a group of more than 100 from SWA, currently being kept under surveillance in a camp in the small town of Dukwe in Botswana, after they left SWA to try and arrange for military training.

Mr Kusch initiated the departure of young NNF members and also canvassed recruits for the operation. There has been much uncertainty recently about the position of the refugees in Botswana, especially after the Botswana Government started feeling anxious about the presence of the SWA refugees in their country.

It is believed that Mr Kusch and five of the other refugees crossed the border into Zimbabwe, from Botswana and were arrested by the Zimbabwe police in Plumtree because they had entered the country without the necessary travel documents.

Following their arrest, they applied for political asylum in Zimbabwe and gave as their reason for entering Zimbabwe as wishing to receive military training in that country.

Their applications were immediately submitted to the Government of Mr Robert Mugabe for a possible decision, and in the meantime they are detained by the police, until such time as a decision regarding their future has been reached by the authorities in Salisbury, they will be detained in Plumtree.

MEDIUM-TERM TRADE BALANCE OUTLOOK IS PROMISING

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 30 Aug 80 p 28

[Article by Wolfgang Zehender]

[Text]

Accessible data and information on South West Africa's external economic ties is not easy to obtain. We are today looking at the latest data available, being that of 1977, while my article is being prepared in 1980.

In the year 1977, about two-thirds of the Gross Domestic Products of approximately R1 050-million were exported. The feature that strikes the eye here is the extraordinary high level of internal trading ties exhibited by the South West African Economy: comparative figures for neighbouring countries are all lower. For example, Zambia rates 35 to 40 percent, Botswana about 50 percent and Zimbabwe about 40 percent.

Even though the major proportion of these exports consists of commodities, it is clear that the external ties of the South West African economy are not as one-sided as in the case of, for example, the one-product export economy of Zambia, which is copper. South West Africa exports a wide range of commodities which displays a relatively high degree of price stability.

South West Africa's production potential suggests that the country will remain a commodities-supplier for a long time to come.

With the exception of the Capital Intensive processes of copper refining and zinc smelting the potential for establishing further stages of mineral commodities-processing in South West Africa is subject to technical limitations. The lack of potential, together with marginal location, makes the development of an export-oriented consumer goods industry more difficult. The only opportunities for the export of finished products would seem to lie in the processing of karakul pelts and meat products.

There is no reason to assume that the value of South West Africa's import figure will rise dramatically in the future. Any considerable volume of investment, for example in mining or in infrastructure measures, will have hardly any effect as far as their import value share is concerned. Accordingly, only two factors will tend to bring about a rise in the value of imports: increasing import payments for consumer goods resulting from rises in the real monetary income and the growing requirement for imported inputs, especially energy, in connection with new mining projects. This tendency is only likely to change if South West Africa decides to set up and equip her own defence force.

There would seem to be grounds for cautious optimism in projecting the development of the balance of trades. In the medium term, returns on exports and import payments are likely to rise, while the balance of trade surplus will probably remain constant or rise slightly.

This can only be assumed for the period after the transition to independence. However, if a possible large-scale exodus of knowhow in the mining sector, and to a lesser extent in the agricultural sector, does not take place, this would cause production to drop and hence negatively affect exports.

SWA's Balance of Payments

1. Exports			+ 690
Agricultural products		135
Caracul pelts	(60- 70)
Meat and meat products	(60- 70)
Others	(5- 10)
Fisheries	(40- 60)	50
Mining		505
Diamonds	(250-280)
Uranium	(120-150)
Others (copper, lead, zinc)	(90-120)
2. Imports	(400-450)		- 425
3. Balance of trade			+ 265
4. Balance of services	(180-220)		- 200
5. Balance of transfers[a]			+ 100
6. Balance of current accounts (3. + 4. + 5.)			+ 165

RAIL TRACK SYSTEM IMPROVEMENTS PERMIT HIGHER SPEED TRAINS

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 30 Aug 80 p 37

[Text] Windhoek--Higher average speeds on the South West Africa rail track system came into force on Monday of this week. In a statement, the office of the System Manager in Windhoek said that an improvement in the running times could be attributed to an improved track system, because large portions of the line had been strengthened, allowing an increase in the maximum permissible speed. It also allowed for a reduction in the number of stopping places for the faster passenger trains, the statement said.

The statement described the changes as far-reaching, saying that running times of passenger trains had been shortened by as much as six and a half hours between De Aar and Windhoek.

Due to the faster running times, the arrival and departure times of passenger trains at stations had to be readjusted. For example, the train that leaves De Aar on Fridays will now arrive in Windhoek on Sundays at 06h00 instead of 12h00, and the train that leaves for De Aar on Mondays from Windhoek will depart at 14h30 instead of 08h00.

The statement said the arrival and departure times of mixed trains had also been adjusted to suit the faster running times. The running times between Windhoek and De Aar had been reduced by six hours, and between Windhoek and Walvis Bay by 90 minutes, the statement said.

The statement added that, in compiling the new time-tables, the comfort of the passengers was not lost sight of. It was now possible to undertake a comfortable overnight journey between Windhoek and Keetmanshoop in both directions every day of the week, the statement said.

For the convenience of passengers with connecting flights, the arrival time of the train from Walvis Bay had already been adjusted from 06h55 to 06h15. The statement said that, due to the faster running times, the travelling times from South West Africa to centres in the Republic had been reduced correspondingly. Between Windhoek and Johannesburg, it said, the travelling time had for example been reduced from 54 to 48 hours.

The statement asked members of the public to contact their local stationmaster to obtain the new running times before undertaking a journey or making arrangements to meet passengers at a station.

SEYCHELLES REPORTEDLY SOLD ALDABRAS TO SOVIETS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Aida Parker: "Sale of a Speck Could Turn Into a Crisis for the South"]

[Text]

THE ALDABRA Islands are not exactly household words in South Africa. It is easy to forgive such ignorance. Coral atolls, part of the Seychelles group, they are so small that they hardly merit a speck except on large-scale maps.

They are the home of the giant tortoise and have little else to boast about, apart from beautiful, sandy beaches and palm trees.

Yet these obscure tropical islands, resting in the warm waters of the Mozambique Channel between the coast of East Africa and the main Seychelles island of Mahe, could represent the latest area of crisis in Russia's thrust into the Indian Ocean.

According to excellent information, Mr Mathew Servina, Seychelles Minister of Transport and Tourism, has sold — or is negotiating to sell — the Aldabra Islands to the USSR.

Customers

Mr Servina left Mahe for Western Europe on August 3, ostensibly to drum up much-needed tourist traffic, particularly under the now-famous "rent-an-island" aimed at weary jet-setters wishing to get away from it all.

But, according to those who know, the most eager customers for the "rent-an-island" or "buy-an-island" scheme are the Russians.

Purpose? For the establishment of a missile site and naval facility to counterbalance the rapidly expanding US facilities on Diego Garcia — "the Pentagon's eye in the Indian Ocean".

The USSR has already made one effort to militarise one of the islands in the Seychelles archipelago. This was Quetivy, 180 nautical miles south-east of Mahe. Here the Russians, with Cuban assistance, started constructing a missile-naval facility.

Ironically, Seychelles President France Albert Rene was at the time making loud noises in the OAU and other forums about the island nations of the Indian Ocean "living on the brim of a volcano" because of the military rivalry of superpowers in the region.

Together with his friend, President Didier Ratsiraka, Marxist leader of Madagascar, Rene was demanding that the Indian Ocean be declared a permanent "Zone of Peace" and that the US be forced to abandon work on Diego Garcia.

It was at this point that various Western intelligence agencies got busy — and Rene's double-dealing was laid bare. A British MP visited the Seychelles and put in a report to the Foreign Office.

Pressure

Somehow, a return letter from the British Under-Secretary of State, Sir Ian Gilmour, stating that he had no doubt that the Russians would like to establish naval facilities on the islands, was made public.

Faced with heavy pressure from the British, French and the Kenyans, plus an angry outcry at home, Rene was forced to withdraw whatever concessions he had made on Quetivy to the Russians. Six weeks ago, the Russo-Cuban personnel already stationed on the island were withdrawn.

But, of course, the Russians do not give up that easily. And, indeed, the Aldabras, much nearer the African coast and straddling the Mozambique Channel, fit much more readily into their overall Indian Ocean strategy.

Garotte

Not only do they afford an excellent location for watching traffic in the international sea lanes between East and West, but locked into other Russian facilities in the region, they form a perfect garotte on Western oil routes.

The ever-tightening Russian circle in one of the world's greatest "arcs of crisis" already comprises Soviet control of the important naval anchorage at Socotra at the entrance to the Red Sea; the naval base at Aden in South Yemen; plus facilities in the Maldive Islands, the Dahlark Islands off the Ethiopian coast, in Madagascar, and Nacala in Mozambique.

The West, then, has good cause to be worried about the growing affiliations between the pro-Soviet faction in Rene's Cabinet and the Russo-Cuban alliance.

Against this, there are many indications that Rene, who came to power on June 5, 1977, after "the Coup of Sixty Rifles", deposing the country's first elected President, James Mancham, is heading for political disaster.

As almost everywhere else in Africa, his economy is in shambles, hit by serious problems of unemployment, inadequate food production, balance of payments difficulties and the added difficulty that 44 percent of the country's 62 000 people are under 15 years of age.

Until about 18 months ago the islands made a good income from tourism — but tourism, always a tender plant, very sensitive to political change, has dropped calamitously after rumours of a Russian presence and the unceasing coup attempts against the Rene regime.

It is known that there are at least three Seychellois "liberation" groups, which between them appear to hold the support of a majority of the islanders. Main complaints against Rene's People's Progressive Party are:

- That Rene himself is dominated by the radicals in his Cabinet, notably Jacques Hodoul, Minister of Foreign Affairs, and Ogilvy Berlouis, Minister of Defence and Internal Security. The three men are now popularly known on the islands as "The Unholy Trinity".
- The "Trinity" has imposed on the islands an autocratic one-party State, run on increasingly rigid socialistic lines.
- That Rene's Preservation of Security (Emergency Powers) legislation, giving him powers to detain without trial anyone he considers "prejudicial to public safety", has introduced a police State system never before known in the islands.

Promises

- That the Seychellois, deeply religious and with a tightly knitted family system, never before involved in ideology, suddenly find themselves chained into a system totally foreign to all their traditional values.

Three weeks ago Rene was threatened by an army coup, a danger he bought off by promising higher wages and better amenities. To guard against any further such moves, he now has a Tanzanian army contingent monitoring his own army, with a smaller group of Palestinians protecting him personally.

All the way round, the Seychelles position today leaves a lot of room for speculation.

BOTHA ADDRESSES TRANSVAAL NP CONGRESS ON HOMELANDS, FUTURE

Homelands Viability Problem

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, reiterated yesterday that under his leadership Whites would not give up their right to self-determination by permitting one man one vote elections in either a unitary or a federal state.

"In all the forthcoming constitutional consultation and negotiation, the principle of self-determination will be paramount, not only for the Whites but for all other minority groups in South Africa", Mr Botha told the Transvaal National Party congress in the Pretoria City Hall.

In reply to a delegate who said the Chief Minister of Lebowa, Dr Cedric Phatudi, had not been repudiated when he stated that certain White towns in the northern Transvaal were to be incorporated in Lebowa, Mr Botha said his Government was not planning to let Potgietersrus, Pietersburg, Tzaneen or Louis Trichardt out of the White area.

"Consolidation alone does not guarantee that the national states will gain viable economic development", the Prime Minister said. Decentralised development, which formed part of the policies of consolidation and the constellation of states, could occur only at points at which the necessary supportive infrastructure existed.

Mr Botha said doubt and uncertainty existed throughout the Western world and could be expected to be felt even more strongly in South Africa, considering developments on the sub-continent in the face of the Marxist onslaught.

In constitutional terms, the National Party's standpoint was that there should be equal rights for all the country's minority groups on the basis of good neighbourliness.

"What I demand for myself, I favour for others, too".

The Government's 12-point plan emphasised that in a multinational society, each group should have its own schools and residential areas.

Doubt was being propagated in South Africa especially by "radical rightist" groups. Mr Botha said there could be no progress without trust between the people and their leaders.

[Editorial: "New Deal"]

[Text]

ALL systems are now go for an exciting new approach to Southern Africa's economic development, with the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, spelling out, at the Transvaal National Party congress, his new offensive to promote private development co-operation on a regional level.

It is the end of the old-style belief that homelands can become economically viable on their own.

The end of the old-style belief that they will be able not only to provide enough work for their own people, but attract back large numbers of Blacks working in "White" South Africa.

The end of the old-style belief that homelands can be sufficiently consolidated, that they can stand on their own feet and satisfy all the needs of their people, not only in terms of land but of economic well-being.

The Prime Minister has, by implication, answered these points by saying:

"It is impossible to consolidate the geographical area of each national group in such a way that it will become economically viable on its own . . .

"In the case of most national States, less than 20 percent of their people's income is generated in their own geographical areas.

"And, of course, we cannot give away the whole of South Africa merely to create economically viable Black States."

So there has to be a new approach — and that approach is by way of the regional development of South Africa, and ultimately Southern Africa, the aim being a confederation which will initially be an economic one.

Mr Botha put his new economic deal in these words:

"With all our ideals, we must also be realists. It is simply a fact that the economic realities place constraints on what can be attained by land consolidation as such.

"However, the same economic realities open the door for exciting and comprehensive development co-operation on a regional basis."

He stressed that "we have learned from hard experience that the scope for decentralisation of economic activity in South Africa is limited.

"Activity is concentrated mainly at four such growth poles — the Pretoria-Witwatersrand-Vereeniging area, Durban-Pinetown, the Cape Peninsula and Port Elizabeth-Uitenhage."

To offset the "magnetic attraction" of the large metropolitan areas, a number of regional growth points will be developed "which can serve as balancing growth poles against the large metropolitan areas.

"To this end, one or other form of co-operation between the different political units in each major economic region is essential.

"In developing such co-operation projects, we must be willing to transcend the boundaries of the traditional areas in South Africa and to extend the hand of co-operation across the borders."

Mr Botha also announced progress on two more important aspects of his new economic vision — the creation of a multilateral development bank and of a small-business corporation.

In the case of the bank, he expects that the necessary legislation to provide for the public's participation will be introduced in Parliament next year.

In the case of the small-business corporation, which will be led by private initiative, and supported by State assistance, the preparatory work has advanced to the point where details can be worked out with interested parties in the private sector.

The Prime Minister is thus taking South Africa on the road spelled out at his Carlton Hotel conference with top business leaders, and the private sector will now have to play its role in the exciting economic developments that are taking place.

Mixed Marriage, Immorality Act

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

IF a nation did not have the faith and the will to survive, no law would safeguard it, the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha said yesterday.

Mr Botha told the congress the Mixed Marriages act and the Immorality Act were not on the statute book to safeguard the future of the Whites, but to combat social evil.

"If my people, the people of whom I am part and of whom I am proud, do not have the faith and the will to survive, then no law will safeguard them.

"I reject with contempt suggestions that I and my Cabinet are being untrue to the best ideals of our people."

Mr Botha said he had made his standpoint clear at last year's Cape National Party congress, when he had been asked to state his and his Government's attitude towards these acts. He had said then the Government was open to any reasonable suggestion on how these laws could be improved in order to remove hurt from them.

"If this congress supports me then it must help me."

He said the Population Registration Act and the Group Areas Act were not "holy cows" and they would be amended as in the past if this became necessary.

"Do not distrust me when I take steps that are aimed at ensuring peace in this country."

He had on occasion been asked whether he was changing direction. He had told the questioner that he would do everything possible to ensure that this did not happen.

"But I am prepared to alter the road if it is going to make my road easier," the Prime Minister said.

Koornhof on Influx Control

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Article by Keith Abendroth]

[Text]

WAYS and means of face-lifting the system of Black influx control were in the pipeline and had the full backing of leaders of Black urban townships, the Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, told the congress.

In wide-ranging replies to questions on his portfolio, he also pleaded for greater understanding of the Government's aim to uplift the life of urban Blacks.

"This is in the White man's interest as much as the Black's," he said. "We are jacking it all up."

If the White man was not sure of his case and his stand now on the future, he would find himself in serious difficulties.

The Government was taking positive steps to improve the quality of life for the urban Black particularly — in a move that made sound sense.

He appealed to party members to say to each other: "Come on, chaps, lets not kick and apply brakes — let's throw our weight behind our Premier and his Cabinet."

He had made it his business to see that "forced" mass removal of Blacks was stopped as far as pratically possible.

When removals became necessary there were other and more humane ways of doing it, such as through dialogue and persuasion.

The forced removal image elsewhere was of the South African Government taking Blacks by the scruff of the neck and forcing them into other areas far away.

"Resettlement is being tackled as humanely as possible," Dr Koornhof said.

Influx control was still necessary for sound social and labour reasons, among others.

The growing urbanisation of Black homeland states was a "success story", with 2,3-million houses projected and 56 new towns on the drawing boards to cost nearly R100-million.

But meanwhile White cities would still attract black workers and influx control was necessary.

The State had been promised the co-operation of Black urban community leaders in applying a fair and just influx control system in the future, he said.

Farmers' Bitterness on Consolidation

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Keith Abendroth]

[Text]

FARMER-DELEGATES to the Transvaal National Party congress yesterday hammered the party's governing hierarchy over the "growing bitterness and uncertainty" on the homelands consolidation issue.

The Minister of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, his deputy, Mr Greyling Wentzel, and the chairman of the Consolidation Commission, Mr Hennie van der Walt, all replied in efforts to smooth ruffled feathers and give assurances.

Dr Koornhof promised that a special "instrument" was under discussion at top level — an "instrument" that would speed up, make more fair and make less expensive arbitration disputes on ground expropriated for consolidation.

Meanwhile, he appealed to farmers who were in danger of losing their ground to consolidation to "be patient, keep on working without flagging, and you will not be disappointed".

His appeal came after delegates had strongly criticised expropriation procedures, arbitration methods and uncertainty over the whole issue.

COMMENT ON CABINET CHANGES, PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL

'THE CAPE TIMES' Comment

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 27 Aug 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Musical Chairs"]

[Text]

THE CABINET changes are as expected and, indeed, as widely forecast. Dr Gerrit Viljoen, as a Broederbond luminary and influential theoretician, is brought in as a counter to Dr Andries Treurnicht. Mr Botha no doubt hopes that Dr V will oust Dr T in due course as Transvaal leader. One of the few present-day Nationalists who can match Dr Treurnicht in semantic agility, Dr Viljoen is adept at tricky political footwork. But he is rather more adaptable than Dr Treurnicht and, in present conditions, can be relied upon to support Mr Botha. In other conditions, Dr Viljoen would himself be be formidable contender for the premiership.

The likeable General Malan, in becoming minister of defence, will have to make the difficult transition from the services to party politics. The appointment has the merit of legitimizing General Malan's unfortunate penchant for quasi-political speech-making, which, in a serving officer, has been inapposite. It is to be hoped that the top military brass will henceforth be more scrupulous in avoiding political controversy and maintaining the highest traditions of the service.

For the rest, the prime minister appears to have led his colleagues in a vigorous game of musical chairs. The political effect, if any, is not readily apparent. The appointments to the President's Council, or some of them, at least, give the impression of having been made to suit the convenience of the prime minister in creating Cabinet vacancies. But Mr Schlebusch, who will be chairman of the President's Council, is a political heavyweight. The role and relevance of the council remain an enigma, particularly in the absence of representative black leaders, but Mr Schlebusch is an unlikely candidate for a sinecure. There is little guidance or direction to be gleaned from the prime minister's speeches since he abandoned reformist rhetoric and slowed his pace for the sake of party unity. If Mr Botha remains determined to maintain this unity, and declines to risk a Nationalist split, Cabinet re-shuffles — even on the scale of yesterday's — will avail him little. Like Mr Vorster's before him, Mr Botha's administration is hamstrung — and for the same obvious reasons. As long as Mr Botha continues to place the sectional interests of Nationalist Afrikanerdom before the interests of South Africa, the drift and indecision will continue.

'RAND DAILY MAIL' Comment

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 10

[Editorial: "Is It Just Another Commission?"]

[Text]

THE PRIME MINISTER'S supporters are raising some remarkable arguments in their efforts to persuade us that the President's Council is a viable attempt to reach a consensus for a new constitution acceptable to the majority of our people.

The council, they argue, is not a final solution, but merely a starting point to negotiate a new dispensation. For this reason alone, it deserves the support of all people who sincerely want better race relations. Those who oppose the effort are merely "wreckers" who will do anything to stop the Government from reaching an accord with other groups.

But now, Nationalist commentators are even trying to convince us that the exclusion of blacks from the council is not an insurmountable obstacle in the Government's efforts. The council, they say, is free to consult blacks — even such people as Mr Nelson Mandela, provided, of course, he renounces violence

Which, of course, means the council is hardly an advance on the Schlebusch Commission which created it. The council's white, coloured, Indian and Chinese members are simply another form of a commission of inquiry that can call evidence from blacks if it wishes to do so. The Schlebusch Commission did this — and totally dismissed the evidence given before it by Chief Gatsha Buthelezi's Inkatha movement. Is there any reason to believe a nominated President's Council would treat evidence from blacks any differently?

The probability that it would not was underlined in a recent speech by Mr Chris Heunis, who will soon be assuming responsibility for the Government's constitutional proposals in his new capacity as Minister for Internal Affairs. Mr Heunis told the Natal Nationalist congress that if blacks were included on the President's Council "the possibility of consensus would be nil — and this would inevitably lead to confrontation between white and non-white."

What, then, are the chances of consensus if blacks are merely consulted by a group of nominated people whose recommendations can be vetoed by the white Parliament and who, in any case, cannot claim the right to make decisions for others?

Even more important, the fact that blacks are excluded from the President's Council is a reflection of the official Government view that South Africa comprises only white, coloured, Indian and Chinese people — and that the blacks belong to the "homelands". Anyone accepting nomination to the President's Council is in fact endorsing that definition of the South African "nation".

Even if the Government revises its attitude by granting blacks a form of "associate citizenship", its decision will still indicate an extreme reluctance to accept the majority of people as members of our community and confirm that it has no intention of coming to terms with their most basic demand — the right to full South African citizenship and all that implies.

The continued denial of this fundamental right makes a mockery of Nationalist claims that the President's Council is a genuine and viable attempt to negotiate an acceptable constitution.

Constitutional Committee Chairmen

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 3

[Text]

CAPE TOWN. — The establishment of the State President's Council marked the beginning of a transitional period for South Africa, the chairman-designate of the Constitutional Committee of the council, Dr Denis Worrall, said in Cape Town yesterday.

"The President's Council is a major constitutional advancement in our society — the most significant constitutional development since union," Dr Worrall said. The Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, personally attached great importance to the body, as did the Government, he said.

Dr Worrall said the success of the council would become evident within six to seven months of its inauguration. Its "extremely wide" terms of reference would enable it to review every facet of society.

"It can look at existing statutes and pass on its recommendations to the Government whether specific laws should be retained, repealed or modified, Dr Worrall said.

The only limitation on the consultative body was that it could not discuss draft legislation before Parliament unless the legislature requested the council to do so.

But, said Dr Worrall, all recommendations by the council had to be tabled in Parliament itself. — Sapa.

MILITARY CALL-UP SYSTEM, MANPOWER SHORTAGE DISCUSSED

Fewer Exemptions

Johannesburg THE STAR in English 21 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Peter Sullivan]

[Text]

DURBAN — The Government is reassessing the military commitment of national servicemen and Citizen Force members to spread the load of border duty call-ups more evenly.

This was announced yesterday at the National Party's Natal congress by Mr Kobie Coetsee, Deputy Minister of Defence, in replying to resolutions criticising the spreading of border duty.

As a first step the Government would from next year withdraw the dispensation granted to people holding classified key positions.

From next year exemptions would be granted only to people in key posts while they were doing their apprenticeship. Thereafter they would have to undergo military training.

Mr Coetsee said the dispensation had been misused by many people including those in responsible positions.

As a result there were thousands of people who had not done any training at all. The position of these people was also being reviewed and alternative forms of training for them were being considered.

He said this did not necessarily include the two-year basic training period.

Referring to the controversial crediting of only 30 days to a serviceman's commitment for a 90-day border duty stint, Mr Coetsee also announced that a committee had been appointed to investigate the entire commitment issue.

But he defended the system saying that by law people had to do 30 days' training a year after their two-year basic training. The 90-day service was not training but "war service" which was a different matter.

He said a number of steps had now been taken to relieve the burden on some people and to spread the load more evenly. The involvement of people holding key posts was one of these steps.

People doing administrative jobs in the back line were being reduced to a minimum to make more people available for border duty.

He said in future no soldier would be called up within nine months of his initial two-year basic training. Then his first camp would be only for 30 days and not for 90 days.

It was also being attempted to ensure that a person did border duty only every alternate year.

Committee on Manpower Shortage

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

A special committee is looking into the question of national service with a view to meeting serious manpower shortages in the Defence Force, the Prime Minister and Minister of Defence, Mr P W Botha, announced yesterday.

"We have to make plans to satisfactorily meet these manpower needs," Mr Botha told the congress.

The Defence Force is making increasing use of women and of Coloured and Black people, but certain units are still seriously under strength.

The committee investigating the manpower needs is working in close connection with the Manpower Commission and its mandate is receiving priority.

"I do not think extension of the period of national service is the answer to the problem. Instead, more people should be involved," said Mr Botha.

"If anybody doubts that everybody has a duty in his own circle, he should go to Klapperkop and read the names of those who in the last 14 or 15 years have made the supreme sacrifice, and while standing there with bowed head ask: 'What can I do to help ensure my country's safety?'" he said.

The government is doing everything possible to find solutions to the problems experienced by border farmers, he said.

It is with mixed feelings that he is taking leave of the defence portfolio he has held for the past 14 years, the Prime Minister said.

"I asked General Magnus Malan to take the portfolio because I have full confidence in him and because I want somebody in the job who can keep the Defence Force outside party politics, as I have done."

STEYN PROMISES PROGRESS IN COLORED EDUCATION

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 16 Aug 80 p 8

[Text]

BLOEMFONTEIN. — The Department of Coloured Affairs aimed to wipe out the backlog in education for Coloureds within the next five years, the Minister of Community Development, Coloured Relations and Indian Affairs, Mr Marais Steyn said yesterday.

Opening the annual meeting of the Orange Free State Kleurling Munisipale Skakelvereniging (Coloured Municipal Liaison Association), Mr Steyn said the provision of educational facilites placed a heavy burden on the shoulders of the authorities, especially if it was taken into account that the Coloured population demographically speaking, was relatively young.

"Whereas 47,9 percent of the White population is under the age of 24, 65,2 percent of our Brown fellow inhabitants of the country fall in that group.

Coloured youth under the age of 14 constitutes 45 percent of the population group as against a figure of 30,5 percent in the case of Whites," Mr Steyn said.

In spite of the efforts of the previous administration of Coloured Affairs to wipe out the backlog of school buildings, there was still a shortage of classroom accommodation.

"If we look, however, at the progress made in the most recent years, it gives cause for optimism.

During the past six years, expenditure on educational buildings has increased from R6-million to R28-million a year and it is expected that this allocation will increase substantially, depending on the economic capability of the state," Mr Steyn said.

The Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, had said recently that the Government was prepared to endorse a programme to reach the objective of equal education for all population groups as soon as possible, within the economic capability of the country.

"The matter is at present enjoying the attention of the Department of Coloured Relations which has as its aim that the backlog should be wiped out over a period of five years while at the same time providing for the annual population growth.

"At present, 610 000 pupils are receiving primary school education while 130 000 are receiving it at secondary level.

In the socio-economic sphere, Mr Steyn said, phenomenal progress had been made. The number of Coloureds in the white-collar group had increased from 78 000 in 1973 to 128 500 in 1979.

In the semi-skilled fields of labour, the increase had been from 253 300 to 285 600.

Compared with these figures, the entry into unskilled job categories had only been 24 600. — Sapa.

OPPENHEIMER URGED TO LEAD ANTI-DISCRIMINATION EFFORTS

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 27 Aug 80 p 14

[Article by Stanley Uys]

[Text]

LONDON. — In an open letter to Mr Harry Oppenheimer published in the Guardian yesterday, Mr Greg Lanning, author of "Africa Undermined" (a study of Anglo-American and other major mining companies in Africa,) urges Mr Oppenheimer and his group of companies to "launch a dawn raid on discrimination and inequality in South Africa."

Recalling that 10 years ago, Mr Oppenheimer had told him he believed peaceful change was possible in South Africa, Mr Lanning writes: "As South Africa enters the 1980's with a growing level of industrial unrest and racial violence, I wonder how much longer you can sustain your belief in the possibility of peaceful change."

Quoting Mr Oppenheimer as saying that "Racial discrimination and free enterprise are incompatible, and failure to eradicate the one will ultimately result in the destruction of the other," Mr Lanning comments: "I must say that the more I have studied and observed South Africa, the more convinced I am that far from being incompatible racial discrimination is the basis of the success and profitability of companies in South Africa, particularly in the mining industry.

"But, Harry, whichever of us is correct, I wonder how much longer you can continue to criticize labour practices in South Africa when you continue to earn windfall profits from gold mines based on cheap black migrant labour?

"For many years you have spoken about better conditions and wage rates and have led the sluggish mining industry in whatever minor steps it has made. But they are insignificant in the face of the needs.

"I think you recognise this. It is reported that you urged the Chamber of Mines to pay surface workers R100. You certainly believe that the gold mines should pay more and can afford to pay more. Not surprising since Anglo made record profits of R302 million last year (up to 52 percent).

Yet nothing has happened in the last 10 years to fundamentally change the lot of the 500 000 workers in the industry whose labour is the foundation of your power and influence.

"Businessmen like to pride themselves on their ability to get things done: You are no exception. Your annual report is filled with examples of new mines, factories and ventures started by the Anglo group. A few months ago you went out and bought 25 percent of consolidated gold fields (11 percent in a 30 minute "dawn raid" for £150 million last February.)

"As we enter the 1980's, which promise to be a turbulent decade for your country, I feel I know you and your industry well enough to offer a few modest suggestions.

"You are at the height of your power and influence. You have great authority nationally and in the world, after over 20 years in command of one of the largest mining empires in the world.

"Your mines already produce 40 percent of South Africa's gold and 33 per cent of the South African uranium, 80 percent of world diamonds and a large percentage of Africa's copper, coal and platinum.

"If Anglo American absorb Johannesburg consolidated investments and increase your control of gold fields of South Africa, as is widely expected, your dominance of South African mineral production will be even greater. There is no more powerful industrialist in South Africa and very few if any in the world.

"I would like to see some unilateral action by you and your group companies. In fact, I would like to see you launch a dawn raid on discrimination and inequality in South Africa.

"Pay black workers a decent wage. Abolish discriminatory labour practices. Remove the appalling hostels for migrant labourers on your mines. Recognise independent black trade unions.

"Don't tell me again in next year's report what the government or the white trade unions should do. Get on and show us what Anglo can themselves do to significantly improve conditions for black workers.

"Afterall, what can the government really do? Neither South Africa nor the Western world can do without your gold, uranium, platinum, coal or vanadium.

"Prime Minister Botha has himself urged South Africans to reform, he can hardly send a man of your age and stature to jail for taking him at his word. You are unlikely to be detained under the suppression of Communism Act, or the Prevention of Terrorism Act. White mine workers might go on strike but in the end they need you and your mines more than you need them.

"I am sure a man of your power and persuasiveness can give them the guarantee of future employment that they need.

"It is clear that you and Prime Minister Botha agree that time is short. It seems clear also to outside observers that something must break the logjam of South African society.

"In the last 10 years it has become more and more evident that only bloodshed and revolution lie ahead.

"You, are a powerful individual who has the power to influence the course of history. Do not merely issue eloquent statements from your Johannesburg office. Take action, in the interests of all the people in South Africa, stop talking about discrimination and disadvantage, and act now to change the conditions of black workers in South Africa."

MATANZIMA REPLACES MINISTER; COUP PLAN RUMORED

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 5

[Text]

UMTATA. — In an apparent reaction to reports of an abortive coup in Transkei, the Prime Minister, Chief George Matanzima, has sacked the Minister of Interior, Mr Saul K Ndzumo, from his Cabinet.

He told a Press conference in Umtata yesterday that he was not going to give any reasons.

Mr Ndzumo's expulsion from the cabinet came in the wake of allegations of an abortive coup by senior police officers and members of the Transkei army. Mr Ndzumo allegedly told mourners at a policeman's funeral recently that the planned overthrow of the Transkei government failed when some members of the army withdrew from the plot.

Speaking to reporters in his office, Chief Matanzima said he had decided to relieve Mr Ndzumo of his position in the Cabinet as from September 1 and to appoint Miss Stella Sigcau, a former Cabinet Minister, in his place.

Miss Sigcau, who was recently accepted back by the ruling party, resigned from the Cabinet in November 1977 after falling out with the Matanzima government. She later led a breakaway of Eastern Pondoland dissidents to form a new opposition party.

Asked about the alleged coup, the Prime Minister said it was "absolutely untrue". He said the Commissioner of Police was handling the matter.

"I do not know what the police are doing or what they will do."

He said Mr Ndzumo had been "clever enough" to say he had heard about the coup six months ago from a policeman who was now dead.

"It is most surprising that a Cabinet Minister should hear of something like this six months back and not tell anybody in the government about it.

"I can assure you the Commission of Police and the Commissioner of Defense both do not know anything about the coup," Chief Matanzima said.

Miss Sigcau's appointment to replace Mr Ndzumo was regarded here as ironical because Mr Ndzumo, with another Minister, Chief George Ndabankulu of Local government and Land Tenure, have been staunch allies of the Matanzimas in their bitter feud with the Sigcau clan over the past three years.

Before she resigned, Miss Sigcau had held the portfolios of Interior, Education, Roads and Works before and after Transkei attained independence.

Mr Ndzumo was not in his office or his official residence yesterday and could not be contacted for comment.

Yesterday he was reported to have defied fellow Cabinet Ministers at a special meeting when they criticized him for having talked publicly about the alleged abortive coup.

'POST': SOWETO PEOPLE PROTEST RENTS INCREASE PLAN

Johannesburg POST in English 26 Aug 80 p 6

[Editorial: "We Were Never Consulted"]

[Text]

THE protest against rents meeting organised by the Committee of Ten was a hefty vote of no confidence against Mr David Thebehali and his community council.

The consensus was made even more striking by the ironic turn out of elderly people instead of the youths Mr Thebehali had predicted would be there.

If we did not honestly believe and understand the anguish of the people of Soweto we would have suspected that the massive adult attendance was stage-managed. Even then it would have taken some extraordinary organising for members of the Ten to get so many adults — over a thousand — to give their support.

The facts are however self-evident. The people of Soweto are sick and tired of the sanctimonious utterings from Mr Thebehali and his men when they are so obviously incapable of running the affairs of the township.

It would have taken an organisation which has the confidence of the majority of people to listen to talk about increases, if all things were normal.

But as all things are not normal with township life there is no argument to defeat the one that those responsible for such community abortions should carry the can, and pay for their blunders.

Just because there is no money generated from the townships is no blame of ours. We did not agree to the formation of Soweto to start with. We were never consulted about community councils. All these things were imposed on us.

We registered our protest to the setting up of such townships and the wholesale process of resettlement which affected thousands of black lives. Those responsible for setting up what was in effect an ideological solution to a practical problem should bear the responsibility.

DETAINEES ISSUE 'MODDERBEE CHARTER' ON RIGHTS

Johannesburg VOICE in English 20-26 Aug 80 p 6

[Article by Zaf Mayet]

[Text]

THE "MODDERBEE Charter" is being described as a historic document as important as the People's 1955 Kliptown Freedom Charter.

The Modderbee Charter was masterminded and initiated by 48 detainees, released a fortnight ago.

The MC has already been publicised internationally in a dramatic attempt to focus world-wide attention on the plight of detainees without trial and the stand of such political men.

Already, copies of the MC had been sent to the United Nations, the International Red Cross Society, the World Association of Democratic Lawyers, the International Commission of Jurists, Amnesty International and several other world-wide bodies campaigning against racism and apartheid.

The 11-point MC is . . . .

- It is the right of all to share in the resources of our country.
- There should be equal opportunities for all.
- The land should be shared among all who work it.
- All workers should be allowed to form trade unions.
- All workers should be paid a decent minimum wage established by trade unions.
- Proper housing should be provided for all.
- the Government must be based on the will of the people.
- Racial discrimination must be ended.
- Education should be free and compulsory.
- There should be freedom of speech, freedom of association and freedom of the Press.

WHITE LABOR CONFEDERATION LOSING MEMBERS

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Steven Friedman]

[Text] The crisis in the white labor movement continued yesterday as the South African Confederation of Labor's secretary, Mr Wessel Bornman, acknowledged that Sacla's membership had been seriously depleted and that it could be forced to dissolve.

However, Mr Bornman vowed to continue the fight to keep the all-white confederation alive and suggested that the clause in its constitution, which forces Sacla to dissolve if membership falls below 100,000, could be scrapped.

This would enable the organization to continue even if more of its members admit other races and are forced to leave.

Mr Bornman said yesterday that recent withdrawals had reduced Sacla's membership to "around 137,000" from a high of 200,000 some time ago. If this number fell to below 100,000, Sacla's constitution compelled it to disband.

On Tuesday, the SA Technical Officials' Association was forced to leave Sacla because it had decided to admit coloured workers in violation of the confederation's constitution.

Two other unions have left the organisation recently and some reports have claimed that Sacla may collapse because Tuesday's decision may force further resignations.

Most sources agree, however, that no new withdrawals from Sacla are likely. "Verligte" unions within Sacla acknowledge that Tuesday's decision was constitutionally correct and say they have no plans to leave the organisation voluntarily.

However, they add that other all-white unions, particularly those on the railways (who make up a significant part of Sacla), may soon be forced also to admit workers of other races for fear of losing their representativeness and would thus be forced to leave the organisation.

As a result, Mr Brian Currie, a Sacla vice-president and prominent railway unionist, has said he will attempt to change the all-white clause in Sacla's constitution.

Informed sources also said yesterday that there appeared to be no new plans to form a rival conservative union body.

The 42 000-member SA Association of Municipal Employees said earlier this year that it was planning to form such a body, but nothing appears to have come of this move.

Mr Bornman said yesterday that Sacla had been "reduced considerably" by recent withdrawals. "There is no point in hiding the situation," he added.

The SA Technical Officials' Association had been faced with "a genuine problem" and other unions could also be "pressed" in this way.

His own union, the 37 000-member SA Iron and Steel

Workers Union, had decided "never to consider admitting other races because multiracial membership creates a lot of problems", Mr Bornman said.

Other unions, however, particularly those in the public sector, could well be forced to open their ranks, thus depleting the confederation further.

One way out of this dilemma would be to scrap the rule that Sacla had to dissolve once its membership dropped below 100 000.

"This rule is a nuisance and I have campaigned for it to be scrapped. The unions who have left could return and I see no reason why we should disband because our numbers have temporarily fallen," Mr Bornman said.

He said he and his union would fight to continue the confederation. "It has done a great deal for white workers and it would be sad to see it collapse now."

NEW COAL MINE TO BE OPENED IN KWAZULU

Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 13

[Article by Adam Payne]

[Text]

A NEW coal mine to export anthracite is to be opened by Trans-Natal Coal Corporation near Nongoma in KwaZulu.

The South Cape group, headed by Dr G Lauroa, has sold the KwaNgoma anthracite coal field to Trans-Natal which has obtained an anthracite export allocation of 1 500 000 tons a year from 1984-1985.

This export allocation is part of the anthracite allocation of 4-million tons reported in Business Mail.

The mine will be established by Trans-Natal Corporation as an opencast and underground operation, paying normal tax but also a royalty to the Mining Corporation because the mine is in a homeland.

The mine must be ready by June 1983, so as to be able to be fully on line by mid-1984 producing high-grade and low-grade anthracite.

Trans-Natal cannot put a cost on the enterprise because it is still the subject of a feasibility study and there will be unknown factors on the infrastructure side.

However, taking a green fields colliery cost of R40 to R50 an annual ton the cost would be R60-million to R75-million.

However capital spending could be much higher because of the mine's situation away from the usual infrastructure.

A railway of 60km will have to be built and the financing of this has yet to be decided on. The mine will also need water, power and roads so that a capital figure of R80 an annual ton might be nearer the mark making a total of R90-million.

I am told that the coal deposits are patchy so that mining will not necessarily be through one big shaft and opencast workings, but could entail some small shafts as well as the opencast.

The grades of coal are not yet known but will be when a feasibility study has been completed by the end of this year.

The deposit is a large one and will be able to sustain exports of 1 500 000 tons a year for more than 30 years.

The establishment of the mine will give employment to about 1 000 people, with married personnel being accommodated in Nongoma.

The mine will have some high grade and some low grade anthracite with the low grade estimated to be worth at least $30 a ton fob in 1979 money.

The high grade is estimated to be worth about $56 a ton fob in 1979 money.

Similar high grade anthracite from South Africa was selling for between $85 and $120 cif last year — the figure varying according to transport costs and destination.

MAJOR METHANOL PROJECT UNDER STUDY

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 28 Aug 80 p 19

[Article by John Mulcany]

[Text]

A FURTHER development in AECI's previously announced methanol research programme comes today with the announcement that the chemical giant is looking at a joint venture with Amcoal and Shell.

There is not a great deal of detail known at the moment but the first stage of the proposed venture will embrace the establishment of methanol as a diesel fuel replacement and the construction of a 1 000-million-litre a year coal-based methanol plant.

The combination of these three companies in a venture of this nature makes perfect sense, with AECI providing the technical expertise — it already operates the only methanol-from-coal plant in the world — while Amcoal has the necessary coal reserves and Shell the marketing and distribution facilities for liquid fuels.

The possible cost of the venture has not yet been disclosed by the parties involved, though R800-million at today's costs is probably a reasonable ballpark figure.

The cost of the plant alone will probably be around R500-million and, added to this will be the cost of establishing a coal mine to service the operation, another R200-million.

R800-m cost?

Add to this the cost of an infrastructure providing accommodation and other facilities in the area as well as a further capital injection to expand Shell's distribution facilities and one is looking at around R800-million.

Another interesting point is the likely location for the plant. It will of necessity have to be in the vicinity of a coal mine, which could mean the Witbank area, further east in the Transvaal, Sasolburg, northern Natal, Sasolburg or the north-eastern Orange Free State.

Attention will obviously have to be given to the most convenient location in the major industrial areas, such as the Pretoria/Witwatersrand/Vereeniging triangle.

The latter would suggest Sasolburg as the obvious spot, and with AECI already firmly entrenched in the district this may prove ideal.

The fact that AECI will also draw methanol from the envisaged plant for further conversion to chemical feedstocks tends to support a site in the Sasolburg area.

AECI's chairman, Denys Marvin, when announcing the company's intention to accelerate its research into methanol (April 2), stated that two small cars with 100 percent methanol engines had been ordered from a motor manufacturer.

It is believed that the cars have now completed 40 000 km successfully, which must reaffirm the chemical giant's confidence in alternative fuels.

The time for commencing the venture is not known at this stage, but with the three large companies already talking in terms of a joint venture the decision to go ahead cannot be far away, especially with costs rising almost daily.

BRIEFS

MVUBELO ON UNION MERGER--The biggest "parallel" trade union in the country, Ms Lucy Mvubelo's National Union of Clothing Workers, could disappear in a merger with the white and colored Garment Workers' Union of South Africa. At a recent meeting, the NUCW endorsed the idea of such a merger, according to its general secretary, Ms Mvubelo. However, labor sources claim that the merger idea has attracted substantial opposition from members of the union executive and some union shop stewards, who fear that such a move will prevent the union developing into an independent, black-run organization. At a recent meeting, the 23,000-member NUCW voted to join a federation of unions in the garment industry. This would entrench links between the union and non-black registered counterparts in the Transvaal, Natal and the Cape. According to Ms Mvubelo, it also endorsed the idea of a merger with the Garment Workers' Union of South Africa, a registered union for white and colored workers with which the NUCW has been closely associated for several decades. Mr Mvubelo said, however, that there were no immediate plants to merge the two unions. "We will see how the federation works before taking a final decision," she said. POLITICAL MEETINGS BAN END--Government opponents greeted with little enthusiasm the Minister of Justice's announcement yesterday that the ban on political meetings of more than ten people will not be renewed after August 31. But the ban on outdoor gatherings--except sports meetings--reimposed for a year in March, remains. [Excerpt] [Johannesburg RAND DAILY MAIL in English 28 Aug 80 p 1]

OFS NATIONAL PARTY LEADER--Dr Nak van der Merwe, outgoing Administrator of the Free State, was elected leader of the National Party in the province at the Party's annual congress in Bloemfontein yesterday. He succeeds the Minister of Justice and of the Interior, Mr Alwyn Schlebusch, who is virtually certain to become the country's first vice-president and chairman of the President's Council after his nomination as the NP's candidate for the office. Dr Van der Merwe was given the Cabinet portfolio of Water Affairs, Forestry and Environmental Conservation by the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, in last week's Cabinet reshuffle. Before his appointment as Administrator, Dr Van der Merwe was the Member of Parliament for Fauresmith and was Deputy Speaker of the House of Assembly. RELEASED FROM ROBBEN ISLAND--A Soweto man who was released from Robben Island at the weekend after serving 17 years for sabotage was called to John Vorster Square yesterday for an interview. He is Mr Napoleon Mazambane Letsoko who was convicted at the age of 25. He is now 41 years old. He told POST yesterday that his primary interest now was to look for work and a wife. Mr Letsoko said he was convicted for activities concerning the banned Pan Africanist Congress together with two other men, Mr Victor Nkabinde and Mr Michael Maimane who were each sentenced to 20 years imprisonment each. AZAPO BRANCHES ACTIVITY--Yet another branch of the Azanian Peoples Organization (AZAPO) has been formed in the Northern Transvaal at the weekend, thus pushing the number of branches to three. At an inaugural ceremony is Lebowa Kgomo last Saturday, conducted by the Seshego branch, birth was given to the Lebowakgomo wing of Azapo. The meeting attanded by over 40 people had its tempers at the highest when a Lebowa member of Parliament Mr Maredi Chueu moved into the building. The audience immediately stood up to interrupt a speaker who was on the floor, saying that Mr Chueu, as a member of one of the undesirable establishments by the Government-Bantustans should leave the gathering immediately. [Excerpt] [Johannesburg THE VOICE in English 13-19 Aug 80 p 1] --Violence broke out in Seshego yesterday when camouflage police with dogs fired shots in a pitched battle with pupiles after a bus and school boycott. At least eight pupiles from Seshego High School were detained during the violence which erupted after thousands of workers boycotted Lebowa buses, and walked the 12 km to Pietersburg in protest against a fare increase. The pupils were detained when they boycotted classes in solidarity with their protesting parents. The big walk, decided at the weekend meeting organized by the Seshego village committee and the Seshego branch of Azapo, started as early as 4 am with workers, both young and old ignoring the empty buses. MISSILE EXPLOSION CASUALTIES--Two Armscor employees died in a missile explosion at a Potchefstroom armaments factory yesterday afternoon. A senior Western Transvaal police spokesman said today that the possibility of sabotage had been excluded. He said that the explosion happened at 3 pm yesterday at the Naschem factory while two young employees were working with the explosives. The two dead are Mr Malcolm Berry (19) of Market Street, Promosa, Potchefstroom, and Mr Kenneth Edgar Botha (20) of Block N, Eldorado Park. There were no other casualties, according to the police spokesman, but there was extensive damage to the buildings. Security police and Naschem officials cordoned off the area and an intensive investigation began shortly after the blast. Mr Botha is believed to have been working at the factory for only a short time. He was married with one child. The police spokesman said an investigation by officials from the office of the Chief Inspector of Explosives would begin today. They are to be assisted by the South African Police. It is believed there will be an official inquiry later. It was originally suspected that mortar bombs had exploded but police said they had established that two missiles were involved. COST OF LIVING INDEX--The price of food in South Africa has nearly doubled in the past five years and if the present inflation rate continues the overall cost of living--on 1975--will double in about 10 months. Department of Statistics figures released in Pretoria yesterday show that the COL index jumped by nearly three points in July, reaching a new all-time peak of 177,2 compared with 174,5 in June and 157,9 in July last year, on a base of 100 in 1975. The index for food alone rocketed by more than five points in one month between June and July--to 181,4 in July from 176,0 in June and an overall increase of 15,7 percent in July last year. In effect this means that a grocery basket that cost R50 to R100 in 1975 now costs R90,70 to R181,40. [Excerpt] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 29 Aug 80 p 3]

OBOTE CALLS KENYA 'NATURAL PARTNER' FOR UGANDA

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 2 Sep 80 pp 1, 4

[Excerpts of interview with former president Milton Obote, in Kampala "a few days ago," by Salim Lone (originally appearing in VIVA)]

[Text] FORMER Ugandan President Milton Obote, who is the main contender for the Presidency in general elections scheduled for later this year, says he is looking forward "to a fruitful and warm relationship between Uganda and Kenya".

Dr. Obote is quoted by the Nairobi magazine "Viva", to whose editor, Salim Lone, he gave an interview a few days ago in Kampala, as saying this position would remain "irrespective of my own personal position in Uganda".

The Ugandan leader, ousted as President nine years ago by Idi Amin, went on to add: "Whether I am in government or not, I will want Uganda and Kenya to revive the close trading partnership which stood both of them so well before 1971."

Dr. Obote, who has often been accused of being anti-Kenya, said Kenya's stability was Uganda's stability, and "vice versa".

He stressed: "It would be madness on my part or any person's part to try and put Uganda and Kenya at loggerheads. Amin tried to do so when he claimed part of Kenya's territory, and when he did so I did send a secret memorandum to a Kenyan Minister condemning what Amin had done."

The former President said he had no regrets as to the policies which the Kenya Government has pursued since 1971, adding:

"I can say with no fear of contradiction that during my time as head of government of Uganda I maintained a very close and warm relationship with the President of Kenya then, Mzee Jomo Kenyatta, and all his Ministers.

"There have been allegations since 1971 to the effect that there was a time when I was engaged in subverting the Government of Kenya. That cannot be true. I was never at any time engaged in any such activity. And my government was never engaged in any such activity against the Government of Kenya or any other neighbouring government. There was no need for me or anybody in my government or party to take a negative attitude towards Kenya".

Dr. Obote made this important point: "Kenya is a natural partner for Uganda in all fields of human endeavour. It is our shortest, most efficient route to the sea and from there to the overseas market. Many of the Kenyan leaders are well known in Uganda. Some in fact studied in Uganda, not only at Makerere but also at some of our secondary schools. We have on the border tribes who are (only) divided by the common international boundary."

Asked if he harboured any bitterness towards Kenya because he was reportedly denied permission, at the time of the Amin coup, to travel to the border with Uganda, he said: "I have had a very long attachment to Kenya. I have been in exile now for a total of nearly 15 years. Five of these I spent in Kenya. I have just returned from 9½ years of exile in Tanzania and partly in the Sudan.

Exile

"The first time I went into exile was in the early 50s. I was in voluntary exile and I went to Kenya. I worked in Kenya.. I worked at Miwani Sugar Works. I worked in Kisumu. I worked at Kabete. I worked at the Isania Water Works near the Aberdares range of mountains. In these years I met a lot of Kenyans and formed what I believed are everlasting friendships."

Speaking on the presence in Uganda of Tanzanian troops, Dr. Obote said there was some misunderstanding in Kenya and elsewhere on the role of the Tanzanian army in Uganda. This also applied to the intentions of the President of Tanzania, Dr. Nyerere, in particular.

"I can safely say," he added, "that when the war (to liberate Uganda) broke out in October 1978 it was not the intention of the President of Tanzania and his government that Tanzanian troops should cross into Uganda, much less come to Kampala and overthrow the regime of Idi Amin.

"Events, however, forced both the President of Tanzania and his government to cross the border and to proceed to Kampala and throughout Uganda.

"These events include one statement by Idi Amin to the effect that Ugandans on the border with Tanzania were collaborating with the enemies, and that on the withdrawal of Tanzanian troops those Ugandans would be made to suffer.

"So President Nyerere and his government took the humanitarian decision that it would be wise to proceed with the war up to its conclusion."

It was the same humanitarian consideration which, he believed, made the Kenya Government issue a statement advocating that "leaders like Mr. Godfrey Binaisa should be set free . . . . I appreciate such humanitarian expression," Dr. Obote went on to say.

He said he had welcomed the formation of the Uganda National Liberation Front and told its leaders, in writing, that if he was asked to assist in something he would do so. "I was never asked to do anything."

Dr. Obote said problems had unfortunately arisen in the Front and the first President (under its aegis), Prof. Yusufu Lule, was overthrown by a group within the Front.

Later it was interpreted, and was still being interpreted, in Kenya and elsewhere that the overthrow of Prof. Lule was done "by the President of Tanzania, and for my benefit. That was not true. In both ways, that is to say, the President of Tanzania, as far as I know, had no hand in the overthrow of Prof. Lule and there was no truth at all that what happened was to my benefit."

Replaced

In turn, he said, Prof. Lule was replaced by Mr. Binaisa, who had been replaced by the Military Commission.

Dr. Obote said there were problems in Uganda politics. And he pleaded: "I would suggest that for the good of good relations in East Africa . . . we, the people of Uganda, be allowed to sort out our problems.

"I pray that my brothers in Kenya realise that Uganda has been in a desperate situation and that Tanzanians are not here either to undermine Kenya or to colonise Uganda".

PROBLEM OF WEAPONS SMUGGLING DETAILED

Mbale District Threatened

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 12 Aug 80 pp 1, 8

[Article by Sam Wakoli]

[Text] Mbale District has been hit by a gun racket. The area may witness a wave of killings and other criminal activities.

Reliable sources here disclosed over the weekend that large quantities of military weapons such as rifles, pistols, hand grenades and bullets which the people acquired during the liberation war, were being hidden in various parts of Mbale District.

They are being sold in Manjiya, Bufumbo and Budadiri areas. Guns go at less than 1,000/- each, the sources claimed.

The racket has led to a new wave of killings and robberies. The people here have sent an appeal to the government to contain the situation immediately 'because our lives are being threatened.'

The minister of rehabilitation, Mr Patrick Masette Kuuya, and the deputy minister of works and housing, Mr Sezi Mungati, have given an ultimatum to illegal gun holders to surrender the weapons to police immediately or else they faced serious consequences.

They were speaking at Bududa during the burial of the late John Mushikori, the personnel officer of Kampala International Hotel, who was gunned down last week.

Masette Kuuya warned assassins in Mbale District and other parts of Uganda to stop their ill motives and stressed that the government was capable of dealing with them firmly.

"Ugandans did not fight murderous Idi Amin to come back and witness killings," he emphasised.

He slammed evil elements who were killing innocent citizens. Those had turned Uganda into a slaughterhouse, even worse than dictator Idi Amin's.

Masette blamed the people of Mbale for the "mistakes" they made after the liberation by covering-up thugs. "It is the murderers you kept quiet about who are terrorising you now," he told them.

Police are interrogating three men, one of them reported to be a bodyguard of a UNLA captain attached to Moroto unit, in connection with an incident during which thugs terrorised a group of people including Masette Kuuya here over the weekend.

One of the suspects dressed in military uniform is alleged to have drawn a gun at the minister.

According to police the men who are said to have been in company of the UNLA captain were arrested after they were found threatening people with guns.

Masette who was passing by intervened but one of the men drew a gun at him. Security personnel swung to the scene immediately but the thug dropped the gun and ran away. A police patrol team was allerted and it persued him until he was arrested after a chase in town.

The captain and the men were interrogated at the [as received]

Reports Termed Alarming

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 14 Aug 80 p 4

[Editorial: "What's This Talk of Gun-Running?"]

[Text] Uganda's prosperity, development and stability are very much being pinched by constant malpractices across and around its borders by all kinds of intricate criminal activities--smuggling, cattle rustling, illegal currency exchange, and of late, gun racketeering. A town like Mbale that had been relatively calm has exploded with a new crime wave involving killing with guns.

During the war of liberation, Amin's army fled with a number of weapons both to our neighbouring countries and within, most of whom are still at large. Some of these weapons were hidden and, despite the call by the government for them to be surrendered, this call has not been hidden.

Now, there are reports of a gun racket going on in the eastern part of the country and further reports have revealed that vehicles have been impounded carrying loads of weapons and ammunition from one of neighbouring countries. It is also alleged that there may be some guerilla training camps in our neighbouring country. One thing is clear that the countries from which these guns are being smuggled are not themselves vulnerable.

The reports are indeed alarming. The government should probe into the matter, especially at this time when we are preparing for the elections. Security must be taken as top priority.

Many of us believe we are in a state of war but this should not be an excuse for those in legal possession of guns to be releasing bullets for which they are not accountable. If the government took strong measures against those who misuse their bullets it would help to identify the thugs and it would make it easy for the patrol police to round up these people. The question of accountability for the use of ammunition is bound to produce some positive results. On many occasions some politicians have made statements which tend to incriminate them as the trend events unfold.

Another problem which calls for the immediate attention of the government is reported dishing out of Uganda's graduated tax tickets to aliens for them to vote in the September elections.

No foreigners will be allowed to vote, although the country can give the refugees the hospitality accorded to all foreigners as guaranteed by the international law. But border politicians want to make their election campaign overflow the boundaries.

The government must intensify measures pertaining to the restoration of law and order on the borders because this would ensure stability, development and prosperity.

Smugglers To Be Exposed

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 22 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Sam Wakoli]

[Text] Mbale District elders are ready to expose people who are involved in clandestine recruitment and training of guerillas, smuggling and secret distribution of guns to thugs to cause chaos.

But they have asked the government for an assurance that it will take action against all those exposed.

The elders, further urged the government to protect innocent people who have been trying to expose bad elements scheming sinister plans. "These people are being threatened," they said.

The elders were reacting to a report that certain politicians were recruiting young men in Mbale for guerilla training in Kenya.

The reports had quoted sources as fearing a wave of political assassinations in the offing as elections due next month approached.

The report was carried by the "Uganda Times" quoting highly placed sources which said a consignment of military weapons was intercepted in Malaba at the Uganda-Kenya border.

Kenya's foreign minister, Dr Robert Ouko refuted the report. He told the Nairobi based "Standard" newspaper that there were no training camps of Ugandan guerillas in his country.

However, the minister said he was "going to check on the report."

The Mbale elders rapped few misguided people for creating confusion and hatred in the district.

Speaking to the "Uganda Times" in separate interviews, most of them said the recent incidents involving the arrests of unidentified characters and gun-running was calculated to tarnish the name of the district.

They appealed to the government in future to deal more effectively with cases of this nature because if ignored they would be dangerous to the nation.

The elders also voiced concern over ex-army officers and soldiers some of whom had ignored orders to surrender whereas now they were moving about.

Last weekend, Moses Ali, one of the fugitive ministers in the notorious regime of dictator Idi Amin admitted during an interview with Reuters that fugitives who fled into exile after the fall of Amin had "formed a front to press by force, if necessary for their right to return to Uganda".

The interview was carried by the "Sunday Nation" of Nairobi. Ali who held the finance portfolio and is said to have salted away into foreign banks millions of public funds from Uganda announced the setting up of the "Uganda National Rescue Front."

Ali, wanted in Uganda to answer charges, said many fugitives living in Kenya, Sudan and other neighbouring countries together with some ex-army officers were members of the front and so, covertly were many people inside Uganda.

MEASURES INCREASED TO STOP COFFEE, OTHER SMUGGLING

Police Intercept Coffee

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 16 Aug 80 p 8

[Article by A. Abdallah]

[Excerpt] The Uganda Police border unit at Malaba, Tororo has intercepted 90 tonnes of coffee which was being smuggled into Kenya.

The coffee was handed back to the chairman of the Coffee Marketing Board (CMB), Mr Z. Kaheru, yesterday by the inspector general of police, Mr Luke Ofungi.

Ofungi warned: "The government will not tolerate smugglers who frustrate the national economy. Those involved in the racket will not be spared".

Ofungi said the police had blocked smugglers who had resorted to using the train and the lake.

He praised the officers and men for their dedication to duty and commitment to the welfare of this country. "They rejected a bribe of K800,000/- and went ahead to impound the coffee."

Ofungi appealed to the rest of the police to emulate this excellent example of devotion to duty and further advised the population to refrain from strangling the country's economy.

Kaheru commended the cooperation between the board and the police and urged his staff to report anyone involved in smuggling.

Border Units, Militia

Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 22 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by A. Abdallah and Sam Wakoli]

[Text]

UGANDA's security forces have tightened border security in an all out effort to track down smugglers.

The Uganda police border units have intercepted large quantities of coffee, petrol, paraffin and medical drugs which were being smuggled into Zaire, Rwanda and Kenya.

The commander of the Uganda police border unit, Masindi Mr A. Ogeny said yesterday that smuggling was being engineered by people within and outside the country and added:

"About 223 bags of coffee were intercepted from Wanseko, Bulisa and Bugoigoi counties nearing Lake Albert." Petrol tankers carrying about 48,000 litres were netted at Biso road block 32 miles on Masindi-Butiaba road."

He said there were 19 filling stations in the district but only three were operating. The rest had been receiving fuel whose destination was the neighbouring countries.

At the same roadblock several tonnes of medical drugs were netted and in Bugoigoi county 500 jerry cans of paraffin and 37 drums of diesel were intercepted.

Fourteen people allegedly involved in the racket are helping Masindi police with investigations.

The anti-smuggling and stock theft unit of the people's militia in muyembe, north Mbale has intercepted a pick-up carrying bags of coffee.

The vehicle, with five occupants including a Somali national, was said to be heading for the Kenya border via Kapchorwa.

It was claimed the occupants were handed over to the police but were later released. The coffee has been stored in the community centre at Muyembe "gombolola" headquarter.

Several government and security officers including the Mbale NCC member, Mr Kiboma Gimui have inspected the coffee.

A Tanzanian army officer in charge of the unit told Kiboma and the UPC organising secretary, Mbale District, Mr Charles Siango that smugglers had diverted the route because there was now tight security along the Mbale, Tororo and Malaba route.

The officer said smugglers had attempted to channel coffee and other goods through Siroko to the border post of Suam via Kapchorwa.

But it was now difficult for them because his unit was alert. The militia have also intercepted hides and skins, maize and rice.

Kiboma hailed the militia for their concerted efforts to combat smuggling, cattle rustling and other acts of thuggery in north Mbale.

He paid tribute to the Tanzanian instructors training the militia recruits for the good work they had done. He said through their efforts, it had been possible to protect the people and their property.

Kiboma suggested that the militia should extend its activities to checking illegal gun-running.

BRIEFS

OBOTE CHALLENGED--On July 15 1980, the town of Fort Portal was teaming with life. Some people had come from far and near merely to see what Obote looks like and to hear what he had to say about the 18 accusations levelled agains him during the military take-over of January, 1971. Apart from boastfully claiming that he was the only right and capable leader to rule Uganda, he briefly spoke about the commission of enquiry consisting of experts from Scotland Yard. But he said absolutely nothing about the 18 points. That was a big disappointment. People would have loved to hear him extricate himself from blame for having caused the confusion in Uganda. It is then that they would freely and voluntarily renew their confidence in him. I entreat Dr. Obote to extricate himself point by point in his subsequent campaigns. If he can do so honestly and fully, I shall say "Dr. Obote you are a great man". [Miss R. Katooro] [Text] [Kampala THE CITIZEN in English 11 Aug 80 p 7]

CATTLE RAID, KILLING--The Uganda National Liberation Army (UNLA) soldiers drove back armed Turkana cattle raiders who had crossed into Karamoja at the Uganda-Kenya border. The incident took place over the weekend at Kabong, Moroto District. Police headquarters reported in Kampala yesterday that Turkana tribesmen retreated back to Kenya after an exchange of fire with UNLA. They took with them an unknown number of cattle. The police said the UNLA suffered no casualties, cattle rustlers in Karamoja and the neighbouring areas have killed hundreds of innocent people. Meanwhile, unidentified gunmen shot dead Patrick Katende of Kabalagala in Kampala District. They escaped in his car (No. UWO 553). Katwe police has requested the public to assist the inquiries. [A. Abdallah] [Excerpts] [Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 6 Aug 80 p 3]

NEW POLICE POSTS--The ministry of internal affairs has established 17 new police posts in various parts of Kampala as a major step to curb the prevailing wave of crime. They include Kitebi police post near Wankulukuku stadium; Manyonyo near Jaja Marina; Kabalagala near Nsambya housing estate; Kitintale at Kitintale trading centre; Kireka at Kireka trading centre; Ntinda near Ntinda Post Office and Industrial Area at the end of 7th Street below Wabigalo hill. Others are Mpererwe, near Mpererwe trading centre; Matuga near Matuga trading centre; Nansana at Nansana trading centre; Mulago at Mawanda Road; Masanafu Maganjo, Nakulabye; Rubaga; Namirembe and Port Bell. In a statement issued in Kampala, the inspector general of police, Mr Luke Ofungi appealed to the public to report to these police posts within their area in case of any serious incident or crime committed for immediate action. [Text] [Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 6 Aug 80 p 3]

VIOLENT INCIDENTS--One alleged thug was shot dead and four others rounded up when they tried to rob police constable Were Projestins of his rifle while on patrol in Kampala on Monday night police reported yesterday. The police said the alleged thugs were detained at the central police Station, Kampala for questioning. Another policeman Mr Evaresta was shot in the shoulder by an unidentified gunman while patrolling Kirinya village in Kampala district yesterday. He was admitted to Mulago Hospital. At Abongo Rwot village Lira district, Yokoyakimu Alyenyo Bolango was allegedly arrested for stealing maize by an angry crowd which later beat him to death Lira Police said. At Kangole Juu village in Moroto District, a large number of heavily armed Karamojong cattle rustlers attacked the home of Dominic Ngorok, shot dead his three sons and stole 45 head of cattle. Moroto police is investigating the incident. [Text] [Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 7 Aug 80 p 1]

DEMOCRAT JOINS UPC--The Democratic Party organiser for Nakivubo branch, Kampala, Mr Joseph Tumusiime who is well-known in the DP circles has crossed to the Uganda People Congress. In a letter to Dr A. M. Obote, president of the UPC, and copied to Mr Paulo Kawanga Semogerere, president general of the DP, Tumusiime said DP had poor leadership while the UPC leadership was experienced and determined to get Uganda out of the present mess. He commended the UPC for being non-tribal and non-sectarian, and said since DP leaders did not take part in the liberation war, they were unlikely to defend Uganda's independence as jeolously as the UPC leaders. If Obote had not made the friendship with Tanzania, organised and led the liberation war Uganda would not be what it was today. He called upon Ugandans, especially the DP members, to accept the inevitable leadership of Obote. [Text] [Kampala UGANDA TIMES in English 9 Aug 80 p 3]

NEW CUSTOMS COMMISSIONER--The Military Commission has confirmed Mr J. W. E. Opolot as new commissioner for Uganda Customs and Excise. Opolot, who was chief collector, has been acting commissioner since the fall of Idi Amin's regime. He replaced the former comissioner Mr Charles Drani. Opolot joined the then East African Customs and Excise in the early 60s as customs collector. The workers organized a grand party in his honour last weekend at International Hotel. PRC SCHOLARSHIP AID AGREEMENT SIGNED

Kinshasa ELIMA in French 17 Jul 80 pp 1-7

[Article: "Scholarships from China to Zaire." "The impending arrival of 30 Chinese acrobats in Kinshsa"]

[Text] A delegation of about 30 Chinese acrobats is expected to [arrive] in Kinshasa on 9 August (this year) for a friendly visit of about 10 days to Zaire, where these acrobats will entertain the public.

The Chinese Embassy at Kinshasa, confirming this news, while entertaining the AZAP, indicated that this visit, the first of its kind, conforms with the agreements signed between the two parties, during MPR's President-Founder, citizen Mobuto Sese Seko's last visit to China.

Also within these same agreements for cultural cooperation, China's Peoples Republic has made available, this year, 10 scholarships to the Executive Council, for Zairans who wish to pursue university degrees in China in the fields of Agronomy, Medicine and Veterinary Medicine.

Selective tests at the embassy, were scheduled for Tuesday, with the participation of 26 candidates, holders of State diplomas. [They were tested] in Mathematics, Physics and Chemistry.

BELGIAN SCHOLARSHIPS AWARDED TO KINSHASA STUDENTS

Kinshasa ELIMA in French 17 Jul 80 pp 1-7

[Article: "Brabant Province Aid to Kinshasa"]

[Text] The authorities of the Belgian Province of Brabant have decided to place about 30 scholarships of secondary and upper levels for technical studies, at the disposal of Kinshasa, during the 1980-1981 school year, according to mutual agreements between Kinshasa and Brabant.

In 1970, the Province of Brabant provided 70 scholarships for primary and secondary levels to Kinshasa students.

Returning Tuesday from Brussels, where he had led the Town Hall delegation to the commemorations, celebrating the 150th anniversary of independence from Belgian reign, Kinshasa's Assistant Urban Commissioner, citizen Mubumba Ngimbi indicated that he has also agreed that high officials of the Zairian capital will spend some months in Brussels, participating in an Administration Training Course, in the near future.

Assistant Urban Commissioner Mubumba has sent Brabant's Governor an invitation to visit Kinshasa for the occasion of its centennial in December of 1981.

Gombe's Zone Commissioner, citizen Mabanza Tukala Kiese and Urban Counselor Lifela, were also members of the Kinshasa delegation.

MAJOR MINERS' STRIKE AVERTED

Salary Increases Offered

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE miners' threat to strike was averted yesterday following an offer by Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines and Roan Consolidated Mines of salary increases.

The two mining companies have also agreed to award another salary increment next year.

This was announced in a joint statement issued by the Mineworkers' Union of Zambia and the Association of Copper Mining Employers (ACME) released in Kitwe yesterday after a two-day meeting of the mining Joint Industrial Council.

The statement said the two parties agreed in principle to introduce a contributory pension scheme for union members, but the details would be made available to ACME and MUZ representatives soon for further discussions.

The meeting noted that the companies were reviewing present incentive bonus schemes to improve them and were to consider introducing additional productivity-based schemes which were a necessary motivation to raise production.

"Both parties," the statement added, "had already agreed that a complete review of the industry job evaluation system should be undertaken and the association representatives confirmed that an outside consultancy firm would be engaged."

ACME said the new measures would take time to finalise and as a gesture of good faith the two mining companies had agreed to offer immediate salary increases to union members and an additional rise next year.

Increased

The statement did not say by how much the salaries would be increased.

Last week MUZ gave ACME up to yesterday to reply to its demands for improved conditions of service for miners or there would be a strike.

But yesterday's statement, which was only jointly signed by ACME secretary, Mr David Sims and MUZ acting general secretary, Mr Anderson Chungu, said the council agreed that union officials should advise their members of the matters discussed during the meetings.

MUZ held a series of meetings starting from yesterday to brief miners on the outcome of the two-day talks.

The meetings took place in Chililabombwe, Chingola, Mufulira, Kalulushi, Kitwe, Luanshya and Chambeshi.

At Chambeshi MUZ deputy national chairman, Mr Timothy Walamba, said the union was making arrangements to hire experts to help in the negotiations.

MUZ was prepared to spend K1 million for such experts who would advise them on what was best for the miners.

In Luanshya, Roan MUZ branch chairman, Mr Charles Mumbi, told hundreds of miners that under the newly signed agreement most jobs would be raised and allowances would be paid in accordance with production and the rise in the cost of living.

The miners welcomed the increase in their salaries.

Meanwhile, at Nampundwe mine west of Lusaka, about 300 miners went on strike because of alleged poor conditions of service.

The mine falls under the Broken Hill division of NCCM and produces copper sulphur.

A company spokesman confirmed the strike and promised to issue a statement later.

MUZ branch secretary at the mine, Mr David Nkotami, and his chairman, Mr Mike Shacholi, said in Lusaka yesterday that the miners had been on strike since last Tuesday and that efforts to persuade them to return to work had failed.

Mr Nkotami said the strike was sparked off by what he called "false" promises of decent accommodation for workers made in 1969 by the company.

The workers were also facing constant water shortages caused by breakdowns in the borehole.

The miners complained they lived in a township without electricity and warned that unless the management built new houses with lights as promised, the strike would continue.

A spokesman for NCCM said the miners had been on strike in support of supervisors who had been demanding the provision of better houses.

He said tenders had already been received and construction of the houses was expected to start any time.

But he said NCCM had been experiencing financial difficulties for a long time and only managed to declare dividends recently for the first time since 1974.

● Zana reports: The Chingola MUZ branch office was destroyed by miners protesting against the cancellation of the strike by union officials.

MUZ branch deputy chairman Mr Maxwell Kalesha was allegedly molested by some angry miners.

[Text]

THE nation awoke today with a great sigh of relief. A tense and explosive strike on the Copperbelt has been averted.

As we had suggested earlier in this column it is gratifying that the mining companies are not tackling the Zambian miners' grievances piece meal. A package deal has been agreed upon.

Zambian miners are to get an immediate salary increase. A further salary increase will be made next year.

A comprehensive pension scheme is to be worked out for them; bonus schemes are to be reviewed; and more importantly, a complete job evaluation review is to be carried out.

This is no mean achievement. Negotiating any deals with the two giant mining companies, NCCM and RCM, is always a complicated business. Tact and national interest won the day.

So there should be no hard feelings as those found between the victor and the vanquished. Nobody should brag about it. Bravado is completely out. For our part we pay tribute to both sides.

The good political sense and maturity of the Zambian miners enhanced by their patriotism has prevailed over their narrow but justified demands.

We also pay tribute to the leadership of the Mineworkers Union of Zambia (MUZ) for its wisdom and untiring efforts to cool-off the tempers of the miners by keeping them fully informed of the progress of negotiations over their legitimate demands.

But unfortunately the same cannot be said of Nampundwe mine where the entire 300 Zambian labour force has been on strike since Tuesday.

Can't the same pragmatism be used to defuse the Nampundwe strike before it really explodes?

It is to be hoped that the immediate salary increase promised by the mining companies to Zambian miners on the Copperbelt will be above the ten per cent quid-pro-quo covertly granted to expatriate miners last month.

Having moved fast on this and the pension scheme problem, the mining companies will be throwing the whole momentum into reverse gear if they drag their feet on the job evaluation exercise.

Genuine Zambianisation hinges on it. Zambian miners have so far been very bitter about the slow progress on job evaluation. It really does not need a costly outside consultancy firm.

The Zambianisation committee under Mr John Chafwa has recently been very vocal on the subject. Mr Chafwa himself is now on the Copperbelt. Let him be saddled with the job evaluation problem.

He is an outsider. He is on the spot. He is less costly. But the final solution lies in the overhauling of CISB.

NEW KAUNDA BOOK REVIEWED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Review by Arnold Raphael]

[Text]

CRITICAL self-examination is the underlying and compelling theme of a book by President Kaunda to be published here tomorrow.

"Kaunda on violence" is a long soul-searching essay in which a devout Christian wrestles with temporal problems and sadly concludes that spiritual values must be accommodated to political needs.

In several moving passages Dr Kaunda sets out his gradual abandonment of Ghandian non-violence and his despairing acceptance of armed struggle in Southern Africa.

He asks himself "Do I sing a different song now from the days when my political party (UNIP) was acting on an official policy of non-violence and used it to achieve a virtually bloodless victory in the independence struggle? I believe not.

"The freedom movement has not the same mandate for power as a government. No political party's interests can be exactly identical with those of the State. The ultimate sanctions are not as severe, the price of a mistake not so calamitous." Independence was then the absorbing interest.

Dr Kaunda confessed that the business of statecraft was enough to sober the keenest idealist.

"For all the brave and sincere talk about the democratic process" the first illusion that a leader must banish was his fond hope.

"That he gets things done simply by persuasion." For the first time the leader felt isolated from the people.

"He is cut off not only by the trappings of office but the sense that whereas once he did things gladly together with them by choice now things must be done by regulation for reasons that may not be obvious or understood."

Dr Kaunda, in a later passage dealing with the winding up of the Rhodesian federation, admits that he was perhaps mistaken in not taking a stronger line during discussions on the disposal of the Royal Rhodesia Airforce.

He argued strongly that at least half of what was the most powerful air strike force south of the Sahara and north of the Limpopo should revert to Zambia not least because her copper revenues had largely paid for them.

Rhodesia should have them. "The reasons given are now academic but were something to the effect that the RAF was a Rhodesian force manned by Rhodesians and based in Rhodesia and anyway Zambia did not have an airfield equipped to cope with jet fighters".

'TIMES' CHIEF DEFENDS PRESS FREEDOM

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 3 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE visiting Soviet delegation was yesterday amazed at the amount of Press freedom and objectivity existing in the Zambian media particularly in the TIMES OF ZAMBIA Newspapers Limited.

This came to light when the delegation led by Mr Vasil Golubev, Eldtor-in-Chief of "Socialist Industry" and a member of the central auditing commission of the Communist Party, held talks with Times Newspapers Zambia Limited Editor-in-Chief Mr Naphy Nyalugwe in Lusaka yesterday.

Mr Nyalugwe told the delegation that in line with the national Philosophy of Humanism Zambians took pride in their participatory democracy.

This entailed Zambians in all walks of life to take part fully in the running of their own affairs. This in turn required them to speak freely on all issues concerning their welfare.

Times Newspapers Zambia Limited, he said, took a cue from this basic policy to act as a conveyor belt of all information from the Party to the people and from the people to the Party and also to feel free to offer constructive criticism, or shower praise where praise was due.

During the meeting the delegation was offended with an editorial in yesterday's issue of the Times of Zambia which commented on the events in Poland. They felt the opinion was at variance with the UNIP's policies in relation to the Soviet Union.

But Mr Nyalugwe told the delegation which was accompanied by member of the Central Committee, Mr Bautis Kapulu that Zambians did not believe in Press censorship, nor in one-sided presentation of facts.

"Zambians cherish their freedon to speak freely and openly on domestic as well as international issues.

"This is reflected in letters to the editor and the opinion columns. The write-up in the Times yesterday was to give Zambians a factual, up-to-date and objective analysis of a major international issue.

"That is how we understand Press freedom in Zambia", Mr Nyalugwe explained. "It is not what UNIP thinks or Poland but what is happening there today which may ultimately affect UNIP thinking on Poland.

"For this we depend on all possible, reliable local and foreign sources," Mr Nyalugwe said.

Received

He said Times newspapers received its international copy from many agencies such as Reuter, Tass, United Press (UP), Agence France Presse (AFP) through the Zambia News Agency (ZANA).

Mr Nyalugwe was at pains to explain to Mr Golubev that the editorial in the paper was based on the story gathered by news agencies.

According to Mr Nyalugwe the editorial merely pointed out few things "and we ask our readers whether there is some change through the strikes".

Mr Golubev told the meeting, which was also attended by Times Newspapers Assistant Editor Mr Stephen Mpofu and Features Editor Mr Arthur Simuchoba, that some agencies gave negative presentation of events.

Mr Nyalugwe agreed and added that it was for that reason that Zambia was looking forward to the effective establishment of a pool of Non-Aligned news agencies and Pan-African News Agency (PANA).

Mr Golubev, however, said the visit by the delegation helped them understand the Times opinions.

"So being editor-in-chief of Socialist Industry I did not know how much it depends on me to publish a newspaper.

"Frankly speaking, our stay here is to strengthen relations with UNIP and the mass media," he said.

He told the meeting that his paper published much criticism about "our ministers and ministries", to help them overcome mistakes.

"If we discover that this or that person, no matter how high, makes a mistake we publish an editorial, authorities have to react and see that that person is removed," he said.

Mr Nyalugwe replied that this was also the approach of Times newspapers on erring Party and Government officials.

VOTER REGISTRATION PERIOD EXTENDED

Mbewe Addresses Meeting

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE elections office has extended the voters' registration period throughout the country to enable section elections to take place where these were not held.

Director of elections Mr Tobias Mbewe said between September 1 and 8 all sections which did not hold elections due to poor Party organisation should register voters for the section elections to be held on September 15.

Addressing hundreds of Party cadres at Evelyn Hone College in Lusaka yesterday, Mr Mbewe said nominations for the main elections would be on October 6.

He said his office decided to give Party officials three days, from today to complete registration so that all registers should be compiled for the main youth and women's league section elections.

"We have given you enough time to complete the exercise. There will be no need, therefore, for any excuses," Mr Mbewe said.

September 12 is nomination day for main youth and women's league section council elections. The elections will be held on September 15. He warned Party officials against discouraging people from contesting posts they wanted.

"In the past we had many reports of the Party officials forcing candidates to contest posts they did not want. This is a shameful practice," Mr Mbewe said.

He told the Party cadres that there was no time to waste on nomination day. The last nominations were extended by a week. "Now you have only a day and you should organise the people so that the elections proceed smoothly."

Mr Mbewe said registration of unopposed candidates in the main, youth and women's leagues into branch registers would be on September 12 but for those to be elected it would be on September 15.

Registration into ward registers for candidates unopposed in the elections would be on September 19.

Mr Mbewe said where elections took place at branch level, registration into ward registers would take place on September 22.

September 26 will be youth and women leagues' nomination day, September 28 main branch nomination and September 30 ward elections. On October 6 will be main nomination day.

And new dates have been set for the Lusaka urban section, branch and ward elections following the area's failure to carry out registration of voters in time.

Mr Mbewe said Lusaka urban would from today and up to September 30 register voters.

"From today to September 8, all sections must register their voters after which there will be nomination of section officials followed by elections on September 15.

"On September 19 there will be youth and women's league sections nominations to be followed by elections on September 22," he said.

"Nomination dates for branch elections for the main body in Lusaka will be on September 25 while polls will be held on September 28. Youth and women's league ward elections will be held on September 30, he said.

Mr Mbewe urged Party militants to take the elections seriously especially those in Lusaka which reflect what happens to the rest of the country.

"Foreign embassies are all in Lusaka and they look at the results to be more important," he stressed.

Speaking at the same meeting, Lusaka Urban governor, Mr Bill Chanda warned Party leaders who pocketed money from the sales of Party cards that they would be barred from contesting the elections.

Clarification Given

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

DIRECTOR of elections Mr Tobias Mbewe has corrected the impression that elections had been adjusted throughout the country including Lusaka.

Election dates remained the same throughout the country except in Roma, Munali, Kabulonga, Woodlands, Chawama, Munkolo and Makeni.

From September 30 the areas of Lusaka Urban affected by the "side programme" will join the rest of Lusaka and the whole country in the election programme, Mr Mbewe said.

In Livingstone, Party regional secretary Mr Chisanga Mpepo has appealed to all employers to allow UNIP members aspiring for posts time off to participate in the forthcoming branch and ward elections.

Mr Mpepo said some employers had been difficult to Party men whom they could not grant permission to take part in elections.

"This is a bad attitude and it can only be understood to mean that employers are deliberately making Party organisation difficult," he said.

Mr Mpepo said he would not like to get reports of employers who denied their workers to attend Party elections. He appealed for cooperation to make the elections a success.

He also warned Party leaders against giving nomination papers only to friends or their tribesmen as to do so was dangerous and against UNIP principles.

"The Party is for everyone regardless of tribe. If any leader will be found discriminating in the distribution of nomination papers, he will be disciplined." Mr Mpepo warned.

The party wanted a free and fair election and would not tolerate indiscipline at all levels.

He also called on the public to take Party elections seriously and participate in order to strengthen the Party machinery and have fair representation.

URBAN LABOR MARKET OPENINGS DECREASE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] About 40,000 people a year will enter the urban labor market in the next five years against about 18,000 jobs during the same period.

And by 1984 Form Vs will find it difficult to get employment as their counterparts with less educational qualifications are at the moment.

This grim picture is painted in a report after a study in 1979 by the University of Zambia's institute for African studies manpower research unit and released in Ndola recently.

The study was carried out by senior research fellows in the unit, Dr David Todd, coordinator of the urban community research and Dr Christopher Shaw who was seconded to the manpower research unit by the British government.

The report says: "In the next five years about 40,000 persons a year will enter the urban labor force while about 18,000 formal sector jobs will become available to meet the demand they create.

"Those with junior secondary or less education are already experiencing serious difficulties in finding wage employment and by 1984 senior secondary school leavers will face the same problem."

It adds that those without employment would have either to return to rural activity or to remain unemployed or engage in "informal" urban economic activities.

"About 20 percent of Zambia's working population are already in the economic sector of whom half are women and for whom there are very few formal sector opportunities," the report says.

Running

It says most of those running their own businesses were at least in their 30s and had lived in urban areas for some time and saved from wage earnings to establish those concerns.

It says: "Furthermore, the predominant retailing activities already appear to be near to saturation point while manufacturing businesses are characterized by a lack of innovation which will make market expansion difficult."

The report calls for change if the informal sectors were to employ many people and urges the Government to take steps to encourage innovation to increase productive employment possibilities while at the same time enable the sector to retain its "informality."

"As first steps the Government should engage in or encourage research to establish the nature and needs of the sector and set up a clear and positive policy towards it."

CONTINGENCY CHIEF PROMOTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 30 Aug 80 p 5

[Text]

PRESIDENT Kaunda has appointed director of contingency planning Mr Nedson Nyoni as permanent secretary responsible for contingency planning in the Cabinet Office.

Secretary to the Cabinet Mr Evans Willima announced in Lusaka yesterday that although more routes for Zambia's external trade had now become available, the Party and its Government had decided to retain the contingency planning office to ensure continued and uninterrupted supply of raw materials and processed essential commodities to Zambian industries and consumers respectively.

Mr Nyoni started his civil service career on October 1 1960 in provincial administration where he worked as a clerical officer for four years.

Mr Nyoni was transferred to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry on May 1 1964, on promotion as executive officer in the projects division.

In 1965 he was awarded a scholarship to study industrial planning at the University of Cairo where he obtained a diploma.

The following year Mr Nyoni got another scholarship and went to the University of York to study economic planning and development. He returned in 1967 with a diploma in public and social administration.

He was posted to work at the Zambian high commission in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, as a trade attache (principal) and then trade commissioner (senior principal) to Tanzania, Kenya and Uganda until 1970.

Mr Nyoni was then recalled to the Ministry of Commerce and Industry headquarters on promotion as assistant secretary for external trade and later internal trade section.

President Kaunda appointed Mr Nyoni to the post of director of contingency planning (under secretary) in the Cabinet Office in 1973 and the following year, he became deputy director (under secretary) of contingency planning when the President appointed Mr Nyambe Muttendango director of contingency planning.

CSUZ LEADER URGES MEMBERS TO FIGHT FOR JUSTICE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE Civil Servants Union of Zambia should not relax the fight for social justice for its members Zambia Congress of Trade Unions chairman Mr Frederick Chiluba has said.

In doing so, the union should not waste time looking for faults in the Government "because they are too apparent" but should instead unite for a just cause "which you cannot lose," he said.

Mr Chiluba was opening the CSUZ second annual conference at the Natural Resources Development College in Lusaka yesterday.

He said the union had a task to fight for job security for its members and reminded the Government that it had an obligation to better the welfare of workers in the country.

The CSUZ had a long way to go to convince the Government that "it is a corporate entity" which, as a large employer, must accept negotiations with unions, he said.

"This Government thinks it is doing you a favour when it creates employment. This is a wrong notion because the truth is that it has an obligation to create employment. When it fails, you must fight hard for social justice," Mr Chiluba said.

Mr Chiluba said the ZCTU would not support the laying off of public service workers because the Government had a duty to provide work to its citizens.

He told the meeting that in his opinion the Government had sufficient resources to maintain the public service at its present size.

Mr Chiluba's remarks come in the wake of reports that the size of the civil service might be cut down and hundreds of workers declared redundant.

On the implementation of new salary structures and conditions of service for the public service, Mr Chiluba said there was no need to delay the process. "Even if you give a man K100 salary increase after 100 days, it is useless because this will have been eaten up by inflation."

Supported

Mr Chiluba said the ZCTU "unreservedly" supported the Mineworkers Union of Zambia demands for a pension scheme, but pointed out that it was yet to decide on the miners' threatened strike action.

CSUZ chairman Mr Bresford Gondwe said his union had declared a dispute with the Government over the appointment of an administrative committee of inquiry into conditions of service for workers in the public service.

"As far as the union is concerned, this committee is irrelevant. What we find most objectionable and invalid in this idea of an inquiry is the employer's (Government) contempt for trade unionism and collective bargaining," he said.

Collective bargaining was the best mechanism for looking after the members' welfare, he said. The union found it "impossible to cooperate" with the committee which was allegedly undermining this freedom.

The union had a primary responsibility of protecting and promoting its members' interests and it reserved the right to negotiate for its members' conditions and salaries.

Mr Gondwe warned that the alleged Government's reluctance to negotiate with unions would stem unofficial organisations and "cruder forms of unionism" which would be harmful to the nation.

The dispute, he explained, was a continuation of collective bargaining and not a trial of strength when workers downed tools.

Mr Gondwe praised the Government for recognising the union as the sole representative of all civil servants.

Ratified

The Government recently ratified an International Labour Organisation (ILO) convention No. 151 relating to industrial relations.

"We wish to implore relevant specialised agencies to advise the Government as an employer about the effects of this development," Mr Gondwe added.

The ratification of the convention, he said, would usher in a new era in the public service which developed a twin responsibility to the employer and workers to fully grasp the difficult tasks ahead.

On the Turner report which recommends redundancies, Mr Gondwe said his union rejected the idea. "Zambia's unemployment situation today is, to say the least, horrifying. It is absurd that we should be thinking of worsening the situation now.

GOVERNMENT INCREASES PRICE OF MAIZE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Aug 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Government has increased the producer price of maize from K11.70 for a 90 kg bag to K13.50 for the 1980-81 season.

Announcing this in Lusaka yesterday at a Press conference, secretary to the Cabinet Mr Evans Willima called on farmers to produce more than ten million bags of maize the nation required every year.

He said the increase in the producer price was in line with President Kaunda's announcement in May of incentives to boost food production under the K400 million "operation food programme".

"To forestall problems, the nation required three months reserves estimated at two million bags at the present rate of consumption," he said.

The Government decided to raise the price after considering that farmers had poor yields over the last three years because of bad weather. This made them incur large debts arising from high interest rates and inability to repay loans.

He said inputs required for maize production were heavier than those for wheat, soya beans and cotton.

"As President Kaunda pointed out at the official opening of the 54th Zambia Commercial and Agricultural Show, these measures are aimed at achieving self-sufficiency in the production of staple foods."

The onus was now on all farmers to increase their hectarage since the producer price had gone up.

The Government was continuing to find more effective measures to boost food production.

This had become more urgent considering the high import bill on foodstuffs like yellow maize which costs K18.50 for a 90-kg bag from South Africa and K29.10 from the United States.

The increase would boost maize production, he said, and urged farmers to produce more because the costs of imported foodstuffs like yellow maize was an expensive exercise.

"Yellow maize lands in Zambia at K18.50 per 90 kg bag, and apart from the high cost, Zambia pays in foreign exchange and the oil import bill has continued to soar," he said.

As a result, the price of oil had increased and this meant that the farmer had to pay more for fuel while costs of labour and spare parts had also soared.

Asked about farmers' demands to fix an economic price of K15 a bag, Mr Willima said although the demands were genuine and understandable, the Government had to operate within its limits.

Officials of the Commercial Farmers Bureau (CFB) could not be reached for comment on the new price.

Last month, a CFB spokesman warned that Zambia would continue to import maize if the Government did not fix economic prices and release tax incentives for the production of the commodity before this month.

This is the third increase in producer prices of maize this year rising from K9.20 to K11.70 and now K13.50 for the 90 kg bag because of soaring costs of inputs.

In April, the Productive Farming magazine reported that the producer price of maize was "and still is" far too low even considering the increase from K9.20 to K11.70.

The magazine, quoting CFB chairman, Mr Dennis Garner, said although the price of maize had increased by about 200 per cent since 1954, the price of main inputs like fertiliser, diesel and tractors shot up.

The price increase comes in the wake of another K1.65 support price on tobacco announced by the Government about a week ago.

Mukonchi tobacco training and settlement scheme tenant farmers in Mkushi claimed that the new price would not make any difference to their financial problems unless other production factors were considered.

DWINDLING COPPER, MINERAL RESERVES REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 4 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

COPPER and other mineral reserves for NCCM are showing signs of dwindling, according to the company's techical review report for the year ended March, 31, 1979 just released in Lusaka.

Giving the breakdown of the ore reserves, the review says at Nkana, fully developed tonnage of copper ore dropped from 5.7 million tonnes in 1977 to about five million at the end of 1978.

The figure for the partly developed ore at the same site fell from 20 million to 18 million tonnes during the same period.

Total drop during the period under review was from 127 million to 131 million tonnes. Copper content also dropped from 2.36 in 1977 to 2.35 per cent in 1978.

At Bwana Mkubwa the ore reserves dropped from an estimated total of 2.6 million tonnes in 1977 to 1.3 million tonnes in 1978, but the copper content shot up from 3.5 to 3.8 per cent.

At Chingola division the total ore reserves rose from 278,197,000 tonnes in 1977 to 278,362,000 in 1978. Indicated and possible reserves rose from 254 million tonnes to 259 million in the same period.

Partly developed ore reserves at the same mine dropped from 18 million tonnes to 13 million while the fully developed tonnage shot up from 5.9 million in 1977 to more than six million at the close of last year.

Ore reserves at Bancroft mining area of Konkola division showed signs of diminishing. Partly developed reserves dwindled from eight million to seven million tonnes.

Fully developed reserves, however, rose from one million to two million tonnes while estimates showed that reserves rose from 112 million to 181 million by the end of 1978.

Ore reserves at Nampundwe mine of the Broken Hill division which mines copper and sulphur did not show any significant changes.

Fully developed reserves for both copper and sulphur stood at 1.6 million tonnes since 1977 while partly developed reserves slightly fell from 2,148,000 tonnes in 1977 to 2,135,000 in 1978.

The indicated and possible reserves dropped from 19 million to 31 million.

At Broken Hill mining area, there was another drop reported in ore reserves. Reserves for zinc and lead were 151,000 tonnes in 1977 fell to 101,000 in 1978.

Proved reserves at the mine dropped from 1.7 million tonnes to 1.5 million while indicated reserves rose from 473,000 tonnes in 1977 to 540,000 at the close of last year.

IRAQI TRADE COOPERATION DISCUSSED

Lusaka ZAMBIA DAILY MAIL in English 4 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] The Iraq government would like to take the burden in the trade cooperation with Zambia, visiting Iraq delegation leader: Mr Rafik Jamil told permanent secretary for commerce and foreign trade, Mr Kabuka Nyirenda, yesterday.

Speaking at the start of the talks with the Zambian delegation at Mr Kabuka's office, Mr Jamil said his country would like to take part in the development of Zambia by fulfilling the trade agreement signed in Baghdad last November by President Kaunda and Iraq President, Sadam Hussein.

"Let us wrap-up this trade agreement and get on with the job. We are here to assess Zambia's requirements and what Iraq can import from here," he said.

Mr Jamil also called for the formation of a fund in which oil producing countries and those from Africa could participate in order to ease the ever rising rate of inflation.

He said of late, oil prices have been rocketing sky-high without control and this has a great effect on the economies of countries in the Third World.

Earlier, in his welcoming remarks, Mr Nyirenda told the Iraq delegation that it was time that countries in the Third World developed trade among themselves instead of looking to the West all the time.

He said there was need to strengthen economic cooperation between the two countries now that ties at political level were very strong.

A Zambian delegation will be leaving for Iraq next month to attend that country's trade fair and enter into talks to ratify the trade agreement signed between the two countries.

WEST BLAMED FOR CHURCH ROWS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 3 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

A TOP official of the World Council of Churches (WCC) has accused the West of being responsible for the clash between the church and the state in Africa.

Dr John Kurewa, secretary of evangelism of WCC at the headquarters in Geneva, yesterday called on the church to encourage dialogue with black governments to avoid any misunderstanding.

He said this at the President's Citizenship College near Kabwe where he is attending a church leaders consultative conference organised by the Christian Council of Zambia.

The conference was opened last Monday by member of Central Committee Mr Elijah Mudenda who said there were people bent on causing division between the State and churches.

Dr Kurewa said conflict between State and church had always been the problem of the West from where such conflict was imported to Africa.

In free Africa people who were deeply involved in religion were wholehearted supporters of their governments.

"The fact that most of our African leaders are Christian, churches should take an initiative in understanding their thinking and the political ideologies.

Governments have no choice but to commit themselves to the cause of their own people and churches should help implement that commitment, he said.

Asked if he was aware of reports that the young people were shunning the church, Dr Kurewa said that they did not necessarily reject the spiritual life but the way Christianity was interpreted to them.

He cited the situation in Zimbabwe, his country, where the secular songs that were broadcast on the radio were touching issues in their (young) lives.

Dr Kurewa attacked the western theological interpretation of the new African realities which he said, was proving irrelevant and called for an African approach to communicate the gospel through knowledge of their culture.

MUDENDA SAYS CHURCH, STATE BONDS TO STAY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THERE are people bent on causing division between the State and the churches, said member of the Central Committee, Mr Elijah Mudenda yesterday.

He said in spite of these problems, the Party and its Government had not yielded to the temptation to stop people from practising religion freely.

Mr Mudenda, who is chairman of Social and Cultural Sub-Committee of the Central Committee said this when he opened a week-long church leaders' consultative conference at the President's Citizenship College near Kabwe organised by the Christian Council of Zambia.

Last year there was a debate among some church leaders who felt that political education referring to socialism was inappropriate, he said.

President Kaunda met church leaders last October for an exchange of views on various matters and this was followed by a resolution of the National Council which reaffirmed the need to continue the freedom of conscience.

The council warned: "However, this freedom shall have full effect on the understanding that religion shall not interfere in the political affairs of the nation and that matters of religion shall remain the prerogative of the individual."

Mr Mudenda said the Party and its Government had maintained that stand. In assessing future developments the teaching of socialism of any brand should not interfere with people's freedom to worship their God.

He told about 200 delegates who included a member of the World Council of Churches in Geneva, Dr John Kurewa; Anglican Bishop of Central Zambia Robert Selby Taylor; and general secretary of the Christian Council of Zambia, Reverend Kingsley Mwenda; that it was essential that they understood the direction the nation was taking.

"Some people may create misunderstanding in order to cause division between churches and the State. There is, in my mind, no basis at all for any division," he said.

Welcoming debate on the relationship between the Party and the church, Mr Mudenda said some Party leaders had spoken strongly in support of scientific socialism.

Both parties should be tolerant and try to understand problems and views of others in order to help and guide each other.

"As leaders of the church we can always explain to the people our position," Mr Mudenda said.

Last September a row erupted when churches came out strongly against the country allegedly following a Marxist-Leninist scientific socialism, saying people would lose their freedom of worship under such an ideology.

BBC FILM ON ZAMBIA CRITICIZED

Lusaka ZAMBIA DAILY MAIL in English 2 Sep 80 p 4

[Editorial]

[Text]

DURING the period of the liberation struggle for Zimbabwe, and especially after the Unilateral Declaration of Independence (UDI) by former rebel leader, Ian Smith, Zambia had serious political differences with successive British governments over their handling of the rebels.

However, after the satisfactory solution of this problem by that remarkable woman Prime Minister, Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, Zambia has decided to forget the past and embark on a genuine programme of normalising relations with Britain.

So far, nothing has crossed our way until now with the revelation of the scandalous campaign that the British government are reported to be carrying out in their country which has surfaced with the showing of an insulting film against Zambia in Nicosia, Cyprus.

It would appear that after finally taking a bold decision to resolve the problem created by the rebels in the former British colony, the British government wants to re-enter the arena and challenge Zambia to a duel.

If this is not the intention, the British government must have something up its sleeves. Otherwise, they should have a good explanation for authorising the showing of a stage-managed film of malicious propaganda against Zambia.

We now understand that the insulting portions of the film which made our Minister of State for Culture, Mr. Cosmas Chibanda, protest have been clipped off. The idea being to show that Mr Chibanda's allegations were false.

But to prove his complaint false, the British government will have to take on all the delegates from Malawi, Nigeria, Kenya, Ghana, Sierra Leone, Guyana and Trinidad and Tobago who saw the film.

There is no doubt that if the film which was shown to our High Commissioner in London did not have those insulting portions it could have only been edited and the parts cut out at the instruction of some government authority.

But the British government authorised the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) to present the film at the Commonwealth Film and Television Festival in Nicosia to ridicule Zambia and probably paid for its production.

The fact that the British government allowed it to be presented is enough proof that it was their baby. Whatever insults the film shows are therefore those of the British government against Zambia.

Cutting out the insulting portions does not reduce the intensity of the matter. This could have only been done by or on the advice of a drab.

But it is too late. The damage has been done and it will not help the British government. In any case, officials from the Cyprus government also saw the film and the BBC representative Mr. Chris Drake is reported to have apologised, although he should have known that it would not be appreciated.

After his organisation has been used by the British government to insult Zambia, he cannot expect us to listen to him or accept his apology.

What make us view this issue even more seriously is that the British government has chosen to empty their insults on us in another sovereign state. Obviously, their idea was that if Zambia protests, the British government would share the blame with Cyprus. The latter for allowing its country to be the stage for insulting Zambia.

No doubt the Zambian Government will sort out the matter fairly when the appropriate moment comes.

TRANSPORTATION DIFFICULTIES DEPLORED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Aug 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

THERE are beaming faces and wringing of hands in joy at the Lusaka city council over the news that at long last Czechoslovakia is to provide a tram service for Lusaka's rising population.

Yet it was President Kaunda who in 1972 initially urged the council to consider building railway links between the city centre and the townships to ease the worsening transport situation.

There was then an immediate avalanche of favourable verbal responses.

A Soviet embassy trade representative in Lusaka Mr Maxim Serebrianski said then that Zambia could save a lot of foreign exchange on fuel to run buses by investing in tram-car services.

"We hope that transport institutions we have written to will study your proposal and make a decision," he had said. And that appeared to have been that.

Now eight years later it is again left to the President himself to initiate action during his current European tour.

The only good news from the council has been the recent decision in hindsight to widen some roads to try to cope with the increased volume of traffic.

Lusaka suffers from the fact that it is really designed for people with cars when most of its citizens cannot afford to buy bicycles like in China.

That apart nobody who travels in other countries can fail to be struck with the peculiar deadness which afflicts Lusaka.

Most cities come to life once the working day ends. The shopping areas are full of people out for a stroll, or perhaps shopping, or having refreshments in one of the many cafes.

By contrast, come 17.00 hours and Lusaka simply collapses into a coma. The streets are empty of that gregarious bustle and exchange which is one of the main attractions of city life.

A walk through Cairo road on Sunday afternoon is like walking through a graveyard. Let the councillors do it and note what they are inflicting on their citizens.

The so-called "clean-ups" are alienating innocent people from their Party and its Government. They feel they are being persecuted for nothing when actual known criminals are let off scot-free.

City authorities should think a bit more about the needs of pedestrians as distinct from car owners. There are far too many storm drains which pedestrians have to clamber up and down.

Why not cover them up? It is there that criminals lie in wait to ambush innocent pedestrians.

People are crying for some imaginative action from all our city and town councils.

Must they always expect the President to initiate action for them? Hopefully not again!

TRANSPORTATION CRISIS HINDERS CENSUS DRIVE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 2 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Director of Central Statistics, Mr Mpalya Mulenga yesterday said transport continued to be big problem and unless more vehicles were put at the disposal of his department the census of population and housing will not be very successful.

He said that there was still a very big need for more vehicles and the sooner this was done the better because more work would be done.

This was the second full census the country would have and about 16,000 people are involved in the exercise. The first census was in 1969, while a sample census was held in 1974.

At the beginning of the census on August 25, Mr Mulenga said about 600 vehicles were needed if the exercise had to be effective. "But even in this aspect, we would depend on the good offices in all the provinces."

Commenting on enumerators getting information from house servants, Mr Mulenga said they were told to get this from any senior member of the family.

"I will have to get in touch with supervisors to find out what is happening. But what I know is that in the absence of a member of the family, the enumerator is supposed to go back for the second time."

The census will try to find out the social and economic characteristics, the birth and death rate, marital status rate, the languages spoken, migration characteristics, education and occupation of people and also look at housing and housing conditions.

Launching the 1980 census President Kaunda appealed to the nation to cooperate with enumerators because they had an important task to perform for the development of the country.

He said the planning without accurate information was like building a house without proper foundation.

Meanwhile, Isoka governor, Mr Boyd Kaseunga has ordered that all Party bicycles which were distributed to constituencies be given to enumerators.

BRIEFS

MULTIPARTY STATE OPPOSED--Speaker of the National Assembly, Mr Robinson Nabulyato said yesterday, that there is no possibility of Zambia reverting to a multi-party system of government. Mr Nabulyato said this on arrival at the International Airport from Swaziland where he attended the opening session of the African chapter of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association (CPA). ALIENS DEPORTED--The immigration department is deporting 200 aliens detained at Kitwe's Kamfinsa prison for allegedly entering the country illegally. An immigration spokesman said in Kitwe yesterday the deportations started last Wednesday when the first group of 43 aliens was transported to Mokambo border post near Mufulira where immigration officials saw them off into Zaire. The spokesman said the exercise should have started two weeks ago but this was delayed by lack of fuel for an immigration truck which was to transport the deportees to the border. All the deportees could not be transported at once because the vehicle could only take 43 people at a time and it will take five days to transport all of them, the spokesman said. Some of them were being driven to Mokambo. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 29 Aug 80 p 5]

DOCTORS QUIT--About 35 doctors resigned from the Ministry of Health between December last year and August this year, according to the Government Gazette. A monthly breakdown of resignations shows that 11 resignations were gazetted in February, five each in December, May and June, four in July and two each in March, April and August. POWER WORKERS STRIKE--More than 300 workers at the Copperbelt Power Company in Kitwe went on strike yesterday demanding the removal of the manager for administration, Mr Ernest Mate. "We don't want Mate. He must go," they shouted when a union official asked them to return to work. Branch chairman of the Mineworkers Union of Zambia, Mr Bydon Banda, said the union had met the management before workers were on strike. "We told the management that workers do not want Mr Mate, but they told us that Mr Mate could not be transferred anywhere," Mr Banda said. He said the management had allegedly refused to meet the union to discuss the matter until the workers returned to work. On the other hand, the workers said they would only resume work when Mr Mate was removed. "We have tried by all means to urge the workers to go back to work but they have stuck to their guns," he said. A CPC spokesman described the strike as a "domestic affair which is being sorted out." During the strike, the management instructed a company police officer to ask a Times of Zambia reporter to get out of the premises. Mr Mate could not be contacted for comment. STATE TO BUILD SCHOOLS--The Ministry of Education and Culture is to build 16 secondary schools throughout the country. The plan to build the schools was announced during the last session of Parliament by the Minister of Education and Culture Professor Lameck Goma. Professor Goma said the schools would be built in Mpongwe (Copperbelt); Chibombo and Miyooye (Central); Zimba, Gwembe and Maamba (Southern) and Lubwe in Luapula. The others are Kaputa, Chilubi and Mwenzo (Northern); Kasempa and Solwezi (North-Western); Lukona, Kalabo and Sioma and Senanga (Western); and Chipata, Lumezi, and Chiswa (Eastern). The ministry has appealed to the buildings branch to invite tenders as soon as possible. The ministry's permanent secretary Mr Peter Siwo is to study a University of Zambia institute for African studies research which says more than one-fifth of graduates taking teacher training courses do not join the profession. UK AID--Zambia with K54 million, topped African countries which received British foreign aid last year, a spokesman at the high commission in Lusaka said yesterday. British aid to Zambia during that year consisting mainly of disbursements from grants and loans. The spokesman said a large programme of technical cooperation existed whereby salaries of more than 900 Britons working in the country were supplemented by Whitehall. Additionally, the Commonwealth Development Corporation (CDC) also received about K900,000 during the year under review from British aid funds for their projects in Zambia. He added that earlier this year an K18 million aid agreement was concluded between the British and Zambian governments for programmes in the agricultural sector. The first scheme to be financed from this loan was the integrated rural development projects in Serenje, Mpika and Chinsali districts. Meanwhile, ten students left recently to study in Britain under the technical programme. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 3 Sep 80 p 2]

ADVENTIST MEETINGS CANCELLED--Solwezi governor, Mr Sylvester Sikufweba, has ordered the Watchtower sect and the Seventh Day Adventist to cancel their conferences involving more than 7,000 delegates and return to their homes for the housing and population census. The governor also ordered the Evangelical district officials to postpone their conference schedule for Wednesday to take part in the exercise. Mr Sikufweba who summoned to his office sect and Adventist church elders over the weekend instructed them to cancel their conferences because they coincided with the census exercise and Party branch elections. More than 5,000 Sect members gathered in Solwezi and about 2,000 Adventist assembled at the boma centre for church conferences. Chairman of the Evangelical district conference, Mr Tito Kibolya, appealed to more than 2,000 delegates not to travel for the Wednesday conference until the census was over. The two church conferences taking place in Solwezi had prevented enumerators from carrying out their work because some villages were deserted. On Chilubi island, the census exercise has not yet started, supervisor, Mr Bornwell Daka, said. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 1 Sep 80 p 2]

CENSUS PROBLEM--The population census and housing count suffered a jolt in Solwezi when enumerators found surrounding villages abandoned by members of the Watchtower sect and Seventh Day Adventist who have converged at the boma centre for separate two-week church conferences. About 2,000 sect members have assembled in a bush between the messengers compound and Kandemba area near the airport while others are in the township preaching. The Seventh Day Adventists are holding a conference near the boma. The conferences have angered the regional secretary Mr Yabo Shambambo who appealed to the congregations to "disperse and be counted." Mr Shambambo said the conferences were disrupting both the census and branch elections. More than 200 people have left their villages in chief Musaka's area for the conference. Party constituency officials rushed to Solwezi to have the conferences postponed. Meanwhile, senior statistics officials yesterday were meeting regional officials in a last minute effort to persuade the sect members and the Seventh Day congregation to return to their homes in time for the census. EVICTION OF ZAPU MEN--The Lusaka housing committee has asked the Ministry of Works and Supply to evict non-civil servants from Government houses by the end of next month including parastatal workers and former ZAPU freedom fighters. The committee which allocates houses to civil servants in Lusaka has submitted a memorandum to the ministry on the matter. Permanent secretary, Mr Yuyi Libakeni, declined to comment on its contents, but deputy general secretary of the Civil Servants Union of Zambia, Mr Holosi Mapempe, said the union supported the committee's move. He said the Government was spending K8.7 million a year on subsidizing rents on 2,611 houses in Lusaka. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 30 Aug 80 p 1]

SUCCESS OF PM'S U. S. VISIT REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, went out of his way to convince Americans and the world at large that Zimbabwe is a land of opportunity during his six-day visit to the United States which ended successfully last week.

One message that he repeatedly gave to his receptive audiences was that he and his Government were not diehard socialists opposed to participation by big capital in the development of the newly independent state.

Mr Mugabe had three primary objectives on leaving on August 20 for New York. He wanted to be present during the formal admission of Zimbabwe as the 153rd member of the United Nations.

The Prime Minister also aimed at securing more development aid from the Carter administration and to induce American businessmen to invest more capital in Zimbabwe.

Lastly, Mr Mugabe hoped to persuade President Carter to apply more pressure on South Africa to speed up the decolonisation of Namibia along the lines of United Nations Resolution 435 and to democratise South African politics.

Zimbabwe was admitted to membership of the United Nations without dissent during a ceremony marked by unrestrained joy among the member states, who clearly saw the victory of the people of Zimbabwe as their own, having rendered in one way or another assistance to the nationalist parties during the independence struggle.

There appears to have been no difficulty in securing United States commitment to the freedom of Namibia and of the black people of South Africa.

Mr Mugabe also fared very well in his attempts to attract more private American investment for the economic development of Zimbabwe. But he was unsuccessful in securing immediate American government aid to supplement the $20 million already pledged by the Carter Administration.

However, he did receive assurance of more assistance in the long term. This, of course, would have to be approved by the United States Congress, he was told.

By and large, the Prime Minister's visit was a resounding success. To some extent he must have been surprised at the amount of goodwill for Zimbabwe that he found among Americans.

As the arch-defenders of capitalism, Americans had been expected to be somewhat unfriendly to the man who had for years been portrayed as a relentless marxist ideologist.

But, as he explained during the important "Meet the Press" interview on NBC television, it had been necessary for ZANU (PF), as a liberation movement, to adopt a particular propaganda stance to fight the political system then in existence in Rhodesia and Zimbabwe Rhodesia.

SOCIALISM

Yet socialism still remains the ultimate goal of the dominant party in the national front government. This the Prime Minister made clear to Zimbabwean citizens living in the United States who seemed to assume that ZANU (PF) had staged an about-turn since power.

The socialism the Government had in mind, however, was one that was introduced in stages and with the full consent of the people whose lives would be affected by government policy.

Mr Mugabe also outlined a foreign policy that does not enslave Zimbabwe to any power bloc, as this would be contrary to the platform on which the independence war was waged. He made it clear that the Soviet Union was "free" to establish a diplomatic mission in Zimbabwe.

There was no indication as to whether the Kremlin still had to satisfy the prerequisite of "making a certain statement" mentioned by the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, recently.

Besides the interview on NBC television, there were three other major highlights for Mr Mugabe in the United States.

On a hot Sunday afternoon, he was the guest of honour at the annual Harlem Day festival in New York. There was the address to the 4th session of the 11th special United Nations meeting and the meeting with President Carter at the White House in Washington.

A festive crowd at the Harlem Council administration centre at the corner of 125th Street and 7th Avenue, gave him a tumultuous welcome when he arrived to make a speech.

Mr Mugabe's arrival in the run-down area inhabited by black Americans was preceded by a musical session during which an all-black group pounded ear-splitting music that set the crowd swaying in unison.

RADICALS

An improvised tune, "Welcome Mugabe" sealed the mood of merry-making that engulfed the ghetto that afternoon. Trouble almost broke out when some radicals, disgruntled at the appearance on the VIP platform of "enemies of Zimbabwe," protested and demanded their removal.

Boos greeted white dignitaries as they stood after introductions. But quick action by a handful of policemen ensured the occasion was not marred by violence.

Mr Mugabe delivered one of his most acclaimed speeches in which he showed a remarkable judgement of his audience.

The event was so widely publicised that President Carter later publicly acknowledged that he understood the Prime Minister had addressed "a very successful political rally in Harlem".

The Prime Minister even took the liberty to denounce the American system for according "civil liberties" to the black population and not economic and social justice.

His speech at the United Nations received wide approval from the delegates. This was particularly so when he pledged Zimbabwe's commitment to the liberation of Namibia and equal rights for South African blacks.

During his private visit to Washington, the Prime Minister was given red carpet treatment. President Carter, who is bidding for another term of office in the November presidential election joked that one reason for inviting Mr Mugabe to the White House was to be coached in the art of successfully fighting an election.

Mr Mugabe, in his response, said he could only offer the American leader the "crowing cock" as an election symbol.

Some observers believe President Carter was particularly delighted to meet Mr Mugabe because, being so popular among black Americans, he hoped some of the Prime Minister's prestige would rub off on him and help to lure the black Americans' vote to himself.

Mr Mugabe did express the hope that President Carter would be re-elected and there can be little doubt that the words of one of Africa's great revolutionaries will be heeded by many Afro-Americans.

Working to a tight schedule, the Prime Minister managed to appear alert and confident at all his engagements and even managed to accommodate many unscheduled meetings with top business leaders and ordinary well-wishers.

Although he returned without concrete offers of aid nor firm promises of investment, indications are that American capital will start trickling into Zimbabwe soon.

And if President Carter is re-elected there appears little doubt that he will impress upon Congress the need to allocate more funds to help Zimbabwe.

The Government, for its part, has to ensure that no more basis exists for the transmission abroad of scare stories of an imminent civil war and nationalisation of private enterprise because this is what is responsible for the slow injection of capital into the country at the moment.

Sensational reports abroad seem to be doing more harm to Zimbabwe than the actual gravity of the isolated incidents involving violence which are often regarded as pointers to a war to come.

MINISTERS URGED TO VISIT TRIBAL AREAS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] SENATOR Chief Kayisa Ndiweni yesterday appealed for greater liaison between Government Ministers and people living in the tribal areas.

He said he was disappointed that Ministers had not made personal contact with the rural populations who did not read newspapers, but were anxious to discuss the issues of the day with their Parliamentary leaders.

Speaking during the adjourned debate on the Government's policy on Local Government and Housing, Senator Ndiweni said Ministers were provided with bodyguards and should have no reason to fear visiting remote regions.

"We know the war is still in progress — people are still killing each other," he said. But he praised the Chiefs who still lived with their people, not in the cities and towns.

However, there was no reason for Ministers to keep away from tribes-people living in the countryside, he said. The people were saying: "Tell the Ministers to come and talk to us face to face."

Senator Lou Ankers congratulated the Minister of Housing and Local Government, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, for concentrating his Ministry's effort on building ultra-low-cost housing. It was better to provide accommodation for as many families as possible than to put fewer families in more expensive housing, he said.

Senator Ken Fleming praised the Government's plans for low-cost housing. The type of housing proposed should be adequate, he said. The scheme would put the building industry on its feet and the country generally would benefit.

He questioned the wisdom of allowing lodgers and relatives to vote in the November elections when they had no stake in the community. The plan could easily be abused by people being brought in "for the occasion" to vote.

He understood that the reason there would be no registration of voters for the election was that there would be no time for the voters' rolls to be prepared. The people should be told that this was a special case and that in future elections the correct procedure would be followed.

He supported rent control in the case of lodgers to protect them from exploitation by owners or occupiers, and said he believed local authorities should be allowed to charge economic rentals within the areas of their jurisdiction.

Senator Fleming paid tribute to the calibre of councillors throughout the country for the high standards they had maintained. They were dedicated and unselfish and their work should be recognised.

A number of Senators, including Chiefs, criticised the suggestion by the Government that the Chiefs should make a point of being in their areas for the election. They pointed out that this would entail a considerable personal risk.

Chief Chingoma told the House that recently he had visited his area and had been ambushed by some "boys in the bush" and severely beaten. If Chiefs were to return home to carry on their traditional duties they should be given protection in the form of bodyguards, he said.

Chief Gwebu also described his reception at his home when he had been abused and his money stolen. "We would like the Minister to come and see things for himself," he said.

Senator Alec Ndlovu referred to the "criminal element" in the Chiefs' areas who did not realise that the Government and the party were broadly the same. Some of these "visitors" were planting landmines, he said, and behaving as if the war was still on.

Senator John Blunt said two main challenges to be faced in the next 20 years would be urbanisation and bureaucracy.

It would not be realistic to expect people who had migrated to the towns to return to the countryside, but a major effort was needed to ensure that the drift to the cities did not continue unchecked.

The rural areas would need the same facilities as the towns, including water supplies, hospitals, housing and shopping centres. Administrators should also be relocated in the rural areas, and not remain distant bureaucrats in the capital.

Senator Blunt said Zimbabwe should not repeat the mistakes of other African countries which had pushed industrialisation at the expense of agriculture. When industrialisation failed, hunger had been the result.

The debate was adjourned until tomorrow.

REPORTAGE ON ECONOMIC RESOURCES CONFERENCE

Needs, Resources Highlighted

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] New Schools Needed

WITH one of the highest birth-rates in the world, Zimbabwe needed to provide schooling for about 700 additional children each day of the year in order to educate all the country's children of school-going age.

Or, in other terms, a new primary school was needed each day of the year, and it was for this reason that, although Zimbabwe's school population was increasing, the percentage of children in school was dropping.

Addressing a sectoral conference on education at the symposium, the acting Secretary for Education, Mr M. E. Richardson, said that the percentage of children in secondary schools had dropped from 21,7 percent in 1967 to 19 percent in 1978.

This was despite the fact that the number of children in secondary schools had increased from 20 400 in 1967 to 45 200 in 1978.

In absolute terms, Mr Richardson said, this meant that the country needed to provide schooling for about 700 additional children every day of the year if it was to meet population growth requirements.

The acting Secretary said he regarded the country's rate of population increase to be the "most serious of our problems in Zimbabwe". This rate of increase was the fourth highest in the world and the second highest in Africa, following hard on the heels of Kenya.

Regarding the effects of the war on education in Zimbabwe, Mr Richardson said that the number of seven-year-olds attending school in 1976 had dropped by 13 percent compared with the same age group attending school in 1967.

Also, although in 1976, 72 percent of seven-year-olds were in school, only 61 percent of primary school-age children were in a similar position. This indicated the extent of "drop-out" from grades one to seven.

Damage to schools during the war had been "very considerable" and the estimated cost of restoration was more than $30 million.

Progress had been made in this regard, and of the 2 000 schools closed by the war, only 234 primary and 22 secondary schools had not yet reopened.

In many cases, however, children were being taught in seriously damaged buildings or under the trees where buildings used to be. The need for external aid was therefore "a matter of great urgency".

The latest figure for enrolments in the second term of this year was 891 363. This indicated "considerable overcrowding" and it was "impossible" to state what percentage of age groups was attending primary school.

Turning to the provision of finance for education, Mr Richardson said that, in 1964, when the Federation broke up, the education budget was about $24 million. In 1976 it had risen to $76 million.

In 1979-80, the education vote was about $120 million rising to $185 million in 1980-81. This was "no mean figure for a small country and one which is second only to that for defence in its magnitude".

Nonetheless, funds were "desperately" needed for the expansion of secondary schools.

Thirty-five sites had been identified in rural areas where secondary schools would prove educationally viable. Salisbury currently needed 40 primary schools and Bulawayo 16.

"It is obvious, therefore, that some drastic rethinking is required if we are going to adequately increase our educational provision in this country."

"We have just got to find ways of providing primary schools more cheaply and more quickly. It is also my firm belief that when housing is provided in townships, the provision of primary schools at least must become an essential and compulsory part of that development—the cost being built into rent and rate structures."

Despite the "almost surprising" progress that had been made in the re-opening of schools and the enrolment of children since independence, one of the most inhibiting factors was the shortage of teachers.

However, plans were now well advanced for the provision of "crash" training programmes to be followed by programmes to upgrade the qualifications of less qualified teachers.

Mr Richardson described the introduction of free education this week as "a great step forward". The next step, he said, would "of course" be free compulsory primary education.

Although Government had declared in its election manifesto that it intended the introduction of free secondary schooling and the eventual introduction of free education "all the way to university and technical college level", one of the "burning" moral issues was going to be whether it was fair to provide some children with free secondary education when others were not getting any at all.

Agriculture Is Battered But Not Broken

AGRICULTURE in Zimbabwe was bent and battered, but far from broken, Senator Denis Norman, the Minister of Agriculture, said yesterday.

Opening the agricultural section of the conference at the University of Zimbabwe, he said he hoped that the delegates would come to appreciate the value of agriculture, which he said was possibly the most important industry in the country.

He said the aim of agriculture was to provide internal stability and give prosperity to everyone concerned in the industry.

Stressing the difficulties and problems agriculture had faced in the past, the Minister said the country was subject to sanctions and in the past seven to eight years "we have had a pretty bitter war on our hands".

Senator Norman said: "Agriculture in Zimbabwe is bent and battered, but far from broken."

Because of the many problems the farmers had been through in the past, the community had gained a resilience which would ensure success in the end.

He said he hoped that the delegates visiting the country would become aware of the determination of the farmers in Zimbabwe.

"We have had the reputation of being quality farmers, and in spite of sanctions we have maintained that quality," Senator Norman said.

Although the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, had spelled out the priorities for the Government, the Senator felt that another was the expansion of agriculture.

He said the country could be self-sufficient in produce and export to other countries.

He disputed any suggestion of there being land shortages and land hunger. The Minister said that 25 percent of the land available to agriculture was still under-utilised.

Senator Norman stressed to the international and local delegates that agriculture in this country was served by an administration which "will be hard to beat anywhere else in the world".

He called Zimbabwe a land of opportunity and said he was optimistic for the future of the industry. "At the end of the week I hope you will be able to share our optimism," he said.

The Minister said with the rebuilding of the nation perhaps something could be created which was "unique in the world".

Joint Ventures Feasible

THE Government had received many offers to engage in joint ventures with new foreign investors, the Minister of Mines, Mr Maurice Nyagumbo, told the conference.

The State may wish, at some stage, to get involved on a joint venture basis and the possibilities would have to be explored, he said.

The level and rate of any State participation must be determined by the priorities in the Public Sector Development Plan.

"For some time these priorities will lie in the fields of infrastructure, social services and rural development which will preempt most of the country's financial resources," said the Minister.

He said the Government recognised the importance of mining, which had continued to expand over the past decade, despite the war and related problems.

The Government was equally conscious of the need to maintain the growth which was dependent upon foreign investment and technical expertise.

It recognised that it would be folly to tamper with such a successful industry.

The intention was to stimulate even greater mining activity.

While accepting the role of foreign private enterprise in mining, the Government was most anxious that local capital should play its part in mining investment.

The aim was that Zimbabweans would increasingly participate in the management of the country's mineral resources.

The Minister stressed that there would be no nationalisation of mining, a policy which ensured that foreign capital was protected from expropriation.

There would be no discrimination between the domestic and foreign investors on taxation of income, except for the withholding of tax.

"At present, remittable dividends and profits are limited to 50 percent of after-tax profits," he said.

"Few companies are likely to be affected by this formula because it is common for up to half of the profits to be retained.

"It is my Government's intention to allow free remittability of profits and dividends at the earliest possible moment when the foreign exchange situation has improved," he said.

Foreign venture capital invested from July 1 could be repatriated after two years, subject only to deduction in respect of any dividends remitted in this period and of any capital profits made.

The amounts deducted could be invested in State bonds which allow for repatriation over six years.

Further relaxation would be made as soon as conditions allowed.

Domestic participation would not be feasible in the early stages, so foreign investors were advised to provide for domestic equity participation within a reasonable period.

The Minister said foreign investment would also be encouraged in existing mining enterprises where an injection of additional foreign capital, with technology, would mean an increase in productivity and an improvement in the end product.

No special taxation, exchange control or import control benefits should be expected by foreign investors who entered into joint ventures with the Government.

The Government would do all in its power to ensure that Zimbabwe provided a safe and secure haven for future investors.

Stability Essential for Farms

STOCK and crop thefts would have to be eradicated and the security situation stabilised before the commercial farming sector would be able to realise its full potential, Mr J. Strath-Brown said yesterday.

Mr Strath-Brown, a farmer and past chairman of the Grain Producers' Association, was speaking at the agricultural section of the conference.

He told delegates that in countries where commercial agriculture had not received the attention it deserved, the food production system had crumbled.

This should not be allowed to happen in Zimbabwe, as the country had great potential as a food producer. If this potential could be realised, then Zimbabwe would become a stabilising influence in Southern Africa, said Mr Strath-Brown.

However, at present, the country's food reserves were nil, and a major cause of this was the pricing policies of previous governments.

This "low-cost" policy had the effect of keeping food prices down, but was in the long run self-defeating, as it drove farmers from the land, cutting food production and eventually resulting in valuable foreign currency having to be used to buy food.

At present, the food availability in Southern Africa was 10 percent below what it should be. In the rest of Africa, the figure was about 22 percent below what was required, said Mr Strath-Brown.

If a similar situation was to be prevented from occurring in Zimbabwe, the Government would have to keep the commercial farmers on the land.

Because of the size of the agricultural industry in this country, expansion would mean improvements in employment opportunities for the people, he added.

Tobacco Rewards

THE tobacco industry will reward more Zimbabweans both socially and economically in the years ahead than any other industry, Mr Giles Dorward, former president of the Zimbabwe Tobacco Association said yesterday.

He told the agriculture section of the conference that tobacco was "the people's industry" as it employed more labour than any other.

Although at present the industry was going through a stage in which expansion had been cut, there was "enormous scope" for growth.

For instance, if farmers in the tribal areas could be brought into the industry, the total area under cultivation could be quadrupled, said Mr Dorward.

Invest in Wool--Plea

FOREIGN financiers were urged to invest in the carpet and wool industry and make Zimbabwe self-sufficient and a large exporter to the rest of Africa.

Mr Alan Fellingham, who is general manager of Norton Karina Textiles, told delegates to the conference the industry was well poised in the coming decade to make the country self-sufficient and an exporter of carpets and wool products.

"Whilst the country and inhabitants of Zimbabwe suffered during sanctions, it led to the building of a solidly based infrastructure of management and engineering talents."

The industry was enjoying a favourable export market in countries to the north and south which was an indication that its quality was comparable to anything produced in Southern Africa.

Mr Fellingham, however, told the delegates that up to 90 percent of all raw materials were imported and out of these a high proportion were petro-chemical derivatives.

Another factor that was hampering development in the industry was lack of foreign exchange and the world oil crisis.

Boom Leaves Cloth Firms with Skills Shortage

THE specialised yarns, cloth and fabrics industry had been hit by shortage of machinery, technology and managerial skills due to increased demand caused by the expanding economy, an industry representative, Mr Stuart Mattinson said.

There was a need for a highly motivated management structure, tried-and-proven labour force, supply of basic raw materials at competitive costs, knowledge of local and other African markets and ready access at favourable rates to many markets which were at present remote from other sources of supply.

Zimbabwe had a well-developed base to enable the industry to progress if the present bottlenecks were removed. Some sophisticated economies had poured huge investments to establish a sound base for industries in some countries without good feedback.

"Here in Zimbabwe that base, as we have already heard, is well established and in addition we have a well-developed manufacturing industry," said Mr Mattinson, who is managing director of James North, a Salisbury firm.

'Jobs Needed, Not New Technology'

ZIMBABWE did not need too much advanced technology which would put some people out of jobs, the marketing head of David Whitehead Textiles, Mr John Hillis, said yesterday.

Speaking to foreign delegates at the International Economic Resources Conference on Zimbabwe, he said the country needed machinery which created jobs or job opportunities.

"Advanced technology is all very well but in our experience it does not as a rule create jobs. In fact it does the very opposite and actually reduces job opportunities."

The textile industry was labour intensive and there was tremendous opportunity for job creation. But "super technology" should only be applied on a limited scale and in special cases.

At the moment the textile industry employed more than 20 000 people and if advanced technology was introduced, it would curtail future opportunities.

Mr Hillis said there were 40 registered textile industries spread throughout the country, and appealed to delegates wishing to invest to join the existing and successful companies.

Zimbabwe had all the facilities for foreign investment and for local people to involve themselves in successful textile projects by share participation.

The industry was promoting fabrics in the rural areas to ensure what the people made was also made available to them.

He called on the Ministry of Economic Planning and Development not to approve projects which were a duplication of existing industries. This was a waste of the country's foreign resources.

The textile industry used 20 percent of the country's cotton crop while the bulk was for export. It had done well under difficult conditions because of its well developed base.

All Set for Sales Spiral

THE garment industry was poised to make Zimbabwe the "Hong Kong or Switzerland" of Africa, company head Mr Raymond Shapiro told the conference.

"The indications are, with determination and ingenuity, this goal is well within our grasp."

He said the European Economic Community, with its massive markets, was only 10 hours away. "Our industry, we believe, is ideally situated to start supplying that market with some of its clothing needs."

There were problems which needed the immediate attention of all concerned to ensure progress and development.

These were a serious lack of top management specialists, shortage of qualified technicians, the need to modernise and update plant and machinery and to get a sufficient pool of skilled and semi-skilled labour.

The Government had already recognised the need for the industry to "retool" itself in order to obtain the standards of efficiency and quality necessary to capture export markets.

Mr Shapiro, managing director of Heritage Clothing, said the garment industry employed about 17 000 workers in about 150 establishments and predicted that the number would rise to 30 000 by the end of 1983.

An approach had been made to the Government to establish a national training school where short courses would be held to try to achieve 70 percent efficiency.

He appealed to representatives of foreign governments to assist in the training programmes.

Problems, Outlook Viewed

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Warning on Vacant Land

THE Government could not allow potentially productive land to lie vacant while absentee landlords used it for speculative purposes, the Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi, said yesterday.

"I am currently considering the introduction of measures to ensure that such land can be made available to the State to accommodate the need for overcoming existing land pressures and increasing agricultural productivity," the Minister told the economic resources conference in Salisbury.

The Government had, however, acknowledged the vital contribution made to the national economy by private enterprise in the agricultural sector, and it was hoped that commercial farming would consolidate its position and strengthen its productivity.

The traditional system of land rights had tended to hinder progressive development of the land in some areas and would be sought to make land distribution more compatible with development aims.

There were many difficulties to be overcome and not least of these was the historical claims associated with customary land rights and the "natural reluctance" of people to accept change.

Ultimately, the Minister said, the issue would be settled through national debate.

Despite the size of the task and the short time the Government had been in power, much had already been done in rural development.

So far, projects had been launched to settle experienced farmers on irrigation units at Chisumbanje and Middle Sabi. These were pilot projects which could be expanded to increase agricultural production and job opportunities.

A further project to be tackled soon was the settlement of small-scale commercial farmers on a dry-land basis in the Copper Queen area. Plans were also advanced for settlements on a similar basis in the Moyo area where land was yet to be acquired.

These were commercially-orientated settlement projects which initially involved leasing land units and then granting title "to those who have demonstrated successful performance".

The Government would also launch regional development programmes in tribal areas which had extreme population pressures and low incomes.

Plans for these — known as Intensive Rural Development Areas (IRDA) — would increase productivity levels and improve living conditions. IRDA 1 would be in the Victoria province where overcrowding was most extreme.

The plan would affect about 156 000 cultivators and would provide useful guidelines for developing similar areas in Zimbabwe.

Development was also taking place where former privately-owned properties had been bought in commercial farming areas. The settlement of this land would relieve pressure in the tribal areas and provide new opportunities for war-displaced people.

These projects related directly to the public sector and were, therefore, appropriate avenues in which donor countries and external aid agencies could help through both soft loans and grants.

Where aid had been offered for specific programmes, it had often been conditional on a matching contribution by the Government from its own resources.

This could limit the pace at which the Government implemented its rural programmes. And although Zimbabwe had a sound organisational base for planning and implementing projects, its resources would continue to be stretched.

Shortfalls would therefore have to be met by commissioning the private sector to do contract work. This might be arranged through technical aid under offer from external agencies, Dr Sekeramayi said.

Working Cattle Crisis Costly

AN estimated one million cattle — valued at about $100 million — died as a result of the war, the director of Devag, Mr A. T. Stubbs, told the conference yesterday.

He said in some regions there was a 90 percent reduction in the availability of draft cattle and nationally it was down by 30 percent.

Sixty tractors had been recently leased to Devag and these would be used extensively for ploughing before the rainy season. The cost would be $2,5 million, including operational costs, for 1½ seasons.

About a million people would benefit from vegetable and crop seed packages being handed out to returned refugees and war displaced people in rural areas.

A total of 586 rural training centres were being set up by his department, Mr Stubbs said, and six mobile units would be used.

The training operation would involve 1 300 field staff who would teach peasant farmers how to use the seed packages most effectively. They would also be provided with some implements.

Costs of the implements amounted to some $1,85 million and the training programme would cost about $1,9 million — of which only 25 percent had so far been allocated.

Mr Stubbs said the Government's programme of resettlement and renewal should be a springboard for longer-term objectives.

Earlier, the Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Dr Sydney Sekeramayi, told delegates he had been advised by the Commercial Farmers' Union that some commercial farmers were willing to help peasant farmers by lending tractors and personnel.

This, however, would apply only to places near tribal areas. With the decimation of cattle stocks, tractors were the only way out, the Minister said.

Gemstones Potential Tremendous Says Expert

MUCH of the tremendous potential of Zimbabwean gemstones was still untapped, local gemstone consultant Mrs S. Anderson said yesterday at the conference.

Sandawana emeralds enjoyed an international reputation and although emeralds were a comparatively recent development in Zimbabwe, there was a world-wide demand.

High quality emeralds were worth several thousand dollars a carat, she said, and this was a high incentive for thieves.

Mrs Anderson said that alluvial diamonds were first discovered near Gwelo in 1903. Since then a number of kimberlite diamond-bearing sites had been found, but most of these had proved uneconomical to work.

Most of the money spent in recent years on gemstones development had gone on diamonds, but the rising diamond price had forced the public to give greater attention to other stones, especially aquamarine and amethyst.

"We have a lot to look forward to now that people are beginning to realise the value of gemstones and the desire to possess them is strong."

Mrs Anderson said there were hundreds of tonnes of ornamental rocks in Zimbabwe that responded well to cleaning and polishing to make ashtrays and stone eggs. This could easily form the basis of an industry if the public's interest could be raised.

Bright Future for Furnishers

THE furniture industry in Zimbabwe expected a turnover of more than $30 million this year — an increase of 34 percent over the 1976/7 period, the Springmaster Corporation marketing manager, Mr B. A. Fraser, said yesterday.

"When one considers the restraints and problems which have been experienced by the industry in the past, the growth potential under normal trading conditions is most encouraging," Mr Fraser told delegates at the conference.

There had been a sudden growth in the economy after the end of the war and the lifting of sanctions, which had resulted in a higher demand for furniture.

Until recently the industry's potential market was represented by 400 000 consumers comprising mainly whites and a small number of blacks.

"The changing environment will bring about a geometrical explosion with the new emerging African businessmen," Mr Fraser said.

The improved working conditions being introduced and the Government's massive housing development plan would all contribute to an increased demand for furniture.

The industry employed about 5 000 workers, including skilled and semi-skilled in 38 organisations. There was a training programme designed to ease the current skilled labour shortage.

Mr Fraser said his company had received several inquiries from the United States and neighbouring African countries in the north and new markets were being explored.

He pointed out that transport was a problem facing exports to the north and would have to be improved before trade could start.

Maputo Rail Link Back in Action Soon

THE railway line to Maputo was expected to be back in operation next month and could alleviate some of the pressure on South Africa's lines, which handle about 95 percent of Zimbabwe's imports and exports, the general manager of NRZ, Mr Nigel Lea-Cox said yesterday.

The handling capacity of Maputo was about 15 million tonnes a year, although it would take some time for that figure to be realised.

Speaking to the infrastructure section of the conference, Mr Lea-Cox said the National Railways of Zimbabwe occupied a strategic position in Southern Africa, as it straddled the major export routes to the coast.

NRZ policy was to develop fully the existing rail connections with other countries rather than construct new links.

Plans for electrification of the railway system were well advanced and tenders for electric locomotives and other equipment had been issued.

The first section of line to be electrified would be Salisbury-Gwelo, which would be started once testing on the 22 km track near Que Que had been completed.

Expatriates a Last Resort

THE Posts and Telecommunications Corporation would employ expatriates only as a last resort, the Postmaster-General, Mr G. C. Mills, told the conference yesterday.

Expatriates had a lack of dedication and did little to raise standards, while the cost of employing them could be up to double that of using local workers.

However, the corporation would welcome overseas workers on normal pay and working conditions, he said.

During the past few years, the loss of skilled workers from the corporation had been one of its major problems.

A total of $250 million was needed over the next five years for development projects which would further expand what was already the third largest telecommunications network in Africa.

In Zimbabwe, there was an average of three telephones for 100 people, which was way above the 0,4 for 100 average of the 50 members of the OAU.

Coal Oil Feasible

THE development of an oil-from-coal industry, along the lines of Sasol in South Africa, was a feasible proposition for Zimbabwe, Mr John Milton, acting energy resource liaison officer with the Ministry of Mines and Energy Resources, said yesterday.

He told the infrastructure section of the conference that there was little hope of finding oil-fields in Zimbabwe, and the country was at the mercy of the oil producers.

But, with estimated coal reserves of 30 000 million tonnes, there was enough to provide all Zimbabwe's liquid fuel needs for the foreseeable future.

Such a Liquefaction project would be complicated and costly, and would depend on outside investment. It would take about 10 years for a plant to be established, Mr Milton said.

Roads Require $200m.

THE road authorities in Zimbabwe could maintain the existing system of roads in the country and expand it, the Secretary of Roads and Road Traffic, Mr P. Mainwaring, said yesterday.

But, he told delegates to the infrastructure section of the economic resources conference, that any large scale expansion of roads would depend largely on the availability of funds, mainly foreign aid.

A full development plan called for a total expenditure over the next five years of $200 million. This plan included improvement of roads in the rural areas and the construction of new main and secondary roads, said Mr Mainwaring.

The priority now was the repair of those roads which had been neglected because of the war, he added.

Plenty of Land for Ethanol

A large part of the Lowveld, up to 240 000 ha, could be used for the growing of sugar cane for ethanol production, the technical director of Triangle Ltd, Mr Clive Wenman, told the infrastructure section of the conference yesterday.

He said his company had about 12 000 ha of sugar cane under irrigation and channelled 150 000 tonnes of its sugar production to its newly-commissioned ethanol plant. This produced about 40 million litres of ethanol for blending with imported petrol.

Offshoot

However, the use of ethanol as a fuel additive was not the only one to which it could be put, said Mr Wenman. Ethylene, an ethanol derivative, was the basic ingredient in a number of chemical processes.

This offshoot of the ethanol industry had great potential which had not been fully investigated, he said.

The main factor in its favour, however, was that it was a renewable resource.

"In thousands of years, long after the coalfields at Wankie have been exhausted, they will still be growing sugar cane in the Lowveld," said Mr Wenman--a remark greeted with laughter from the delegates.

$35m. Boost for Paper Industry

Plans were under way for a $35 million chemical pulping plant to improve the quality of paper in Zimbabwe, the deputy managing director of Hunyani Pulp and Paper Industries, Mr John Scholes, told the conference yesterday.

The project, being investigated by the Government and the paper making industry, would go a long way in boosting paper production and maintain competitive prices.

"The stage has now been reached when very serious consideration must be given to the establishment of a chemical pulping industry in the country for the paper making industry to remain competitive, both as to price and quality."

Local demand for the industry's output would grow at a rate of 15 percent a year while foreign currency for fibrous raw materials was expected to reach $8 million by the middle of next year.

The industry was well placed to expand and become the main exporter to the east and north. There was a high level of technical expertise within the organisations, backed by direct access to overseas technology.

Mr Scholes said care should be taken to ensure that the industry attracted and retained a nucleus of people with the required technological knowledge and experience.

Production would be stepped up from the 77 000 tonnes to 81 600 tonnes a year when expansions being made to the Umtali and Norton divisions of the organisation were completed next year.

Investment in the industry at the moment was $25 million and for it to achieve production targets, more than $100 million would be needed to replace old plant.

The industry used 21 000 tonnes of imported bleached and unbleached chemical pulp, 35 000 tonnes waste paper and 50 000 tonnes pulpwood.

'Tonic for Us', Says Tracey

An earnest "thank you" was conveyed to the 1 000 delegates at the economic resources conference yesterday by Zimbabwe Promotion Council chairman Mr C. G. Tracey. He said their enthusiasm had been a tonic for Zimbabwe.

In a final speech following the hundreds delivered by delegates during the week, Mr Tracey said the outside world now knew far more about the country and its resources. He urged foreign visitors to spread the facts about this country throughout the world.

Mr Tracey said the idea behind the conference had been to make sure that world attention, in danger of flagging after the elections, stayed on Zimbabwe now that its political problems had been solved.

"I believe in the old maxim, 'God helps those who help themselves'; that we should disabuse ourselves of the idea that we could sit back, that the outside world would be our suitor and that we should expect them all to come to our door."

He said: "The conference has succeeded in its aim," and "the outside world now knows far, far more about us, about our resources, about our Government, about the stability we are intent on establishing and about the opportunities for trade, perhaps some aid, and investment."

Boom Forecast

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 pp 3, 14

[Article by Terry Blocksidge]

[Text] A BOOM is round the corner for Zimbabwe, provided the country has stability for the next few months.

This was the clear and cheerful forecast of businessmen, bankers, miners and other experts from 32 countries at the end of the international economic resources conference Zimbabwe on Friday.

With it goes the promise of more jobs, and the wealth necessary to introduce and improve welfare and education services.

The Government is intent on directing development and investment to the formerly neglected areas of the country to ensure Zimbabwe's badly-off majority benefit.

Dr Bernard Chidzero, Minister of Economic Planning and Development, told the closing session the Government would not allow the perpetuation of "islands of prosperity in a sea of poverty".

The war was fought because of dissatisfaction with the economic structure, he said. The national income ratio between the wealthy and the poor was $1 to the poor for every $11 earned by the wealthy. In farming, the ratio was $1 to $25.

For this reason, Government priorities had much to do with rural development in particular and the eradication of poverty in general, he said.

He warned that investment in developed sectors would aggravate the income differentials. The development of high technologies did not have big spill-over effects benefitting the poor.

The Government's objective, he said, was to create a society where "you can drive from Highlands to Highfield without feeling pangs of shame and saying 'can't we do better?'"

The conditions of Salisbury and Seke were worlds apart, he said.

Calling for an end to the country's dual economy — one rich, one poor — Dr Chidzero said there must not be growth with disparity.

Moments earlier, Mr William Overhold, vice-president of the Bankers Trust Company of the U.S.A., cheered Zimbabweans when he told delegates: "There is no shortage of money to invest. The banks are bulging with it. There is a shortage of countries that can pay back." He saw no such problem in Zimbabwe.

Mr Vernon Stansbury, close to the purse-strings of millions of U.S. dollars as the deputy director of the import and export division of the Department of Commerce in Washington, assessed the prospects:

"Given two years of good order, this country's commerce and industry will simply explode."

But the Japanese are blazing the trail already. Six trading firms have set up operations in Salisbury and early next year a Tokyo Government trade agency will be opened.

Representing one of the big trading corporations, Mr Y. Nagano said they were looking for Zimbabwe exports to balance the trade, mainly minerals.

Forty Japanese delegates were at the conference. They were particularly interested in chrome and asbestos, and would like to see the import of car assembly kits and electrical appliances, said Mr N. Tsutsui, of the External Trade Organisation of Japan.

POSITIVE

He also saw Zimbabwe as the centre of distribution for Central Africa.

Britain's Sir Roy Geddes, president of the International Chamber of Commerce, praised the Government and private sector for the intensity of their co-operation.

He said businessmen had noted the definition of "socialism" by Mr Mugabe and Senator Nkala as meaning social democracy.

"People in Europe are certainly used to this so our general feelings about Zimbabwe now are positive. But it is the accumulation of deeds rather than words that matters in the end."

For this reason, many concerns will wait until the end of the year before making investment decisions.

This caution, together with the sheer mechanics of boardroom decisions and making financial arrangements, will mean that it will probably be around 18 months before investment cash begins to flow.

The Government will obviously want the money to reach Salisbury, rather than see giant companies doing paper deals outside the country.

As Advocate Ayerson Delo, a Ghanaian corporate lawyer with practices in Britain and the U.S., said: "What you have to be sure of is that the money really arrives and isn't just a paper transfer."

The lawyer, who was impressed by the wide range of mining opportunities, said companies linked to the Big Four mining enterprises in the country would need only six months to move money in.

The mining firms were all impressed with the country's potential. Mr Robert Barker, from the U.S., declared: "We're seriously considering increasing our interests here, especially in minerals. We're into gold and silver, the copper, lead and zinc business, and Zimbabwe's got 'em all."

Professor F. C. Jaffe, of Switzerland, said: "I believe this conference will have a catalysing effect. More assistance will now be forthcoming."

Professor Jaffe, a geologist from the Department of Earth Science at the University of Geneva, said geology students from Zimbabwe should study in Switzerland as a way to foster co-operation.

IMPRESSED

Most of the 300 foreign delegates who spent a week at lectures and touring the country were impressed by the level of Zimbabwe's development.

They were also surprised by the racial harmony.

As Miss Janice Williams, a consultant from Washington, said: "You can hardly believe there's been a war here. Your relationships here are better than in some areas of the States."

Many of the delegates, whose only brief had been reports in international news magazines, had expected to find a country teetering on the edge of civil war.

"It's a pity I can't advise as many people as Newsweek," said Mr Stansbury.

Some delegates will continue to watch the political developments. The Tekere affair will be closely scrutinised, a government man said.

At an early stage of the conference, however, the sombre-suited bankers listened to Finance Minister, Senator Enos Nkala, so intently you could hear a dollar-note drop and agreed with him when he said: "I consider this Government has done a tremendous amount in four months in office."

[Editorial: "Why Conference Meant So Much"]

[Text]

THE economic conference which ended in Salisbury on Friday was not only a superb locally inspired public-relations exercise bent on attracting much-needed foreign investment. It also highlighted, through Dr Chidzero's timeous speech, the uncomfortable disparity of wealth in this country.

Over the years one sector of the community, the whites, had through their skills and initiative, prospered and developed a lifestyle second to none. Success bred success and massive investment moved along customary monetary paths. The handsomeness of Salisbury itself reflects this.

But the majority of the people, the blacks, sat on the other side of the fence . . . envious and poor. Most lacked the inherent talent and opportunity to match the whites and little investment money flowed their way.

While it was true that white enterprise created much employment and successive governments did introduce enormous social benefits such as excellent health services and a sound basic education system, obviously this was not enough.

Economically it was still basically a classic "haves and have nots" situation, which, as Dr Chidzero rightly pointed out, led to the recent war.

It is the desire to right the economic imbalance in Zimbabwe that led to the present Government's advocation of an "egalitarian socialist society".

While this phrase initially frightened the whites here, believing that the Mugabe Administration was about to strip them of all their possessions and turn the country into a drab and impoverished land similar say to the communist satellites of Eastern Europe, it appears that the Prime Minister's real objective is to raise the overall quality of life here for everyone, not lower it.

Hence Dr Chidzero's appeal to foreign investors to take a long-term view, channel money here into the less-developed areas, perhaps settle initially for lesser dividends, for in the long run they will profit enormously.

The Government and the nation should be grateful to the Zimbabwe Promotion Council for luring so many representatives of international business to this country at such a crucial time when a reassurance of our country's overall sound economic infrastructure and potential was needed.

Having now spent a week here, been bombarded with a plethora of excellent position papers on the state of Zimbabwe's economy, the hundreds of delegates are now winging their way home, hopefully to make optimistic reports and evaluations to their respective governments and boards.

The months ahead should see whether it has all been worthwhile.

ECONOMIC MINISTER CALLS FOR BUSINESS-GOVERNMENT COOPERATION

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] ZIMBABWE had embarked upon an experiment which must not fail, Dr Bernard Chidzero told the final session of the economic resources conference yesterday.

The Minister of Economic Planning and Development told delegates that the private sector must work with the Government to ensure success. The Government would not be found wanting in innovativeness and willingness to co-operate.

"For the partnership to succeed, the private sector should take a more long-term view with regard to risk and profitability, and a broader perspective in its investment strategy," said Dr Chidzero.

He suggested that the surest foundation for prosperity and security was to spread investment to neglected and less developed areas instead of following established monetary paths. This policy might result in low returns in the short-term, but it would yield high social benefits.

Warming to his theme on the direction of investment Dr Chidzero said that in the past this country had had two economies — the well developed industrial sector, including commercial agriculture, and the predominantly subsistence rural sector. The result, he said, had been an inequitable distribution of incomes, a situation that had to be changed.

"This must entail shifts in patterns of investment and consumption, and necessitate institutional adjustments to redress the imbalance.

"It means, in fact, a comprehensive approach to investment so that, while the adjustments are being made, increased investment in poorer areas is not accompanied by depression in the more developed areas."

Dr Chidzero added: "Market prices alone may well prove inadequate to the task. Deliberate action, planned development, becomes a necessity."

Re-direction of investment in order to achieve growth of equity made long-term sense, for both the Government and private enterprise.

"Government has to direct the trend of investment while assisting the private investors so that their individual efforts fit into the national goals and priorities envisaged by Government."

One area of partnership was the repair to public sector services damaged during the war. The estimated cost was U.S.$300 million, of which private property accounted for more than half.

Dr Chidzero warned: "Unless the private sector responds by at least aiding the reconstruction and resettlement programmes, food shortages are likely to occur. This would inevitably raise urban wages over and above the levels necessary for equity reasons, and lower profitability."

On the question of repatriation of profits, he said there was a need for compromise. The private sector had to invest with the full knowledge that "in the short-term reinvestment in Zimbabwe could conceivably deprive the investor of a slightly higher return which he might obtain elsewhere in the world.

"But, in the long run, the benefits generated by his re-investments would encourage further capital growth, create a secure society, generate longer positive externalities for investment generally, and enlarge both private and public gains," said Dr Chidzero.

"In the long - term therefore it would seem that the more the foreign private sector reinvests in this country, both individually and collectively, the more secure the future of the private sector will be."

WORKERS MUST SHARE IN NEW ECONOMY

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 14

[Article by Muongororí: "Beware of the Wolves in Sheep's Clothing"]

[Text] IN Zimbabwe's massive reconstruction programme, the need for foreign aid through capital grants and investment can not be over-emphasised. It is in this light that the many assurances by the Government, and indeed by the Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, to foreign investors that they need not harbour any fears of nationalisation must be viewed.

During his recent visit to America the Prime Minister bent over backwards to assure investors that his Government had no intention of adopting hardline socialist policies likely to jeopardise private investment in Zimbabwe.

And lately the Minister of Finance, Senator Enos Nkala, made a passionate appeal to international investors to recognise that peace has at last come to Zimbabwe and urged them to take heart from the track record of the new Government since it took the reigns of power four months ago.

Speaking to the Economic Resources Conference at the University of Zimbabwe, Senator Nkala implored businessmen at large not to see the new Government as "an evil ogre" and instead take full advantage of the country's economy, which has all indications of rapidly picking up.

Thus, with Zimbabwe's doors open to the world, it is hoped genuine investors looking for new areas into which to pump their money, will rise to the occasion. As the Prime Minister said during his American tour, Zimbabwe is a land of opportunity for those willing to identify with the aspirations of the people.

But as ordinary sense would dictate, those "doors" have to be closely watched. For among those likely to come to Zimbabwe will be "wolves in sheep's clothing", who will try to take advantage of the country's vulnerable position as a novice in the complex world of hard bargaining to inveigle and subvert the country's economy for their own selfish ends.

In a world bedevilled by economic skulduggery of every description, it is prudent to note that among those that will come to Zimbabwe disguised as investors will be protagonists of the world's newest scourge — neo-colonialism.

Zimbabwe must be resolute in rejecting neo-colonialism, even if it comes cloaked in the attractive trimmings of foreign aid or investment. Aid offers, in whatever form, must be scrutinised and accepted free of strings and away from clandestine "deals" that could compromise Zimbabwe's hard-won independence.

The Government must therefore exercise maximum caution to ensure that our enthusiasm to woo investment does not blind us to these harsh realities. An important factor that should provide the guiding principle in this task is a deliberate bias towards serving the interests of the common Zimbabwean who, by and large, has borne the brunt of the war.

Indeed, one of the crucial issues that any newly independent nation has to contend with is introducing legislative measures that will enhance and consolidate that independence.

In Zimbabwe's democracy, pledged to the ideal of free enterprise and unrestricted participation of big capital in the investment structure of the country, the task of formulating suitable legislation is made doubly difficult by the acutely divergent demands on such laws by the various sectors of the society.

Such legislation must carry a message of redemption for the many Zimbabweans eager for a piece of the promised independence cake, and at the same time reflect the reconciliatory fervour necessary for the creation of not only a non-racial society but a free enterprise economy.

Ostensibly, therefore, The Employment Act (1980), which recently passed through the House of Assembly, seems designed to tackle this daunting task of undoing the many constrictive laws by which the former colonial administration maintained its stranglehold on the black majority in Zimbabwe.

But even more significant is the fact that the Bill virtually appoints the Minister of Labour and Social Services as something of a legislative custodian of the workers' interests through his designated authority to make regulations that will control, regulate and rationalise a worker's life while in contract with his employer.

It is my hope that the Minister will use the powers provided under this Act to guarantee workers' participation in the running of their economy. Indeed, it is through this formidable piece of legislation that the Minister will have to deal with what political phraseology describes as "crisis of expectation" among the many Zimbabwean workers who have had a raw deal from impervious colonial employers of the past.

PLAN TO RELOCATE GUERRILLAS IN CHITUNGWIZA REPORTED

Feasibility Studied

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] A CABINET committee is studying the feasibility of temporarily accommodating between 15 000 and 17 000 former guerillas in houses at Chitungwiza, on the outskirts of Salisbury.

By Government order, allocations of all houses in the town were frozen six weeks ago, and 1 700 houses are lying empty awaiting the arrival of the former guerillas, sources said yesterday.

It is understood that the first were to have arrived in the town on Monday but did not show up.

According to sources there is resistance to the proposal by former guerilla commanders.

On Sunday the Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, addressed an open-air meeting of residents at St Aiden's School, Chitungwiza, and outlined the plan. He spoke in the vernacular, said one source.

The chairman of the Cabinet committee is the Minister of Public Works, Mr Clement Muchachi.

The Chitungwiza Urban Council has been told of the plan.

On August 27 a party of about five Cabinet Ministers, believed to be members of the committee, visited the town and inspected the empty houses. Members of the army hierarchy were also present.

About 460 of the houses are adjacent to the squatter camp at Chirambahuyo.

They are part of the Zengeza suburb, known as Zengeza 4. About 1 300 houses recently built there were already sold and the urban council had customers for the remaining 460 when the freeze was ordered.

Squatters at Chirambahuyo also claim that the Government has promised them these houses.

These are core houses with two rooms, a kitchen and a bathroom, and serviced with electricity. The idea is that the buyers extend the cores by building additional rooms.

The remainder of the "frozen" houses are in Seki, another suburb of Chitungwiza.

These are known as ultra-low cost shelters, built of concrete blocks with no windows.

The town of Chitungwiza came into being in 1978 when the former townships of Seki, Zengeza and St Mary's were merged and an urban council was elected.

Residents Angered

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] APPREHENSION and bitterness among local residents await 15 000 to 17 000 former guerillas if they move to Chitungwiza on the outskirts of Salisbury, as part of a Government plan to resettle them.

Many of the residents are apprehensive because they feel they will bring lawlessness in the area. People at sprawling Chirambahuyo squatter compound are also bitter because their hopes to move into the new houses under the Chitungwiza Urban Council may be dashed. Yesterday several said they were contemplating returning to their home villages.

"If former guerillas are coming here, then the Government must ensure that they are all disarmed because this could mean trouble here," said a vegetable seller of Chirambahuyo, Mrs Rostina Chirerukira.

She claimed she had been on the waiting list for a house in the council area "for a long time" and wanted to know what plans the Government had for the squatters.

It was unrealistic, she said, for the Government to expect them to return to their home villages with nothing to build a new life.

She claimed there was a danger in mixing ordinary folk with the guerillas as most of them had become "wild and dangerous" after many years of living and fighting in the bush.

But Mr Tusker Chiredzi, also of Chirambahuyo, had a different view. "The Government must reconsider its decision because the guerillas are just people like us and we all need decent accommodation," he said

But he did not see why the Government should practise favouritism in the allocation of houses by giving priority to the former fighters when there were people who had been on the council waiting list for years.

Mr Mondiwa Mutsvairo of Zengeza 4 said he would wait and watch developments.

"If they bring their guns here, then I am definitely moving out," he said.

Another vendor at Chikwanha, Mr Alexander Gondo, did not think it reasonable that the Government should resettle all the former fighters in one area.

"They should scatter them throughout the country so that there is no concentration of former guerillas in any one area," he said.

ATTACKS ON POLICE CONTINUE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

Attack on Gutu Police Camp

TWO policemen were injured during a rocket and smallarms attack on a police Support Unit base camp in the Gutu area early yesterday.

The incident followed close on the heels of another night attack — the third in a week — on the police station at Mtoko. The police station was hit, according to police sources, by three separate bursts of automatic fire between 8.30 and 10 p.m. on Thursday, but no one was injured, and no significant damage was caused.

The attack on Basera base camp, more than 200 km to the south, but in the neighbouring police administrative district, was more serious, Iana reports.

A large group of heavily armed men was thought to have been responsible, and firing from automatic weapons and RPG rockets continued "for a protracted period of time", sources said.

Significant damage is believed to have been caused; and two men injured, apparently by shrapnel.

Local police referred inquiries to police headquarters, who have "no comment".

The attacks coincided with reports that up to 15 000 guerillas from several assembly points are being moved into barracks at an undisclosed point east of Salisbury, out of their assembly points.

Mr Rex Nhongo, the commander of the ZANLA army and a senior representative of the country's Joint High Command, was due to fly to Mtoko on Thursday to address the men, but his trip was cancelled.

Instead, sources said, men were addressed by Commander Mahuru Anderson.

Policemen Threatened Near Muromo Base Camp

UMTALI.

THREE policemen had a narrow escape after they were surrounded by a mob of youths carrying knives, clubs and stones near the Muromo base camp this week.

A police spokesman said that the policemen—two regular constables and one auxiliary constable—were investigating an assault in the Muromo Area on Sunday when they were approached and surrounded by the mob.

The policemen managed to get away from the youths and made their way back to the base camp run by the Ministry of Home Affairs.

The mob followed the policemen and made their way towards the camp. A warning shot was fired into the air by a man in the camp but this did not deter the youths.

The district assistants and policemen attempted to close the camp gates in an effort to stop the mob, but while doing so one of the district assistants was stabbed in the groin. Another warning shot was fired into the ground and the youths dispersed. The injured district assistant was taken to Umtali Hospital.

Two hours after the incident, a breakdown truck travelling on the Melsetter road to recover a broken-down police vehicle, was stopped by a gang of youths at the Muromo business centre.

The youths hit the vehicle with sticks, causing minor damage. The driver of the vehicle was unhurt, and returned the breakdown truck to Umtali where he was given a police escort to recover the broken-down vehicle.

The spokesman also reported that at lunchtime last Thursday, a Mundondo bus was robbed by an armed man at Wengesi junction on the turn-off to Melsetter from the Birchenough Bridge road. The man, who was armed with an AK rifle and was dressed in camouflage, stole $200 and made off into the bush. Police are investigating.

In another incident, Mr Takera Manyanga, died at Gwanda kraal on Saturday after being beaten on the head with a stick. One man has been arrested in connection with his death.

On the same day, the body of a missing man, Mr Ernest Bingandadi, was found in an irrigation canal in the Zimunya Tribal Trust Land. He had been missing since August 12.

On Tuesday, a grenade of unknown type was located in a stream bed near Dangamvura. Army engineers were called in to remove the device.

HOLLAND JOINS REX NHONGO PEACE DRIVE

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] WITH tension rising around several assembly points and heavily armed guerillas roaming the roads in troubled Mtoko, ZANLA commander Mr Rex Nhongo, is planning a series of visits to his soldiers this week to try to avert a confrontation between his men and the police.

He has invited Mr Andre Holland, MP for Mtoko-Mrewa, to join the tour by road.

Mr Holland told The Sunday Mail yesterday: "Anything that helps to improve understanding and defuse tense situations can only benefit our country."

Mr Holland, the defence committee chairman in the white Parliamentary caucus, will visit X-Ray Assembly Point — scene of repeated trouble for two weeks — on Wednesday or Thursday with Mr Nhongo.

The police camp at Mtoko came under attack on successive nights last week.

After the fourth small-arms attack on the Mtoko police camp in less than a fortnight, Inspector Rob Riedy and two ZANLA local commanders held talks yesterday aimed at calming the troubled area.

The talks are to continue today.

Speaking from the police station in the village, Inspector Riedy described the situation as tense.

He said: "We are trying to calm things and get them under control."

The latest attack happened on Friday night. Fire was directed at the police station from a passing car. There was no injury or damage.

The police did not return fire.

Inspector Riedy said: "The people in the village are concerned. Their worries are shared by local farmers, although they are not so directly involved."

The police had battened down their offices in expectation of a violent weekend, according to Iana.

Two British journalists who visited the village said large numbers of ZANLA men from X-Ray, 5 km from the centre, were walking the streets armed with AK47 assault rifles. Many carried bayonets.

The two reporters, Paul Ellman of the Observer and Michael Farr of the Daily Telegraph, were flagged down by five armed ZANLA soldiers soon after passing a police roadblock on the Mtoko road at Mrewa.

Mr Ellman said later that the men "rather told us to give them all a lift". Most of the weapons were fitted with bayonets and the men bunched in the car with a menacing silence. They left the car near the entrance to the AP.

Mr Ellman described the experience as "frightening".

After an attack on a police Support Unit camp in the Gutu area in which two policemen were wounded, police found rocket launchers, rifle grenades and spent magazines of AK 47 rifles yesterday.

The attack was made by a large group of armed men, sources in the area said.

Police in a large area of the Midlands around Enkeldoorn have been harassed as they have gone about their duties.

Iana says officials are growing angry over the Government Ministers or lack of interest. No Government Ministers or top military brass have visited troubled areas, despite frequent requests for intervention.

ARMY ENGINEERS BEGIN CLEARING MINEFIELDS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 1

[Article by Mike Williams]

[Text] ARMY engineers have begun the first skirmishes of what may prove the longest battle of the war: neutralising between two million and three million landmines ringing much of the nation's borders with Mozambique and Zambia.

The operation began quietly last month when teams of engineers began burning off the grass in selected areas of the border minefields, which stretch for 750 km along five different sections of Zimbabwe's northern and eastern borders.

The burning accomplishes two things. It detonates many of the explosive devices above the ground and it makes it easier for engineers to move about in the deadly strips.

But the remaining mines are still a menace to the population, an army spokesman warned last week.

The border minefields were created over five years in an attempt to deter guerilla infiltration during the war.

The last mines were put down in December, but the numbers, rugged terrain and the fact that many of the explosives have moved from their original positions all add up to a situation that is unique in the experience of modern war.

Army engineers have been wrestling with the problem all year, testing and rejecting numerous methods of clearance that they hoped could be adapted to conditions here.

The standard NATO-approved method of mine removal — four-man teams crawling through the field probing ahead of them with long metal rods — is too time-consuming to be effective here. It would take hundreds of years.

Flail tanks were also considered and rejected as unsuitable.

The United States Army has developed a clearance procedure called the Fuel Air Explosive, in which a device is detonated in the air above a mined area, in turn detonating all explosive devices within 200 metres of the blast.

Rejected

But that is too costly — about $60 000 a blast — and has not yet been perfected, engineers say.

A plan to use an armoured flame thrower in conjunction with a armoured bulldozer, flail tank and armoured command vehicle has also been rejected.

Last month the engineers had their greatest success so far by using an armoured bulldozer to clear a portion of the minefield around Victoria Falls that had previously been burned and its shrapnel mines detonated by marksmen.

"We can do quite a bit with a bulldozer. The major drawback is that it is slow," said Major Keith Sampson, commander of the army engineers.

Another possibility was suggested by British army experts who visited Zimbabwe two months ago — a light tractor fitted with a long attachment called a "scrub cutter" that could be adapted with a flail device and then operate behind a bulldozer.

"The job is possible, but it will take time — several years at least — and it will take money," Major Sampson said.

"Under the most favourable conditions such a team could clear perhaps 16 km a day, which means that it would take one team about 47 years to clear all of the mine fields.

"With 10 teams it could be only five years, but the initial cost would be about $1.6 million," he said.

At the moment little has been allocated for minefield clearance. With the rains approaching the most useful time for clearance is running out.

"Provided we can get the equipment that we want, we should be able to clear at least 90 percent, and possibly 100 percent, in all of the border fields in which we can get a vehicle," Major Sampson said.

Not all of the minefields lend themselves to such optimism. The mine field around Umtali is in heavy forest that makes a formidable barrier to clearance teams.

The best short-term solution there would seem to be to maintain the protective fences until a better alternative is available, Major Sampson said.

SCRAPPING OF NATIVE CUSTOMS OPPOSED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Giles Kuimba: "Lobola Stays, Say Outraged African Leaders"]

[Text] TOP-RANKING AFRICANS last week jumped to the defence of the traditional African customs of lobola and polygamy after a statement by University of Zimbabwe law lecturer, Mr Brian Mparadzi that lobola and polygamy were out of touch with socialist thinking because they made women less equal than men.

Worse still, he was sure the Government would probably legislate against the customs.

Professor Gordon Chavunduka, Dean of the Faculty of Social Studies at the university said what Mr Mparadzi had said about lobola was nothing new.

The previous Government had held the same view and tried to abolish lobola, or at least to limit the amount paid, but all these attempts had failed.

"No one can destroy the lobola institution by legislation. If you try to destroy that which people still believe in very strongly, the people react by ignoring that law and continue as before.

"If lobola is going to stop, it will be the people themselves who will do it because of changing economic conditions — not because of legislation.

"Neither can polygamy be stopped by legislation because those who want it can still get additional wives without registering such marriages.

"And again, it will be difficult for the courts to say what is and what is not a marriage."

In any case polygamous marriage was declining because of the changing economic conditions.

Dr Chavunduka felt that women married without lobola would feel worthless and insecure.

Equally, men would consider their wives worthless and there would be a rise in the divorce rate, at least initially, he said.

There would also be the effect of one half of the law working against the other half, in that abolishing lobola would encourage polygamy.

"The lobola institution has served very well for centuries.. One wonders what the motive would be for its removal." he said.

"We are identified with this custom which is part of our heritage. Destroying it would leave us without any identity of our own, since destroying this custom would mean the loss of part of our heritage, our culture and our identity."

To those who said lobola made women less equal than men, Dr Chavunduka asked how the removal of lobola necessarily brought about equality between men and women.

"This is not true," he said. "Most women hold very powerful positions in their families and no important decisions can be made without them. In fact, it is only a minority of men living in towns who regard their wives as being inferior to them."

Speaking in a private capacity and not as a Cabinet Minister, Mrs Teurai Ropa Nhongo, wife of the ZANLA commander, Rex Nhongo, said she would not listen to any suggestion to remove the custom of lobola.

"What may be done is to limit lobola to a reasonable amount," she said.

Mrs Nhongo said the custom of polygamy held more evils than virtues as in most cases the wives ended up hating each other and even the husband.

"Cases of one wife attempting to poison another, or the husband are all too common. Often there is hatred among the children," she said.

In any case, she said, no man could afford more than one wife in these modern times. Polygamy would die a natural death for economic reasons.

Mrs Nhongo said, however, that it should be left to the individual to decide whether he wanted one or more wives. Even the limiting of the amount paid for lobola could not be forced on the people, she said.

Senator Chief Rekayi Tangwena said the removal of lobola would of men living in towns who regard their wives as being inferior to them."

Speaking in a private capacity and not as a Cabinet Minister, Mrs Teurai Ropa Nhongo, wife of the ZANLA commander, Rex Nhongo, said she would not listen to any suggestion to remove the custom of lobola.

"What may be done is to limit lobola to a reasonable amount," she said.

Mrs Nhongo said the custom of polygamy held more evils than virtues as in most cases the wives ended up hating each other and even the husband.

"Cases of one wife attempting to poison another, or the husband are all too common. Often there is hatred among the children," she said.

In any case, she said, no man could afford more than one wife in these modern times. Polygamy would die a natural death for economic reasons.

Mrs Nhongo said, however, that it should be left to the individual to decide whether he wanted one or more wives. Even the limiting of the amount paid for lobola could not be forced on the people, she said.

Senator Chief Rekayi Tangwena said the removal of lobola would corrupt African society.

"We would become a faceless amoral society without any identity of our own," he said. "Our boys would embark on a baby producing spree, leaving women all over the place with fatherless children."

He said lobola was a custom that cemented permanent relationships, the removal of which would be a disaster for African society.

Admitting that he himself had two wives, plus two more left behind by his dead brothers, Chief Tangwena said he belonged to the old school which firmly believed in polygamy.

Mrs Stella Nduku, curator of ethnology at the Queen Victoria Museum in Salisbury, said lobola was symbolic of the Zimbabwean African culture and nothing could shake her belief in its rightness.

POSH CARS

Law or no law, she said, lobola would be paid for her daughters. It was a custom in which even ancestoral spirits were invoked to bless the marriage. It was a sound beginning for a sound marriage and the relationship that was built between the families concerned, she said.

The only evil that should be removed in the custom was the exploitation that often accompanied lobola in these modern times.

"Very soon, parents of a daughter being married could beging demanding posh cars before they give away their daughters if this exploitation of the custom is not stopped," she said.

Mrs Nduku said polygamy was debatable. There were advantages and disadvantages, but she left it to the individual to make his choice In the final analysis, she said, it would be seen that some people benefited from it, while others harvested nothing but disaster.

Mr Aaron Hodza, lecturer in African tradition and culture at the University of Zimbabwe, is polygamous and proud of it, with two wives and eight children so far.

Described as a "pillar" of the department of African tradition and culture at the university, Mr Hodza said the trouble with some Africans was that they seemed to lose pride in their identity.

"They go overseas to study and obtain the so-called high education and Western civilisation. Then they become so westernised that they want to destroy their own heritage, their African identity and culture," he said.

"It is a kind of inferiority complex which they harbour subconsciously about their background. These are the people who, on returning home, say they can no longer eat sadza or speak their own language.

"They even hide their own language from their children, with the result that such children cannot communicate with their own kind. There are many such children in Zimbabwe today. What language were the parents using in their own home?

"These are the people we call black whites today. They preach against African custom and culture and do everything African, because they would have preferred to have been born whites.

"Lobola is a custom for which we should be thankful. It is to this custom that we owe the high standard of our moral behaviour, and destroying it would mean removing the very pillar on which our moral fibre and society are embroidered.

"It was never meant for the abuse of any woman, but for the welding of a lasting relationship between man and wife, and between the two families to whom the two belonged.

"Like lobola, polygamy is a custom where nothing is forced. It has always been left to the individual to make his choice. It is a custom in which freedom of choice is practised.

"If a white government did not abolish it, why should this suggestion be made now to a black government by a black Zimbabwean to remove a black custom?" Mr Hodza asked.

IGNORANT

A Salisbury businessman, Dr Isaac Samuriwo who is a chief in his own right, summed up popular African feeling about the custom by saying these were ideas from people who had never lived in the tribal areas.

"They are ignorant of the realities of tribal life and tradition and not qualified to speak about it. People who would wish to influence our society should first be educated to its realities before they can even try," he said.

A spokesman for the Division of District Administration of the Ministry of Local Government said the Government did not envisage any changes in the immediate future as far as this age-old African custom was concerned.

The African Marriage Act would continue to implement the law as it stood today, he said, adding that the lecturer was expressing his own opinion, and not that of the Government.

TRADITIONAL HEALERS HOLD CONGRESS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 7 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] The country's traditional healers must guard against being corrupted by the urban environment, the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, told the inaugural congress of the Zimbabwe National Healers' Association at Gwanzura Stadium, Salisbury, yesterday.

The two-day congress, attended by about 1 000 traditional healers from throughout the country is being held to ratify the organisation's constitution and to elect a national executive committee.

Dr Ushewokunze said ancestors who were mediums of great or lesser spirits did not experience the flux, rush and flurry of an urban existence.

"Nothing corrupts the mind more than the pecuniary corruption in urban areas," he said.

"The healer falls more in love with money than with human lives, much along the lines of the Western-type general practitioner. He accepts cases he knows he cannot treat because he does not want to lose the money."

The Minister said healers often charged exorbitant fees because they wanted cars, were in arrears with rents and in danger of eviction.

All such practices violated the tenets of the African religion, he said. Such a practitioner was looking upon the job of traditional healing as personally his and not that of the ancestor.

The ancestor worked effectively only if his traditions were strictly adhered to. If the healer did not adhere to them the ancestor slowly receded, bringing the skills of the healer to a virtual halt.

No ancestor wanted his medium to misbehave, Dr Ushewokunze said.

No ancestor wanted his host to cheat, steal, to be unjust or unfair. How many traditional healers were observing all these rules today? the Minister asked.

Some traditional healers found urban centres a far better hunting ground for money than the rural areas, their real element.

They became nothing more than mercenaries who desecrated their time-honoured profession and tarnished the reputation of the institution of traditional healing.

Otherwise, the Minister said, the traditional healer remained an integral part of African religion.

"It is a religion which is inextricably intertwined with African culture and tradition, and there is nothing Christianity can teach that Africans did not know, apart from monogamy," he said.

Dr Ushewokunze said the traditional healer remained one of the most influential forces to reckon with in the Zimbabwe cultural fabric. To deny his importance was tantamount to denying the existence of African ancestors.

It would be equal to suggesting that God (Mwari) did not reveal himself to the African.

It was his belief, that God revealed medicines, means of cure and diagnostic skills to the African through the institution of ancestors.

He said no healer could expect success in all cases, but quite often patients who did not respond to conventional medicine had been brought back to good health by traditional healers.

For this reason, traditional healing was gaining greater understanding and the thing to do now would be to organise the profession on a more scientific basis.

What was needed was further organisation and greater freedom from dogma and the misunderstanding of spirits and supernatural craft, and an allowance to prove the value of traditional methods at the highest possible level.

"Whatever the case may be, dialogue between traditional medicine and Western-type medical practice must be initiated now," he said.

To the sceptics, Dr Ushewokunze said he had always believed that conventional doctors had a lot to learn from the traditional healers, and a lot that they might envy.

For a start, the traditional healer had the confidence, trust and faith of his client, which were vital for any treatment.

Dr Chavunduka, Dean of the Faculty of Social Studies at the University of Zimbabwe, said some ngangas had made very serious mistakes.

They had claimed to be able to cure all types of sicknesses, he said.

"That is not true," he said. "If you cannot cure an illness, send the patient to another healer, or to a hospital or clinic. You are not expected to be able to cure every illness."

Dr Chavunduka said it was wrong for a nganga to give medicines that did injury to other people. "This is not an association of witches," he said.

He condemned traditional healers who indulged in the practice of giving women love potions so that their husbands or boyfriends would love them more.

"That is a crime as far as the association is concerned," he said.

"There are other methods and ways of solving social and sexual problems."

DETAILS ON PRISON POPULATION GIVEN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] ZIMBABWE'S prison population today stood at 10 358, including 3 632 remand prisoners awaiting trial, 69 detainees and 117 people who were subject to 30-day detention orders.

This was disclosed yesterday by the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, Senator Simbi Mubako, when he was challenged about numbers of convicts and detainees during committee of supply consideration of the $18,5 million vote for his Ministry.

Senator Mubako declined to be drawn on questions about the continuation of detention without trial, saying it was a matter for the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Mr Nelson Mawema (ZANU-PF, Victoria) and Mr James Bassoppo Moyo (ZANU-PF, Victoria) both raised the question of detention and the reasons for retaining it.

Senator Mubako told Advocate Chris Andersen (RF, Mount Pleasant) that much work was continuing on the restructuring of Zimbabwe's courts and he planned to introduce shortly a Bill to provide a new framework for African customary courts, which would be known as "primary courts". He would announce details when he introduced the Bill.

Mr Mawema appealed for the so-called "kangaroo courts" which he said had performed a useful function during the war, to be given a new name and legalised.

Senator Mubako said there was no question of renaming the "kangaroo courts", although the planned new "primary courts" would have a role in administering African civil law which would be acceptable to the people and to the Government.

Mr Mawema drew attention to a newspaper report from Botswana last week in which the country's House of Chiefs appealed for convicts to be allowed sex with wives and girlfriends. The Minister declined to comment.

He assured Mr Richard Cartwright (RF, Hatfield) that white prison officers would not be discriminated against in their promotion prospects although past discrimination against blacks was being rectified and blacks were being advanced to the ranks from which they had been unjustly excluded. Promotion would be on the basis of the prison regulations and by examination.

Several MPs raised the question of past differentiation between black and white convicts, including Miss Jane Ngwenya (PF, Matabeleland North) who complained that while black women had been made to wear humiliating clothing and paraded in public, white women had worn attractive uniforms and donned perfume before going to work in "the hospital".

Mr Mubako said such discrimination had now ceased, with the issue of standard clothing, standard diet, and the introduction of uniform conditions.

Mr Mubako disclosed that President Banana had issued a further amnesty to clarify the position of offenders who committed crimes up to April 18. These were the same range of offences covered by the earlier amnesties. The Minister did not elaborate.

Mr John Nkomo (PF, Matabeleland North) asked the Minister about reports that Ministry of Justice records had been destroyed or removed to South Africa. He said that such records might have been invaluable in tracing people such as Dr Edson Sithole, who disappeared during the war.

Senator Mubako said that the question was a vague one which might have been directed to any Government Minister, but it was extremely difficult to uncover some of the things which happened during the war. He assured Mr Nkomo and Mr William Ndangana (ZANU-PF, Manicaland) who raised the same question that any evidence on missing people would be followed up very thoroughly.

Senator Mubako told Dr Swithun Mombeshora that the process of making appointments in his Ministry was still continuing and that of appointing an Ombudsman, as specified in the Constitution, had not yet been completed. "In due course we will appoint an Ombudsman," he said. "There is no set date."

Mr Farai Masango (ZANU-PF, Mash. Central) asked how many prisoners in jail now awaiting execution had received their sentences either before or after independence, but Senator Mubako said it was "accepted policy" never to reveal the number of people sentenced to death. All death sentences, however, were subject to Cabinet consideration, and no sentence was carried out without this consideration.

He told Mrs Ruth Chinamano (PF, Mat. North) that the Government was making sure that employees in the prison service were all on the same terms of employment without any discrimination, but could not enforce employees "to play tennis together" or force them to live together. What the employees did in their spare time was their own affair.

PEACE SLOWLY RETURNING TO MTOKO

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THERE were encouraging indications from senior Government representatives that peace will be restored, albeit slowly, in the Mtoko farming area, the Rhodesian Front MP for the district, Mr Andre Holland, said yesterday.

"I have had meetings with the Government at senior level about Mtoko and I am glad to say the whole picture now looks most encouraging," the MP for Mazoe/Mtoko said.

There have been reports of Mtoko farmers seriously considering leaving their farms following a spate of violent incidents linked with ZANLA forces in X-ray assembly point near Mtoko village.

Two policemen have been killed, another injured, and the village police station has twice come under smallarms fire in the past two weeks.

Mr Holland said: "Based on assurances I have been given, I believe the whole Mtoko area will start slowly to quieten down and the farmers there can now look forward to peace and quiet and the opportunity to get on with their farming.

"I must congratulate the Government for the consistent attitude they have maintained and the courtesy with which they have listened to my case. They have told me that they are dealing with the problems in the area and that they want the commercial farmers to stay on.

"I am completely satisfied they are sincere and that they have the will and ability to resolve those matters that must be resolved," he told the Herald.

The country was going through difficult times, but there were "plenty of plusses".

"One of these is the positive attitude the Government is taking to the country's problems. I am confident that we face an exciting and successful future," said Mr Holland.

● An "excellent spirit of co-operation" is developing between the ZANU (PF) central committee and farmers in the Arcturus area, the chairman of the Enterprise Farmers' Association, Mr Peter Howson, said yesterday.

Mr Howson is also chairman of a three-man committee of commercial farmers which works with ZANU (PF) in the area.

Recently, a member of the party's central committee visited farmers in the area before going with Mr Howson to the ZANU (PF) owned farms of Oasis and Grazely.

"I've told them we work as an area and our farmers have offered to help them in any way they can as regards farming," said Mr Howson.

PRESIDENT CALLS FOR NEW ROLE BY CHURCH

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THE church in Zimbabwe should "radically transform" by reforming its ranks, accommodating indigenous culture and beliefs and taking part in post-colonial reconstruction and development, President Banana said yesterday.

Opening a clergy revival conference in Salisbury, the President stressed the transformation was necessary if the church was to retain credibility and win the confidence and faith of the majority of the population.

"It should aim to become a people's church. This is the year of the people's power; all institutions, including the church, should aim to serve the broad interests of the people," he said.

In his address, President Banana criticised the "nebulous role" played by many denominations, which he did not name, during the independence struggle.

"They were not forthright against an evil system of racism and oppression. They were also paternalistic to their members and eschewed indigenous culture. Within their own structures there was discrimination in accommodation, promotions and salaries."

President Banana, a cleric himself, spoke of the people's disenchantment with church dogma, faith, and regulations, caused by "these glaring shortcomings".

Spelling out a new role for the church, he said theology should seek to arrive at a scientific analysis of the social, economic, political, and cultural situations in which churches operated.

The church should also be humble enough to accept its own shortcomings.

The President added: "African traditional religion, rather than being viewed as a threat to the Christian faith, must be understood as something that will bring richness and meaning to Christianity."

His message was one of the strongest made to church leaders in general since independence. Recently, the Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Edgar Tekere, made a tough statement directed at the Anglican Church in Zimbabwe.

President Banana felt the church, "like any other social institution", should take part actively in post-war development to help solve "acute problems" of war-displacement, dispossession, poverty, and hunger.

The church's mission should be to announce to the poor the good news of a new society that was really free, equal, and loving; a society in which power must be put at the service of the people and in which wealth was equitably shared.

"This cannot be achieved solely by waving the Bible to everyone, but through practical action. It is not enough for the church to bring bread and clothes to the hungry and naked, but also to undertake educational projects and irrigation schemes, and so help in the effort to achieve self-sufficiency and self-reliance."

ROLE OF TRIBAL CHIEFS EXAMINED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Role of Chiefs"]

[Text] THE way the tribal trust lands are to be administered is to be changed considerably. The people, through their councils, will decide what is to be done, and district commissioners will be there to give advice. In due course primary courts will be set up.

In this new order the role of the chief must change. The pace and scope of development and the attitudes of the councils and the people themselves, must affect the chiefs and influence the part they can play.

The Government sees chieftainship continuing to perform spiritual and cultural functions.

There could come a time when the chiefs become anachronisms as their counterparts have in other parts of the world. But in the meantime the Government is being wise to retain them.

Not all links with the past must be drastically cut. What is desirable must be preserved for as long as it remains desirable.

If the chiefs become father-figures free from direct involvement in politics and legal issues it will not be a bad thing.

BRIEFS

FIRST SEATS TO ZANU (PF)--ZANU (PF) candidates were returned unopposed in the recent district council elections held in Mtoko and Mudzi, northeast of Salisbury. A spokesman for the Ministry of Local Government and Housing said yesterday ZANU (PF) was not opposed by other political parties in the wards. He declined to comment further. The elections started at the end of August and are likely to continue in most districts throughout the country until the end of November. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 6 Sep 80 p 1]

SENATOR RESIGNS--Senator Dr Douglas Hamilton Ritchie has resigned from the Senate on grounds of ill-health. Announcing the resignation, Senator Ken Fleming said Dr Hamilton Ritchie had been an excellent contributor to Senate debates. As a dentist he had constantly devoted himself to the service of his fellow men of all races and was a "solid Zimbabwe citizen through and through". Senator Mark Partridge and Senator Joseph Culverwell also paid tribute to Senator Hamilton Ritchie.--LANA [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 3]

ZBC REORGANIZATION--The public should not harshly judge the performance of ZBC, but must be patient while the broadcasting services were restructured to reflect a national outlook, Mr Willie Musarurwa, vice-chairman of the ZBC board of governors, said yesterday. The Minister of Information and the ZBC board of governors and board of management "all agreed that we want a national broadcasting service, and we are directing our efforts towards this goal", he said in an interview. "We shall not brook anything that smacks of divisiveness. We want to consolidate our independence and peace, and the radio and TV services are excellent instruments to achieve this. "The broadcasting service must serve the nation and the Government, and not any sectional interests. This is one of the issues that we are tackling at the moment, and I can only hope the outcome will be to the satisfaction of everyone. But while the ZBC tackled this issue--and the problems of changing the ZBC from a colonial service into one that would serve the people, of staffing and the replacement of old equipment--the public should not harshly judge the performance of the service. NRB MEMBERSHIP--The Natural Resources Board would have to increase its black membership, Senator Msika told the House. Answering a question from Mr Stephen Nkomo (PF, Matabeleland South), he said there were three blacks on the nine-member board. The committees of the intensive conservation areas would also have to "change their constitutions" to include more blacks. Those who were there now, had done "an excellent piece of work". CABLE EXPORTS--The managing director of Rhocables, Mr Ken Taylor said yesterday that the wire and cable industry in Zimbabwe was capable of exporting any amount of cable. Speaking on Zimbabwe's cable and wire industry, Mr Taylor called for job fragmentation and modular training, which would permit the industry to develop the skills already inherient within it. Up to 1945, all the cables used in the country were imported. The harnessing of Zimbabwe's electrical potential meant cables had to be manufactured locally. The industry had come a long way since then and now produced cables for a wide variety of uses. Because of sanctions, Rhocables had to build its own machines. The cable-making process was now comparable to any in the world, Mr Taylor said. He added that the cable industry hoped to direct its exports to countries outside Africa. FARMING COLLEGE PLANNED--A new training college is planned for the Matopos, said Mr J. Walsh, an official with the Ministry of Agriculture, at the international economic conference on Zimbabwe, yesterday. Mr Walsh, who is head of the education and executive branch of the Ministry's research and specialist services, said that not only would the existing colleges be expanded, but new ones would be built. He said that if the demand was great enough, women would be admitted for the first time to study for agricultural certificates. In addition, he said a further year would be added to the university agricultural degree. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 13]

BATTALION AT KARIBA--An infantry battalion of the National Army of Zimbabwe, based in Victoria Province, is on a training exercise in the Kariba military training area. A spokesman for the Ministry of Defence said in a statement: "The training is intended to improve basic soldiering skills, to exercise junior leaders, to further the training of specialists in battalions and to practice watermanship. It will include some parachuting, all in unfamiliar areas." The spokesman added that "ever precaution" would be taken to "ensure the protection of private property and wild animals". The exercise is due to end in 10 days. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 2]

COMPANY INVESTS MILLIONS--A European company has decided to invest $20 million in Zimbabwe. This is the first tangible result of the economic resources conference being held in Salisbury, the conference co-ordinator, Dr Syd Kelly, said yesterday. Dr Kelly did not identify the company saying the plans involved needed the approval of the Government and the company's head office. Mr C. G. Tracey, chairman of the Zimbabwe Promotion Council which is holding the conference said no other firm investment decisions or industrial projects were expected at the moment. "Results of this conference are similar to a pregnancy, which we hope started this week. The results will only be born in several months' time." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1]

MOTOR PLANT PRODUCTION--Production at the Willowvale Motor Industries assembly plant has improved. It is now 80 percent of the 1974 target, says the production manager, Mr David Gibson. "We are slowly going back to our normal production capacity of 34 units a day as was the case in 1974. In spite of the world energy crisis and inflation, we are catching up." Mr Gibson says the company has an ambitious expansion programme to provide more job opportunities. The plant assembles Peugeots, Renaults, Mazdas, Alfa Romeos and Volkswagens. "We have a capacity to assemble up to six models at a time but we prefer a limited number in order to stabilise prices," said Mr Gibson. The plant has been hit by shortage of skilled manpower and lack of foreign exchange, with tool-making the worst affected section. A training programme has been started to overcome the problem. Many blacks were gradually moving into more responsible jobs, said Mr Gibson. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 1]

AID FOR FARMERS--The country's four commercial banks have agreed to lend £7 million to small farmers, a spokesman for the group said yesterday. The money will be administered by the Agricultural Finances Corporation which will process loan applications. The banks are Barclays, Grindlays, Rhobank and Standard. The contribution will help the AFC implement the $143 million Whitsun Foundation plan for helping small-scale farmers throughout the country. According to the AFC, more than 70 000 small farmers including those in the TTLs, will benefit from the scheme. The decision by the four banks had been taken after negotiations with the AFC and each has contributed equally. Applications must be made to the AFC and not to the banks. STEEL OUTLETS SOUGHT--The chairman of Stewart and Lloyds, Mr P. Munton Jackson, said yesterday that Zimbabwe's steel industry would be looking to countries outside Africa for export orders as most Third World countries did not have the capital to import Zimbabwean steel products. He was speaking at the manufacturing seminar of the international economics conference being held at the University of Zimbabwe. His subject was steel manufacturing in Zimbabwe. Mr Munton Jackson appealed to the many foreign delegates attending the seminar to open their doors to Zimbabwean steel products. Outlining the characteristics of the industry in this country, he said virtually all the steel in Zimbabwe was produced by Risco. At present Zimbabwe produced a wide range of steel products from kitchen utensils to railway wagons. Among the problems experienced by the industry were the demand for skilled labour and the need for capital. Because of sanctions, the machinery used by the industry was not up to date although the standard of goods produced was high. Mr Munton Jackson called on companies within the industry to improve training facilities for their employees in order to make Zimbabwe less dependent on skilled artisans from overseas. In conclusion, Mr Munton Jackson said the industry needed two things--selective capital investment, and help in opening up external markets. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 4 Sep 80 p 13]

TOBACCO MARKET STEADIES--The price of tobacco is no longer falling, Mr Bert Palmer, president of the Zimbabwe Tobacco Association, said yesterday. He said: "We have stopped the rot at the market place". The Government's intervention scheme, guaranteeing up to $20 million to buy up stocks, was one factor in stabilising prices of certain over-supplied grades. The lower prices had also made some tobacco more competitive. Qualities of tobacco reaching the floors in past weeks have also improved and prices were averaging around 82c/kg last week. Mr Palmer said despite the drought in the past two seasons, the tobacco farmers remained optimistic for the future. Many were now committed to planting for the new season. Mr Palmer predicted that local tobacco would regain its former position in Europe in the next two years. There was now a 30 percent swing out of tobacco to other crops. To regulate tobacco supplies, a 36 percent reduction in production on the basic marketing quota will be in force in the coming season. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 7 Sep 80 p 12]

POLICE SPECIALS INVITED TO QUIT--Members of Salisbury Province Police Special Reserve are receiving circulars inviting them to resign and return their kit and equipment to their headquarters. The republication of the Emergency Powers regulations on July 25 stated that men over the age of 50 were no longer required to do emergency national service. Men, previously required to remain on strength until they turned 60, could resign. The senior staff officer of Salisbury Police Reserve Headquarters, Assistant Commissioner Brian Nightingale, said yesterday that it was hoped men over 50 would decide to remain in the service. He thanked the men in the age-group for their assistance to the police. Chief Superintendent Courtney Walton of the Police Reserve training depot in Salisbury, said he expected "quite few" resignations from men in the Special Reserve because they were conscripts. Assistant Commissioner Nightingale said there was no plan to call up reservists to help combat crime in Salisbury as was the case in Bulawayo. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 3 Sep 80 p 1]

ANGOLAN, CAPE VERDIAN CITIZEN'S STATUTE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 29 Jul 80 pp 1, 11

[Excerpt] A decree approved by the Council of Ministers and published in the Journal of the Republic announces the ratification of the agreement concerning the statute on persons and goods between the People's Republic of Angola and the Republic of Cape Verde, pursuant to the goals established in connection with the bonds of friendship and cooperation, and aimed at the intensification of the fraternal relations that exist between the two peoples.

This agreement, which applies to citizens who are nationals of the People's Republic of Angola residing in the territory of the Republic of Cape Verde and to those from the latter fraternal nation in Angola, stipulates, in addition to other matters, that "citizens residing in the nation of one of the contracting parties shall enjoy, under the same conditions and without restrictions different from those imposed on the citizens who are nationals of the other country," the civil rights of a personal nature, and pertaining to work in state agencies, state enterprises, private entities and other types, as well as those pertaining to the exercise of social, cultural, economic or professional activities.

KR STOPS HAULING UGANDAN COFFEE, NEW TRANSPORT PLANS NOTED

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 6 Sep 80 pp 1, 17

[Text]

KENYA Railways have stopped hauling Uganda coffee.

The stoppage took effect on Thursday and was confirmed by the railway headquarters in Nairobi yesterday.

"It is true we have stopped carrying the Uganda coffee," a senior railways official told the NATION.

The reasons for the decision could not be obtained from the spokesman. But it was learned that the railways did not have enough police security to continue carrying the commodity through Kenya to Mombasa port.

Kenya Railways used to send wagons from Nairobi to be loaded with coffee in Uganda. But no wagons have been sent since Thursday when the decision was taken.

The railways used to haul between 700 and 800 tons of coffee from Uganda every week. Police escort was provided to ensure it reached Mombasa as incidents of theft of the commodity had increased.

A source in Uganda Coffee Board, speaking from Kampala, told the NATION yesterday the stoppage was only temporary.

The spokesman said the board understood that the Kenya Government was investigating about 50 cases of lorries caught while in transit from Uganda to Mombasa loaded with tons of allegedly smuggled coffee.

Kenya Railways police were holding five wagons loaded with smuggled coffee and three others with smuggled tea.

Kenatco has also been hauling Uganda coffee. Its general manager, Mr. Yuda Komora, said police were no longer escorting their coffee from Uganda. Kenatco was now hiring a private security firm to do it, he said.

Coffee transported through Malaba and Busia towns on the Kenya/Uganda border comes from Uganda, Zaire, and Rwanda.

Reports from Kampala said yesterday that four wagon ships were being built at Port Bell to ease the problem of coffee transportation from Uganda.

Each of the four ships will be 100 metres long and have four lines to accommodate wagons loaded with coffee to be shipped to Mwanza port and off-loaded and put on the railway line for Dar or Tanga.

The ships are expected to be ready in two years. They will take a minimum of 10 hours to cruise from Port Bell to Mwanza.

The Uganda Government, sources said, was also improving the 84-mile Masaka/Kampala road to facilitate transportation of coffee from southern Uganda.

The project is being undertaken by the United Nations. There is also a road project linking Kapchorwa and Mbale in eastern Uganda. The 50-mile road will be upgraded to tarmac standards.

BRIEFS

SEYCHELLES BAN ON SA FLIGHTS--(SAPA-REUTER)--A spokesman for South African Airways said yesterday the airline was aware that the government of the Seychelles was going to ban all South African aircraft from its airspace and had made arrangements with the authorities on Mauritius to land there. He said in Johannesburg that yesterday's SAA flight to Hong Kong would be the first to use the new route via Mauritius. The spokesman said the use of Mauritius instead of the Seychelles actually suited SAA better and shortened the route to Hong Kong. The socialist government which took power in the Seychelles 3 years ago said links with SA would be severed as soon as possible. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Sep 80 p 2]

SENGHOR ON UN FORCE--Upon leaving the Elysee yesterday, President Leopold Sedar Senghor said he thought it should be possible to put together a UN force next month to make sure that Chad respects the cease-fire. President Senghor, who was a luncheon guest of Valery Giscard d'Estaing, French head of state, went on to say, "We are asking that this force be made up of contingents from African countries. Senegal," he indicated, "has already advised that it is prepared to send Chad its battalion currently in South Lebanon." The Senegalese head of state disclosed that he had raised the Chadian question with the president of the French republic. "The meeting," he added, "also dealt with the Western Sahara, the status of the Sudan-Sahel countries and that of the Community of West African Countries." President Senghor also thanked Giscard d'Estaing for the aid France furnished our country faced with the difficulties inherent in the international situation. LARA STRESSES NEED TO COMBAT 'LAISSEZ-FAIRE' ATTITUDE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 23 Jul 80 p 2

[Text] Luena--The need to seriously combat bureaucracy and the spirit of "laissez-faire" and the necessity for Angolan cadres to participate in an active and revolutionary manner in increasing their knowledge were matters discussed by comrade Lucio Lara, member of the Party Political Bureau and secretary of DORGAN [Organization Department], during the closing session of the Third Provincial Seminar on Medical Sciences, held recently at the Technical Health School at this city's hospital.

The leader also expressed delight at the fact that Cuban internationalists had scheduled the seminar, which, as he said, "will prevent, in various ways, infant mortality among our children."

During his speech, the Central Committee secretary for organization also mentioned matters related to sanitation policy in our country.

On the 20th, accompanied by comrade Marques Bassovava, coordinator of the party Provincial Committee, as well as by the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee and other provincial leaders, comrade Lucio Lara visited the townships of Leua and Lumege-Cameia, where he presided over two clarification meetings.

At those meetings, the leader emphasized the need for greater organization around the party and the objectives recommended by the late President Agostinho Neto. Discussing questions of defense, Lucio Lara urged the inhabitants to join the ODP [People's Defense Organization] and to increase production in the fields.

It should be recalled that comrade Lucio Lara has been in Moxico Province since Sunday at the head of a party and government delegation.

APPEAL TO INCREASE PRODUCTION, MILITARY SERVICES ISSUED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Jul 80 p 1

[Article by Gustavo Costa: "Increase Production and Restore Country's South"]

[Text] Once again Pretoria was forced to bite the dust of our fatherland!

Once again, Angola frustrated the unreliable imperialist computers and the arrogance of the shameful lackeys in a cloud of dust as a result of the bitter taste left by the humiliating defeat imposed by the glorious FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola]!

The situation in the country's south has now been normalized. Now, new tasks mobilize the energies of the Angolan nation which is called upon to redouble its efforts to the maximum degree with a view to rendering the greatest possible assistance to regions previously occupied by the invaders from Pretoria.

This means, on the one hand, completely restoring peace in the country's south and providing major assistance to the people living in that area in order to help them get down to work.

This action calls for the mobilization and participation of the workers in the cities and the rural areas to step up the output so as to guarantee the supply of industrial and agricultural commodities in which we have shortages right now in the southern part of Angola that was hit by the invasion.

For this reason, the party members are called upon to fight against absenteeism and lack of discipline, alerting the workers in all sectors to produce the material resources which will also make it possible to give the FAPLA better social conditions in the accomplishment of their patriotic duty.

This furthermore means, in this context, channeling considerable material assets, capable of rapidly guaranteeing the reconstruction of economic, social, and military installations destroyed by the hordes from Pretoria through the massive cooperation of the local population and all national agencies.

On the other, in view of the threat of permanent war from the racist and fascist aggressors in South Africa, the country feels obligated to make an even greater effort to assure the boost in its defensive capacity.

In view of the seriousness of this danger, our armed forces will in effect be called upon to equip themselves with ever more effective military means of defense and security against the attacks of the domestic and foreign enemy.

In accomplishing this task, the young people, mobilized to put in their mandatory military service and to do their sacred duty in the defense of the fatherland will be called upon to participate ever more actively and consciously.

What we must do now is to erect a strong and unbreachable wall in the defense of our territorial integrity and in the maintenance of security in our border areas with a view to guaranteeing tranquility, order, and peace so necessary for the commitment of the entire people in the construction of a new life.

The creation of this atmosphere is not only conditioned by the consequence of independence by our brother people of Namibia but also demands a grandiose effort of cadre training so that the youth of the nation will be called upon to make its contribution through military service as a patriotic duty cultivating new habits and customs and forging a collective awareness of life.

As for the rest, this attitude is demanded even more when it is realized that this new military defeat will only trigger a desperate outburst of anger in the abominable regime of apartheid which will remain and revise its aggressiveness and arrogance liable to produce new acts of aggression and invasion against the RPA [People's Republic of Angola].

In attacking Angola, the imperialists are still forgetting the elementary truth of history to the effect that wars are decided by the coherence and justice of the objectives which they are aimed at concerning each of the belligerent sides--and not by machines.

This is why the racists of Pretoria, caught in the agony of defeat which is drawing near in Namibia and which, sooner or later, will also take place in South Africa, will always be doomed to failure.

The defeat of the military clique leaders of apartheid is based on the following factors;

1. They support an unjust cause; 2. they fall back on the militarist and orgiastic law of ignominy and genocide; 3. they underestimate the strength of our people; 4. they represent a regime based on racial discrimination and on "apartheid" which is the target of universal condemnation.

Victory on the other hand is tilting increasingly in our favor because of the decisive factors which we have on our side objectively speaking and which can be summarized in the following manner:

The combat which we are unleashing pursues just objectives; it has an army which, although young, is fully aware of its role, imbued with a high fighting spirit and profound love of the people, capable of making the greatest sacrifices for the defense of the fatherland; it has the united support of the people, organized in one vast mass, in the ODP [People's Defense Organization] whose example of total help of the entire nation to the cause of the brother people of Namibia enables it to win the respect of friends and even enemies and the sympathy and solidarity of the entire world.

This is why the military clique leaders of Pretoria are doomed always to eat the dust of our country, shamed by the humiliation of inevitable defeat!

REPORTAGE ON NAVY'S ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Jul 80 p 3

[Excerpts] The MGPA (People's Navy of Angola) yesterday marked its 4th anniversary. The main part of the ceremonies connected with this significant event took place on the parade grounds at the Luanda naval base and was presided over by Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao (Gato), commander of the FAPA/DAA [Angolan People's Air Force-Air Defense] and was attended furthermore by the commander of the MGPA, Comrade Manuel Augusto Alfredo (Orlog), as well as high party and government officials and invited guests.

The past 4 years of existence of the MGPA consisted of another step in the consolidation and strengthening of a vast system of defense capable of politically and militarily responding to the gains of our revolution to the benefit of the most exploited classes of our people and consequently all their wealth situated up to the limit of our territorial waters.

The simple but significant ceremony in honor of the 4th anniversary of the MGPA began when the commanders of the Navy and the FAPA/DAA embarked in the torpedo boat [launch] "Eurico Goncalves" which rapidly sailed several miles away from the coast. Out at sea were various MGPA vessels and boats on which young naval officers, petty officers, and sailors were conducting maneuvers; in unison, they cheered the MGPA. The naval maneuvers, which lasted a certain period of time, were enthusiastically applauded by everybody who was able to observe them from far away or close by.

Upon returning to base and on the main parade ground, outstanding leaders of the MPLA-Labor Party and government were on the reviewing stands. Among them we might mention comrades Ambrozio Lukoki and Ludi Kissassunda, of the Political Bureau; Paulo Jorge, of the Central Committee, Minister of Foreign Relations; Faustino Muteka, Coelho da Cruz, and Emilio Guerra, respectively, ministers of transportation and communication, of health, and of fishing.

As the official pointed out very clearly, the role to be played by the MGPA will be properly accomplished only if it is in a permanent state of combat readiness. This readiness is in fact a necessary requirement so that the navy may under any circumstances repulse the enemy's operations. It must do that with its own forces, on its own, and in combined operations with other services.

"In the area of combat readiness," the navy commander added, "the MGPA continued with the construction, perfection, training, and implementation of command echelons as well as major and minor units. The MGPA complied with the combat and political training plan to the extent of 70 percent and concentrated on increasing this figure." Lt Col Orlog also said that a vast personnel training process is now underway to accomplish specific tasks in an independent fashion and under simple conditions. Personnel have already begun to assimilate the elements of navigation and engineering.

Summarizing the activities carried out by that particular service, Lt Col Orlog noted that the MGPA, during the past year, transported a total of 1,457.5 tons of cargo and 1,392 passengers.

In reviewing the political work done, he made it clear that, as of the end of the first half of the year and throughout the second half, the work of the MGPA Political Directorate essentially involved officer, petty officer, and sailor training. This work was also aimed at raising revolutionary consciousness, as well as the spirit of discipline and the sense of responsibility.

After stressing the successes achieved, the MGPA commander did not overlook the minor failures and little mistakes which meant that the success was not complete. This critical and self-critical attitude was very frank when he emphasized, for example, that the low level of combat readiness achieved at the end of the year did not permit the total accomplishment of guidelines issued by higher headquarters. For example, regarding the political classroom sessions, he reported that they were handled in accordance with directives from the commander-in-chief, Comrade President Jose Eduardo dos Santos. This was done through systematic study groups in the minor units consisting of a total 36 fighting men, officers, petty officers, and enlisted men. The classroom lectures given added up to a total of 16 hours per month for the last two categories and 8 hours for the officers.

Concerning specialist training for that particular service, Lt Col Orlog revealed that the Specialist Training Center during the past year turned out 101 technicians in various special fields, such as gunners, radio direction finder operators, electricians, electrical navigation equipment operators, navigators, drivers, helmsmen, signalmen, and radar operators.

FAPA/DAA Commander Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao (Gato), in his capacity as honored guest, stressed the big and little successes which the MGPA achieved day after day.

In talking about the mission of the navy in territorial waters, the FAPA/DAA commander said:

"As all you comrades know, our territorial waters are immensely rich. This is why they have been subjected to heavy plunder by forces interested in stealing our wealth. And rather impressively we have news from fishing vessels which fish without any authorization in our territorial waters, sometimes completely exhausting the fishing resources."

"The increase in discipline," he continued, "for the purpose of improving our combat readiness and capabilities is urgent so that we prevent new aggressions which may arise."

FOREIGN TRADE UNIONS' SOLIDARITY EXPRESSED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The recent South African invasion of Angola earned the forceful repudiation of international public opinion. Messages express the support given by the multinational capitalist monopolies, the military, economic, and financial complicity and support of the imperialist powers to the hangmen of Pretoria who, on the soil of our homeland, destroy villages, rural and industrial targets, kill women, children, and old people, and engage in all kinds of crime. In the messages we are getting from organizations and labor unions, everybody is unanimous in solidarity with the just cause of the SWAPO and the ANC which are fighting for the establishment of justice and liberty in their respective countries.

Among the messages that reached us we might mention those from the World Federation of Trade Unions, the World Peace Council, the Council of Soviet Labor Unions, the Confederation of French Workers, the International Confederation of Arab Labor Unions, the International Union of Labor Unions in the Chemical, Petroleum, and Related Industries, and the French Democratic Confederation of Labor.

On the other hand, the URAP (Union of Portuguese Antifascist Resistance Fighters) addressed a protest message to the South African government through its ambassador in the Portuguese capital against the criminal attack perpetrated by the South African racists against Angola, causing more than 200 victims. In its message, URAP board of directors indicated that the Portuguese antifascist resistance fighters express their strongest conviction that such attacks will not achieve anything against the firm opposition of the Angolan people and that they will bring well-deserved punishment for those responsible in the future.

MILITARY OFFICERS' TRAINING COURSE OPENS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Jul 80 pp 1, 10

[Article by H. M.: "Fourth Armed Forces Officer Training Course Starts"]

[Excerpts] Huambo--The fourth senior officer training course of the FAPLA (People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola) began in this city on Wednesday in a ceremony presided over by Lt Col Andre Pitra (Petroff), alternate member, Central Committee, MPLA-Labor Party, party committee coordinator and provincial commissioner for Huambo.

The purpose of the course is to train senior officers for the army; trainees will also receive advanced training and broad knowledge in the broad areas of organization in order to strengthen the armed forces in technical terms.

The ceremony was also attended by Maj Evaristo Domingos (Kimba), Political Bureau, party Central Committee, and course director; Lt Col Miguel Luis (Ivady); Cmdr Ernesto dos Santos (Liberdade); and Maj Manuel Francisco Tuta (Batalha de Angola); all of the above are members of the Central Committee, MPLA-Labor Party; the ceremony was further attended by members of the party committee and some FAPLA officers.

In addressing the gathering as course director, Major Kimba underscored the important qualitative advances achieved by the glorious FAPLA since their proclamation on 1 August 1974 in terms of organization, discipline consolidation, increasing the political-fighting capacity, and primarily in the defense of the country's territorial integrity and the gains already achieved.

Later, this leader added that these qualitative advances and transformations are due to the fact that military cadres were trained who are capable of guaranteeing the functioning of our structures since, as he emphasized, these are the factors which explain our participation in this course.

In conclusion he urged all officers and students to comply with the rules of discipline, punctuality, and determination in their studies since these are the indispensable conditions for good course organization and utilization.

He also emphasized the recent cooperation maintained by Angola with the Soviet Union in all fields and the efforts made to raise the level of organization and technical efficiency of our defense forces.

On this occasion, one of the two internationalist professors in the name of his colleagues underscored the important role of the armed forces in the defense of the gains of the revolution and noted that they are in Angola to help train cadres for our FAPLA.

Later he stressed the fact that study is difficult but the courage and heroism demonstrated by the participants during the first and second wars of national liberation will be decisive factors in achieving good results.

MILITARY SCHOOL CELEBRATES FOURTH ANNIVERSARY

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 9 Jul 80 p 2

[Text] "Today we must resume new initiatives, we must again undertake new commitments and redouble our efforts to continue to defend our native soil which is being constantly attacked by imperialism and the South African racists," Joao Felizardo, deputy coordinator of the provincial party committee, said yesterday in Huambo during the ceremony marking the 4th anniversary of the "Nicolau Gomes Spencer" Officer Training School.

Joao Felizardo praised the progress made so far because many of the officers trained at this school applied their knowledge on various fighting fronts. The party leader said that it was necessary to have an army that was technically, politically, and ideologically trained, "for the sake of the assimilation of the indispensable material which guarantees the triumph of the revolution and the wellbeing of the people."

Capt Angonia Alves, school commandant, briefly reviewed the institution's history since its establishment and described the difficulties of the past as well as the successes achieved over 4 years of existence. Since its inception the Officer Training School has already turned out more than 2,000 military cadres.

In a message read on the occasion, the Soviet internationalists, who are providing cooperation at that school, expressed "their warm support for and happiness over" the passage of the 4th anniversary since the school's founding.

The ceremony was attended by members of mass organizations, the government, the faculty at that military institution, and Soviet advisors. (ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY]).

TROOP SERVICE BATTALION ENSURES MILITARY DISCIPLINE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 9 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] On the occasion of the 3rd anniversary of the establishment of the Unit Support Service Battalion, General Staff, FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola], Lt Col Ciel da Conceicao (Gato) addressed a congratulatory message to that military detachment.

"The Unit Support Services," the message says, "have the mission of maintaining order and discipline within the Armed Forces of the RPA because military discipline constitutes the fundamental premise for the accomplishment of our missions, thus defending the honor and dignity of our army."

After some comments on the assignments which the Unit Support Services must carry out in order to increase the combat readiness of FAPLA fighting men against racist invasions, the commander of the FAPA/DAA urged the fighting men of that military detachment to turn this 3rd anniversary into a day of struggle aimed at stepping up the fight against racist South Africa and against imperialism and its lackeys.

Anniversary Commemoration

The 3rd anniversary of the organization of the Unit Support Service Battalion, General Staff, FAPLA, which was marked yesterday throughout the country, was celebrated in a worthy manner in the city of Luanda with a political event presided over by Lt Col Tiago Martins, detachment commander.

In closing the ceremony, Lt Tony Carvalho, chief, political directorate, Unit Support Services, commented on the operations of that particular branch of the armed forces and urged the military personnel present to turn this 3rd anniversary into a fighting day against lack of discipline and disorganization and to enhance their combat readiness so as to guarantee the gains already achieved by the Angolan people.

LARA BLAMES U.S., EUROPEAN IMPERIALISM FOR AGGRESSION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 10 Jul 80 pp 1, 10

[Article by H. M.: "The Racists Have Learned the Lessons of History--Lucio Lara in Saurimo"]

> [Excerpts] After the second meeting of party cell coordinators in the city of Saurimo, Comrade Lucio Lara, Political Bureau, MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee, and Central Committee Secretary for DORGAN (Organization Department], presided over a significant information meeting.

Comrade Lucio Lara began by saying that the presence of the party delegation in that province, to attend the meeting, was designed to strengthen the party during this phase of its construction.

"If the party is a big house, we are still in the process of laying the foundations, of putting down the first bricks," he emphasized.

Talking about the absence of the representatives from the province of Cunene, the leader said that this is due to the recent expulsion, by our glorious FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola], of the South African invaders from that piece of our national territory.

Later he noted that both the racists and the imperialists have not yet learned the lessons of history since, as he stressed, the invaders and the murderers who steal the wealth of the peoples are always defeated.

Paraphrasing the Immortal Guide of the Angolan Revolution, the Late Lamented Comrade President Dr Agostinho Neto, to the effect that we must not weep over our dead, the DORGAN secretary said that we should not weep for those dead who fell for the liberation of the peoples. "We know that it is necessary to make sacrifices. We Angolans ourselves our the past 14 years fought the first war and for more than 2 years we have been fighting the second war against all of the imperialist forces headed by its big power, the United States of America."

Our people emerged victorious from that war because it knew how to get support from other internationalist peoples.

"Together with our Cuban comrades, aided by the socialist countries and especially by the Soviet Union, we managed to defeat the big imperialist coalition against Angola. We defeated them implacably and we had peace and quiet for some time. But the truth is that the world right now is experiencing great tension. Once again American and European imperialism are launching provocations. They want to continue to support South Africa against Angola; they want to prepare for new wars since they are afraid of a large-scale war."

As for national reconstruction, Comrade Lucio Lara emphasized that the directive to solve the people's problem is difficult to carry out under current condition because "solving them in peacetime is one thing and solving them in wartime is something else again."

He mentioned the specific example of the province of Kuando Kubango, where we lost more than 400 trucks, destined for the various vital sectors of the national economy, during wartime operations.

"Those trucks could not do the job for which they were imported because they could not be used in distributing essential commodities in our country's various provinces.

"But we must know how to overcome our difficulties by ourselves and this is why we must strengthen the party."

The leader then urged those present to fall in step with the party's activities in an organized manner in order immediately to resolve the people's problems.

Concerning the organization of our army, Comrade Lucio Lara stated that it is very difficult to do that after guerrilla warfare. Since it is made up of young people, Comrade Lucio Lara emphasized that the role of youth is to mobilize all young persons to join the FAPLA because the army is the guarantee for our liberty, independence, and happiness.

U.S. ACCUSED OF INTIMIDATION CAMPAIGN

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 9 Jul 80 pp 1, 10

[Article by J. M.: "American Intimidation of Our Country!"]

[Text] At the summit meeting of international imperialism, the United States of America adopted new forms of psychological intimidation campaign against the People's Republic of Angola. This campaign, whose nature expresses the spirit of barbarism of men who say they are "civilized" and the great advocates of "human rights" springs from the defeats which the United States suffered in the Middle East, Latin America, and Africa.

But above all, the cynical aberrations of the American oligarchy spring from the agony of the anachronistic system of imperialism whose breakup beckons very shortly due to the countless and powerful mortal blows which the struggle of the still oppressed peoples has been inflicting upon it, especially in recent times.

There can be no peace where there is injustice and the peoples who love peace are fighting for it without worrying about the price they must pay in human lives.

Lamentably, the Americans have already forgotten the sad history of their country over the past 20 years, from the defeat in the Bay of Pigs (Cuba), until the collapse of Salazar's fascism (Portugal), including the historical lesson of Vietnam and more recently, Iran, etc.

The United States of America wants to attempt new adventures against Angola in a direct form. Reports out of Washington say that the United States Senate gave President Carter the possibility of providing direct aid for the forces hostile to the instituted government of the RPA [People's Republic of Angola] through the camouflaged actions of the CIA. This decision is aimed at lifting the ban introduced by the United States Congress in 1976 which barred the State Department from encouraging military actions abroad, especially in Angola.

The cynical decision by the United States Senate was received with great impact among reactionary circles in a certain press in Lisbon, Paris, etc., and is designed to amend the bill concerning American foreign aid for the year 1981.

The radio and television company CBS revealed [illegible words in photostat] the White House undertook new measures to boost the camouflaged operations of the CIA and the employment of new secret services for "subversive operations" with a view to the destabilization of progressive countries. On 3 July, the journal CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR revealed that the White House is getting ready openly to intervene in Angola, side by side with the racists of South America.

The United States of America understands that the current development of the situation in southern Africa brought out the inevitability of the decadence of the South African regime, on the one hand, and the end of the occupation of Namibia, by South Africa, which is approaching, on the other hand.

With the removal of South African influence along the borders of the RPA, the United States wants to invent pseudo-Angolan forces which claim to be fighting by all means against the "communist threat" in Africa. This is why we are presently witnessing a process of creating political puppet formations in Namibia which in the future can guarantee Western interests in that country.

Parallel to this process, the United States government advised South Africa to establish a government of the Muzorewa type in Namibia whose presence would facilitate not only the projection, on the domestic level, of false leaders prior to the holding of free elections under UN supervision with a view to the territory's independence, but which would also permit the Pretoria regime to gain time.

The invasion of the southern part of Angola by Pretoria, carried out under the heading of "right of hot pursuit" of SWAPO guerrilla fighters is also a part of the South African plan concerning the process of power transfer in Namibia, above and beyond the objectives of destabilizing domestic security in the RPA. But the American intimidation propaganda campaign aimed at Angola also has other objectives which however are closely tied to the plan for the lackeys in Namibia.

The first objective of this campaign is to create a spirit of instability among the Angolan population in the face of the latent threat of a presumed imminent American intervention in Angola if the RPA government should stubbornly insist on its decision.

The United States of America wants to have Angola gravitate into its sphere of influence. Since this undertaking failed in 1975, with the defeat of the foreign and mercenary armies, a systematic campaign against Angola could create a certain psychosis among the majority of the Angolan population during this phase in which the country is facing the inevitable difficulties deriving from the creation of a new society which would facilitate enemy infiltration and permeable subversion and which could endanger the country's political stability, thus undermining national unity.

This is why the Western press specially emphasized the decision by the United States relative to the ability of the White House to encourage subversive actions against progressive governments in Africa, especially the RPA. This is why France and England continue to give shelter to the puppets, granting aid in many ways and becoming the sponsors of the digressions of "Mr Black Rooster."

It might perhaps not be improper to remind those governments that the people of Angola opted for a political system which is the only capable of saving the country from underdevelopment in which it finds itself submerged, as the inheritance of the anachronistic capitalist system which prevailed in Angola for about 5 centuries through Portuguese colonial-fascism. Let some of the "colleagues" of the press in Lisbon or Paris know that the Angolan people will not feel intimidated through their aberrations by the announced direct intervention of Washington in Angola's internal affairs. Besides, there is nothing that could surprise the Angolan people any longer since we know that Portuguese newspapers, especially DIARIO DE NOTICIAS (government organ) and TARDE devoted much space on their front pages to Carter's intimidation campaign against Angola at the precise moment when the regular South African army of the illegitimate government of Pretoria occupied a part of the territory of the RPA. Or was that just a coincidence?

The truth is that the South African invasion, shamefully repulsed by the glorious FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola], was not in any way disconnected from American blackmail. This is a vast imperialist plan which is aimed at attaining the old objectives: destabilizing the RPA, preventing the harmonious development of our economy; slowing down Namibia's rise to independence.

Even if the United States threatens to intervene in the internal affairs of the RPA, the Angolan people is determined to build socialism and not to have to account to anybody for anything. It has no time therefore to pay any attention to the aberrations of imperialism.

DOUBTS EXPRESSED ON MONDALE'S AFRICAN VISIT GOALS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 24 Jul 80 p 12

[APN commentary: "Mondale 'Teaches' Democracy in Africa"]

[Text] U.S. Vice President Walter Mondale is in Africa for the purpose--according to the UPI--of demonstrating the U.S. Administration's devotion to "democracy in Africa" and a "greater respect for human rights."

When a country in whose hands we are used to seeing the tomahawk more often than the peace pipe sends to a certain country not, as usual, one more squadron of planes loaded with nuclear weapons and missiles and ships carrying marines, but official representatives who want to explain or "demonstrate" something, things do not look bad to begin with.

The truth is, however, that such trips, like military ventures, are not always successful. In the recent past, for example, when President Carter personally sent the well-known boxer Mohammed Ali to try to persuade the African countries not to participate in the Olympic Games in Moscow, he did not find the understanding he sought in Africa. They courteously but firmly gave him to understand that he should not interfere or stick his nose in where he was not wanted. And other "influential" Americans of higher standing have returned home from Africa in recent years with more or less the same results.

All of this has been said because it is relevant, not because it is meant as a hint to Walter Mondale, as though "we were wishing him the same result." We must suppose that Mondale is in a position to come to grips with the problems of democracy and human rights and, at the same time, to respond to a question of great interest to Africans: what new "contribution" toward the solution of those problems in Africa does the U.S. Government itself intend to make?--beyond, of course, its usual support for the South African racists and its subversive activity against the progressive states. Or is it perhaps ready to revise its consistently negative attitude toward independent Africa's appeals to halt the hostile policy it applies to them?

For the time being, we do not see anything to give us hope in that direction. On the contrary, American ruling circles are openly demonstrating their fidelity to the previous line. As if in opposition to the resolutions passed at the recent OAU summit meeting, the United States is going ahead full speed in expanding its military bases in African territory, in particular the one located at Diego Garcia in the Indian Ocean. The U.S. Congress, which, in the words of Nigeria's DAILY NATION, has never yet declared itself in support of Africa, has given the President and the espionage department--the CIA--full freedom to interfere in the internal affairs of the African states.

Meanwhile, they are continuing to express to South Africa their approval of its current regime of apartheid and racism. At the same time that the leaders of the African countries, meeting in Freetown, were approving one more appeal to all countries of the world to strengthen their sanctions against that regime, two highly placed representatives of Washington were arriving in the Republic of South Africa.

WEST ACCUSED OF ATTEMPTING TO PRESERVE OWN INTERESTS

[Editorial]

[Excerpts] These last few days there has been a great deal of talk about Africa in the conference rooms of Western European military-political organizations, especially about what is now going on in the southern section. Is it not because they are worried about the state of war fomented by the Pretoria government, encouraged in turn by Western military technology to unleash a violent attack against the free and independent territory of the People's Republic of Angola, in flagrant defiance of the international community?

Absolutely no! From the European councils to the conference room of the European parliament, from the Parliamentary Assembly to the Western European Union (an extension of NATO), Western powers, by means of the most astute techniques, are attempting to preserve their own enormous financial interests located on this continent.

It stands to reason that the formation of a people's democratic government in Angola did not please the imperialists, or for that matter the racists. It could not be otherwise. That being so, they are now trying by every possible means to thwart the Angolan people's revolutionary choice.

In these circumstances, Pretoria, in desperation, with unbridled fury, launched criminal attacks which have caused the loss of human lives and the ruin of important economic objectives, in order to undermine our country's stability.

It is sheer delusion to think that the great capitalist powers, as pleased as they are with the exploratory advantages they have enjoyed in Namibia and in South Africa, will change their position regarding the Pretoria government's hostile activities.

How can they reprove a government which returns incredible profits on its investments estimated at around $23 million in favor of one lone country? Why not remain silent in presence of attacks by a militaristic caste which makes possible the collection of some 4 million pounds sterling and in which among the most outstanding leaders in one of its exploitive enterprises there was one of the present Western ministers?

How fail to encourage the belligerent zeal of virtual serfs when it is they who supply the nuclear centers with uranium and other strategic minerals needed to build up the military industry of one of the principal Western powers of proven neocolonialist bent in the African continent?

Would it still be possible for capitalist powers to disclaim the tremendous profits of such multinationals as Ford, General Motors, General Company [as published], etc? Of course not!

Only if after setting out on a militaristic course in a futile effort to salvage their business enterprises, the Western computers misfired! And they misfired because they blindly staked their success on the power of arms and on the judgment of military men coming from bourgeois military schools, totally oblivious of human values and the invincibility of the people's righteous and radical movements.

CHILDREN TO VACATION IN USSR, GDR

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 12 July 80 p 3

[Excerpts] Representatives of the OPA [Agostinho Neto Pioneers Organization] have returned home from the Artek Camp in the USSR.

According to accounts received, the camping experience was very successful and all the Pioneers from each of the delegations were closely united in a spirit of solidarity.

Our Pioneers participated in sports as well as in cultural and recreational activities.

Angola Pioneers in the GDR

Angolan Pioneers, an OPA delegation, left 9 July for the German Democratic Republic for vacation at the Wilhelm Pieck Camp. This camp is in its 23d summer season. Comrade Maria Leopoldina Quental, a member of the JMPLA [Youth Movement of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola] is leading the delegation.

The Pioneers' activities in this camp will be largely cultural experiences and children's discussion sessions on the topic "We Accuse Imperialism." The international olympic games will be held and the fifth anniversary of SLOT (World Meeting of the Proletarian Children's Movement) will be commemorated.

The Pioneers will be making tours of the city of Schwedt where the Pioneers will stay for 3 days with German families and in this manner get a taste of life among GDR citizens.

The delegation leaders will have a meeting to exchange ideas on the CIMEA (International Committee for Childhood and Adolescent Movements) and together will discuss how the younger generation, through the common struggle of all forces for peace and progress, can achieve a happy life in a peaceful world.

SOVIET OFFICIAL'S CONFERENCE ON PEOPLE'S POWER

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 11 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] A talk was given yesterday morning in the auditorium of the Municipal Commissariat of Luanda on the general aspects of the establishment of the people's government agencies in the USSR; the main speaker was Comrade Vladimir, deputy chief, department of government agencies, Presidium, Supreme Soviet USSR.

The talk, which was also attended by national directors of the various departments of the party, members of the National Committee of Party Youth, the National People's Power Institution Commission, and party cadres and officials essentially dealt with the work done by the Communist Party after the October Revolution, a time when the objectives and importance of the agencies of people's government, along with Soviet citizens, began to be clarified and materialized.

The deputy chief, department of government agencies, Presidium, Supreme Soviet, began by talking about the establishment of agencies of people's government in his country, emphasizing that they constitute testimony for all Soviets. In another passage in his address, he noted that the number of deputies in the Soviet Union has already reached 50,000.

In the Soviet Union, as he said, the term of office of a deputy is 5 years while for the local councils [soviets] the term is extended by almost 3 years.

The member of the CPSU also talked about election standards in his country which are identical to those in Angola, where every citizen who has reached the age of 18 has the right to run for office and be elected.

Comrade Vladimir also made other remarks on the importance of the establishment of people's government agencies in Angola.

We recall that the Soviet delegation has been in Angola for several days now in response to an invitation from the MPLA-Labor Party.

BENGUELA SITUATION REVIEWED: SOVIET DELEGATION VISITS

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 12 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Benguela--The provincial ministry met with all its members in the people's palace, under the chairmanship of Col Dino Matrosse, member of the Policy Committee and coordinator of the provincial party committee, to study the activities engaged in since the last meeting.

During the meeting, various problems connected with opportunistic elements' illegal occupation of housing were examined closely; the state secretariat of housing was instructed to see that it be immediately reclaimed. They also took measures regarding small illegally established car-repair shops and insisted that they look carefully into the speculative prices they have been asking for repairs performed.

The ministry also gave close attention to the problem of reinstating former fighters in national reconstruction and established guidelines to pay special attention to those with less training, to improve their lot.

Special attention was paid to some socioeconomic problems and some serious measures were taken concerning the transportation of produce from the countryside to the city in order to be marketed there. At the close of the meeting, they approved a motion of support for the Central Committee and Comrade President Jose Eduardo dos Santos for the outstanding leadership they have been giving the country and their repudiation of the attacks committed by the South African racists.

Soviet Delegation in Benguela

Visiting this city since early yesterday morning is an important USSR delegation headed by Comrade Veniamir Dmitrienyo, CPSU Central Committee instructor, who is accompanied by Comrade Vladimir Manin, deputy director of a department of the USSR Supreme Soviet Presidium, and also Comrade Zeferino Juliao, national department director of the People's Power Institute.

The visiting committee was greeted by Comrade Antonio Sapalo, representing Col Dino Matrosse, and Lucio Amaral, Rui Fortes and Dias Fancony, all members of the party Central Committee.

Following their arrival, the distinguished visitors were welcomed by the provincial party coordinator, Comrade Col Dino Matrosse, provincial commissioner in Benguela.

The visitors informed the mass media that the purpose of their visit comes within the framework of the institution of the People's Power. On behalf of the people of the province, the provincial commissioner expressed his high regard for so distinguished a visit which, coming at this stage of the organization of one of the most important tasks issuing from the First Congress, goes to prove that we can always count on the close cooperation of a country which has always been at our side since the very first. This official said that in addition to People's Power, we have accomplished a great deal by stirring people into action beginning with our production centers right up to our rural areas.

CONGRATULATIONS, GRATITUDE TO CUBA EXPRESSED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 26 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpts] Today stands out as one of the most significant dates in the history of the revolutionary people of Cuba. Its magnitude alone has led to the deserved role being played by that country today in the context of the struggle by the peoples against the international reactionary forces and for their total emancipation.

We are referring to 26 July 1953, the date that marked the opening up of new horizons for Cuban society, which formerly was subjected to unrestrained exploitation on the part of U.S. imperialism.

Cuba, a free and sovereign country, is today more than ever an insurmountable wall against any form of domination and defeat by imperialism.

The Angolan people, through their age-old struggle against imperialist domination, have been demonstrating in practice the true meaning of the internationalist precepts contained in Marxist-Leninist doctrine, and they have been doing so with the support and active participation, in the most varied areas of national life, of comrades in the struggle who are committed to the cause of dignifying man and building a better world without social inequalities and with neither exploiters nor exploited.

It is in this context of militant firmness that sons of our brother people of Cuba are to be found among us making a total effort in behalf of our revolution. Many of them have already given their lives to insure that as is true in free Cuba, imperialism will not succeed in carrying out its inhumane and destructive intentions with respect to our country.

DOS SANTOS CONGRATULATORY MESSAGE TO CASTRO

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 27 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpt] On the occasion of the marking of another anniversary of the heroic 26 July, Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, president of the MPLA-Labor Party and of the People's Republic of Angola, and commander-in-chief of the Armed Forces, sent Comrade Fidel Castro Ruz, first secretary of the Communist Party of Cuba, president of the Council of State, and commander-in-chief of the Revolutionary Armed Forces, the following message of congratulations:

"Dear Comrade,

"On behalf of the MPLA-Labor Party, the Angolan people and the government of the People's Republic of Angola, I express with deep satisfaction to you, and to the Communist Party, the people and the government of the Republic of Cuba our heartfelt congratulations on the celebration of another anniversary of the heroic 26 July.

"Insofar as the People's Republic of Angola is concerned, from the beginning of our independence, and even during the course of our armed struggle for national liberation, the ideals of 26 July had repercussions which can only be evaluated from the benefits that one of the most sublime examples of consistent and practical internationalism known to history accrued to Africa and to all mankind as a whole. This example also made an immense contribution enabling the Angolan People to manifest their consistent solidarity with, and their total, unconditional support, both material, diplomatic and moral, to the peoples in the southern part of our continent who are still struggling against colonialism, apartheid and imperialism.

"In the course of our revolutionary struggle, and in the battle that Africa will have to wage for its economic emancipation, we are certain that the Republic of Cuba, with its Communist Party, under the inspired leadership of the esteemed Comrade Fidel Castro Ruz, will continue to be a secure rearguard for the victory of the cause of socialism.

"In this regard, I express to you an unswerving desire for the intensification of our unity, based upon the principles of Marxism-Leninism, on which the relations of friendship, fraternal solidarity and multiform cooperation that exist between the Angolan people, the fraternal people of Cuba and the respective vanguard parties have been firmly established.

"Comrade Fidel Castro, accept our sincere wishes for prosperity, health and personal well-being, and the expression of my fraternal and high regard."

LONDON CIRCLES ACCUSED OF CONNIVANCE WITH SAVIMBI

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 10 Jul 80 p 1

[Text] The clamor of protests raised all over the world against another act of South African aggression directed against the Angolan people has not yet stopped but quite unexpectedly, in London, there emerged the renegade Congumbe, playing his traditional role of the knight with the sad face, wielding his lance in defense of the clique of the Bothas.

He is in the British capital on an invitation from the well-known mercenary recruiting organization, his client of long ago, to which he is linked through bonds of sinister and criminal cooperation. This, according to all indications, will be an opportunity, under the protection of British authority, for conspiracies in the course of which plans will be renewed to zero in on Angolan soil, plans for new attacks to spread death and destruction among our defenseless masses.

As happened in 1974-1975, we will know how to come up with the proper response to this entire crowd of mercenaries who may turn up here, dispatched by whomsoever.

It seems that certain London circles have not yet learned the lesson of the past. Let them not come to us later with pleas for clemency, as is their habit, when we submit to the revolutionary justice of our people the dregs which they send us. Here we can only repeat the warning which was issued to public opinion in Britain long ago. But if they should venture just the same, the problem is not ours. We wash our hands of it. They can then only complain about the irresponsible individuals who agreed to be recruited and to come--but that will then be an internal question, between subjects of the British Crown and its government.

As we said in the beginning, the renegade Cangumbe, guest of his friends, the recruiters of mercenaries, used this interview as an opportunity to come to the defense of his new bosses, the South African racists who in his view are all fine people whom he would certainly like to see in Angola. In the absence of anybody else who would be inclined to speak well of them, the South Africans used the statements of that swindler to give them a big play, as if they had been produced by somebody with at least a minimum of propriety. For lack of anybody better, he would simply have to do, no matter what!

For the former smooth operator, South Africa is something he has never seen before, a kind of paradise on earth, sweetened by a marvelous system, the system of apartheid, which they all support with unrestrained enthusiasm. The rest of course supposedly is invented by us, the ill-intentioned ones.

According to him, Namibia is one big bed of roses, where there is utmost harmony between oppressor and the oppressed. All it takes would be for him to announce that the people in the streets sign petitions addressed to the United States, asking that the South Africans never leave their land and perhaps even request more prisons and more concentration camps!

Finally, it seems that everybody he talked to was really taken in by him. Well, as far as he is concerned, more than four-fifths of the country's population welcome apartheid and the Pretoria clique.

The South African racists are indeed well served with a system as virtuous as this one. But only they can take this sort thing seriously. They have at last found the defender they need: the defender of lost causes.

FRENCH INDUSTRIALISTS SCORED ON VISIT TO SOUTH AFRICA

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 27 Jul 80 pp 4, 10

[Article by Telmo Augusto: "The West and South Africa"]

[Text] The hypocrisy of the Western countries, and their fickleness and cynicism, are facts confirmed every day by the news, with increasing evidence, particularly in the view of those whom we term deliberately unwary and who, for reasons which are perhaps obscure, continue to believe in the notorious good intentions of the Westerners toward the battle that the African peoples of Namibia and South Africa are waging against the monstrous apartheid regime.

It is already an established fact that, without the present economic backing from the West and the big multinationals, we could expect a rather prompt breakdown of the flimsy foundation on which the entire structure protecting the racists and their system of exploitation and domination, of which millions of Africans are victims in their own countries, is based.

The racists are confident in their associates; they are pillars of strength, and have backing from someone. Hence, they are increasingly brazen in the crimes that they commit.

However, with all the nerve inherent in those who have no shame, nor any consideration for mankind, we often encounter positions among the Western powers condemning the apartheid regime, and in the good American philanthropic style, expressing regret in their elysian fields, white houses and palaces, over the lot of the unfortunate Africans who are the victims of so much terrorism and exploitation.

We are forced to laugh somewhat....Gentlemen, stop taking us for children, because we are not, and we are well aware of what your game is.

In front of us, there is one thing; and behind, there are visits and more little visits to Johannesburg; a brandy here, and another contract signing there. We are well aware, and it is your own news agencies that are informing us.

In this connection, we should certainly be informed about the recent 10-day visit paid to South Africa by an important delegation from the Paris Chamber of Commerce and Industry, led by its president, Mr Jean Theves, who, in our humble imagination, ought to be a very sleek and florid gentleman. Well, let us put aside our subjectivism, which is not of much concern in the matter.

During the course of a press conference, Mr Jean Theves stated his views, ich must unquestionably be those of his government, and which, in summary, indicated that an increase in economic relations between France and South Africa is a rather promising prospect.

But he said more. He also remarked that he was quite satisfied with the talks that he had held during the visit, the main purpose of which, for the French industrialists and businessmen, was to become familiar with the local economic situation, which is little known in French capitalist circles. We are in perfect agreement with Mr Theves, because we are certain that he and his party of illustrious individuals never entered a South African mine, to observe the conditions under which the Africans are working, and never witnessed a pay-day, to note what the black workers receive as a wage.

But, let us continue....

The president of the Paris Chamber of Commerce and Industry recalled with increased gratification that, according to the official forecasts, by the end of this year, South Africa should experience a growth in its gross industrial product of about 6 percent, and that French exporters should take advantage of this rather favorable growth.

Well, dear French industrialists, the best name for you, as is obvious to us, would be that of vultures; because you know very well how the economic growth in South Africa is achieved, how industry is run and where the profits go. It is the African workers, the millions of workers who are brutally exploited and cruelly repressed at any sign of protest, who fill your purses and bring smiles of satisfaction to your faces.

We think that if you were honest, to be interpreted in the strict sense of the term, you would certainly agree with the name that we give you: vultures. Note carefully, dear gentlemen who are becoming increasingly enamored of South Africa, the certainty that nothing is eternal, not even great loves.

Just one more thing: You should also advise your governments to be more honest, and to remain now [words missing from text] vultures with your autonomy.

KOREAN OFFICIAL'S VISIT REPORTED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 29 Jul 80 pp 1, 11

[Excerpts] Yesterday afternoon, Comrade Ho Tam, member of the Politbureau, vice premier and minister of foreign affairs of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, arrived in Luanda in order to hold meetings with our authorities.

At the 4 February International Airport, Comrade Ho Tam was welcomed by his Angolan counterpart, Comrade Paulo Jorge, member of the party's Central Committee and our country's minister of foreign affairs; the director of political affairs of the Foreign Affairs Ministry; and officials from the Korean Embassy in Angola.

Comrade Ho Tam, who is visiting our country in the capacity of special envoy of President Kim Il-song, read a statement to the news media. He began by declaring that the peoples of Korea and Angola are united with each other, even though they are separated by oceans and continents, and that we feel like comrades in arms and brothers united by indestructible bonds of friendship, through the common struggle against imperialism, colonialism and racism.

Regarding the activities to be carried out in our country, Comrade Ho Tam mentioned that they will relate to exchanges aimed at a further extension of the relations of friendship and cooperation, and that he would also discuss matters associated with the Movement of Nonalined Countries. That member of the Politbureau and Labor Party of Korea concluded by saying: "I am sure that our visit to Angola will contribute to the friendship between our two countries. We wish the Angolan people great success in the battle to build a new society which will forge ahead guided by the banner of socialism."

SOCIALIST EMULATION MEETING FINDS DECREASED PRODUCTION, ABSENTEEISM

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 20 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpts] The provincial secretaries of UNTA [National Union of Angolan Workers] and the second secretaries of the national unions held the fifth national meeting on socialist emulation recently in the city of Huambo. The purpose of the meeting was to take an accounting of the results of the second phase of socialist emulation and to evaluate the level of worker participation in economic and productive tasks.

The proceedings were conducted by Galvao Branco, assistant secretary general of the union central, and by cadres of the Department of Socialist Emulation. The participants arrived at the conclusion that, in view of the considerable drop in production in almost all branches of activity and the sharp rise in absenteeism, it has become necessary to carry out the "program to bring the leadership closer to the rank-and-file" at all levels of each structure, as approved by the UNTA central council. The UNTA secretary general recommended that suitable measures should be taken against certain leaders who fail to implement the program, since this constitutes a violation of the basic principles of union action.

"Red Saturday"

In honor of the First Extraordinary Party Congress and as a concrete demonstration of the working masses' support for this highly important event, the participants decided to hold an extra "Red Saturday," outside the scheduled events of the National Department of Socialist Emulation, to take place on 16 August. To this end, each provincial structure should see to the organization of the event, in the usual manner.

Seen as the correct means to organize social control in state economic units, application of Law 17/77 in the management of these companies has been expressly recommended in various statements by the Political Bureau and in speeches by high party officials. The participants observed that despite such recommendations, some directors have completely disregarded the law and at times have frontally opposed its application. Therefore it was recommended that the UNTA provincial secretariats for labor and social matters take legal action against all those who directly refuse to observe the laws emanating from the highest organs of our country, specifically Law 17/77.

Combat Against Internal Consumption

Based on the socialist principle that what is produced is common property and hence that everyone has the same right to it, the workers have been taking the goods they produce for their own use, and this has had negative repercussions in the perpetuation of speculative marketing. Therefore, the participants at the meeting decided to hold a meeting of supervision and assistance to explain to the workers the negative aspects of this practice, which is prevalent in some companies.

CAMPAIGN AGAINST DESTRUCTION OF STATE, PRIVATE PROPERTY

Launda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 18 Jul 80 p 1

[Article by Gustavo Costa: "Economy Dictates Care of Public Property"]

[Text] A broad nationwide campaign for the protection of public property will be launched today by structures of the party, the government and the UNTA [National Union of Angolan Workers]. The campaign is aimed at safeguarding public and private property placed at the disposal of the workers to relaunch the nation's economy and to build the new society.

The campaign is being launched because of the alarming wave of destruction of property, severely harming the national economy and often resulting in the loss of considerable sums in foreign exchange reserves.

The campaign should mobilize the efforts of various organizations and of conscientious workers and is aimed at insuring the normal development of activities to guarantee control over and protection of public property.

As the party has recommended, the execution of this plan calls for vigorous combat against diversion of materials, increased application of a strict austerity policy, reporting of workers who exhibit petty bourgeois behavior, whose self-serving activity is not in the social interest, and combat against low quality in production and the misuse or abuse of public transport.

The workers will be called upon to make increasing use of their creative initiative, introducing innovations in their work systems, both to increase production and to insure the gradual reduction of imports of raw material.

Once a new sense of responsibility and socialist morality has been awakened among the workers and the general public with respect to production and the need to protect public property, it will be necessary to launch a vigorous battle against paternalism, intercession, liberalism, negligence and favoritism, in which party and government decisions are disregarded, breeding lack of authority, disrespect for rank, lack of discipline and sabotage of public property.

This last aspect is even more disturbing when it is recognized that the constant infractions committed daily with respect to the protection and care of public property also contribute largely to the troubling economic and financial situation in the country today.

This picture can be easily explained. One need only observe the damage to the nation's economy as a result of tie-ups and misuse of transport vehicles, the precarious state of repair of real estate, hotels, airports, theaters and so on, the wasteful consumption of water and light, the waste of raw materials--in sum, a host of bad examples that we could mention here. It is urgent to eliminate them.

Comrade President Jose Eduardo dos Santos has already recommended several times that this situation, so damaging to our economy, be corrected, and has also indicated suitable remedies. Their application, now demanded at all levels, could bring about an improvement in the living conditions of the workers.

The people's property--state or private--must be protected, a task which the country's current economic and financial situation imposes upon every citizen.

Therefore, as the active subjects of the society which they are building, the people themselves are called upon to exercise their role as the principal agents in the care and protection of the public property needed to bring about the gradual improvement of their own living standard.

Take care of public property and protect the economy!

NEW BRIDGE WILL ALLOW INCREASED DIAMOND EXPLORATION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 25 Jul 80 pp 1, 10

[Article by X. Xavier]

[Excerpts] Yesterday morning in Lunda-Norte Province's Luzamba region, the Angola Diamond Company (DIAMANG) officially inaugurated a new bridge over the Cuango River as well as a manmade riverbed--1,050 meters long, 40 meters wide, and 17.7 meters deep--for the same river.

Those two important undertakings will considerably improve the national diamond company's exploration activity. Their inauguration was attended by party and government representatives: comrade Moises Cipriano, coordinator of the Department of Economic Development and Planning of the Lunda-Norte Party Committee; Major Bento Ribeiro, minister of industry; comrade Bernardo Tumba, deputy provincial commissioner of Lunda-Norte; and other officials from the Ministry of Industry and DIAMANG, as well as workers and cooperation workers.

Makenda Ambroise, the state administrator for DIAMANG, was the only speaker at the ceremony. He gave a brief historical sketch of the company's activity and of construction of the dam and dike, which have been in operation since yesterday.

As far as construction of the bridge is concerned, it will enable the Cuango Mining Division to explore a 3.8-kilometer stretch of the old riverbed, which has an abundance of diamonds that need to be explored. The stretch of riverbed in question is located 840 meters above sea level and slopes at an angle of 0.26 percent, compared to the Cuango area as a whole, which slopes at 0.08 percent.

The bridge that now crosses the Cuango River is of British make and can easily be set up by four men, although 12 are used. It consists of four extra-wide reinforced single sections with an extra-heavy steel deck. It is 49.89 meters long with a roadbed 4.85 meters wide, and it weighs 136,140 kilograms. It can easily support loads of up to 110,000 kilograms and can thus be crossed by any type of fully-loaded company vehicle.

The practice of diverting rivers has long been followed by DIAMANG and arises from the need to explore other streams with abundant deposits of this precious stone. Such an operation is more properly within the sphere of the Cuango Mining Division, which since yesterday has had one more artificial dike that will enable the company to account for a high proportion of production levels. Exploration of the Cuango began in the 1960's.

Until 1974, 87 percent of the Cuango Mining Division's diamond production came from the deposits in that river.

[Ambroise Makenda said], "We still have 6 months of work ahead of us. All of the company's workers must put forth their best efforts so that we will meet and even exceed this year's production schedule, which calls for 1,400,200 carats."

He concluded by saying, "In cubic meters of gravel, we should be processing 2,848,200 cubic meters, but we are processing only 2,073,940 cubic meters of gravel. We must therefore make an even greater effort to reach 6,184,400 cubic meters. To all of you workers, we recommend discipline, careful conservation of the means of production, and vigilance at the worksite, and each of you must feel responsible and needed for the tasks that must be accomplished in 44 hours of work--not 44 hours at work."

TELEVISION, RADIO ASSEMBLY PLANT PRODUCTION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 13 Jul 80 p 2

[Excerpts] Yesterday the Radio and Television Assembly Plant (ERT), formerly Industrial Alliance, installed a new television assembly line in a ceremony presided over by Minister of Industry Maj Bento Ribeiro (Cabulo).

Present as guests were Comrades Lopo do Nascimento, Central Committee member and minister of foreign trade; Carlos Alberto Van-Dunem, minister of hone trade; Emilio Guerra, minister of fisheries, and other national authorities, who thoroughly examined the various sections of that plant and in this way became fully informed regarding its operation.

Addressing the meeting, ERT manager Sansao Janola recalled that it was on that very date, 3 years previously, that our government appropriated the Sony-Luz, Ecrel and Industrial Alliance plants, and later the Stereo plant, all of which are now part of the ERT.

During the past 3 years, he continued, they have produced 38,908 radios and 1,534 television sets. During the first half of the year, they produced only 7,500 radios and 1,402 television sets because the plant had been shut down almost 45 days owing to the lack of raw materials. For the second half of the year, the ERT plans to manufacture 19,000 radios and 4,598 television sets. If the supply of plastic and wooden cases is regularly guaranteed, the plant could complete the manufacture of these two products in less than 4 months. Another angle, he said later, is the lack of proper packing cases for the television sets to assure their delivery to users in good condition.

The Television and Radio Assembly Plant's new television assembly line is doing the job with only 73 experienced electric assembler workers. Previously, they assembled models 20 TW 800-2, 20TW 801 L and 14 T 404 (portable), which was imported partly assembled. Now, these same television sets are assembled on the CKD system, and come entirely assembled.

The ERT is counting on receiving two Japanese technicians and one Portuguese for technical assistance and staff training.

AGRICULTURE MINISTRY MEASURES FOR INCREASED PRODUCTION

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 19 Jul 80 pp 1, 10

[Text] Taking into consideration the basic guidelines emanating from the historic First MPLA Congress, as well as the recommendations and decisions issued in various documents regarding the strategy to pursue in effective support of the peasants, Comrade Pedro Pacavira, member of the party Central Committee and minister of agriculture, has issued two dispatches in which he sets standards to follow in organizing cooperatives and associations and in raising rural production levels.

The first dispatch determines the creation of special brigades in support of the peasants, giving priority to cooperatives and associations, particularly in this experimental phase, in Kwanza-Sul, Bie, Moxico, Huila, Benguela, Uije, Lunda Norte and Lunda Sul provinces.

Comrade Joao Jardim, director general of ENAMA (National Farm Mechanization Enterprise) will be responsible for organizing the brigades and placing them in locations designated by the National Directorate of Farm Cooperativism and Support to Individual Peasants.

This directorate will be responsible for supervising, assisting in and monitoring implementation of the present directive and the planned goals. The directorate will report to the Office of Planning, through the respective provincial planning offices.

It was also determined that Luis Manuel, assisted by Ndongala Vicente, will be directly responsible for carrying out the provisions of the preceding paragraph.

The second dispatch takes into consideration the recommendations of the highest organs of the MPLA-Labor Party and the government, and particularly those of Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos and, previously, our beloved Comrade President Agostinho Neto, who advised that special attention be given to the agricultural sector and called for increased production to achieve food self-sufficiency as soon as possible. In light of these and other important directives, the dispatch determines that:

All executive organs should make a greater effort to carry out the high-level directives of the MPLA-Labor Party and the government of the People's Republic of Angola.

All indicators formulated by the Office of Planning should be seen as points of departure and may come to be exceeded in some provinces.

Implicit in the provisions of the present dispatch is the distribution of means, according to the volume of work and the organizational capacity to use and maintain said equipment.

The national directors appointed to inspect and provide assistance and supervision in the respective provinces should keep more closely abreast of the projects, regularly informing the ministry about the achievement of the fixed goals, as well as any difficulties and bottlenecks that arise.

AGRICULTURAL PROTOCOL WITH GDR--A protocol of cooperation between our country and the GDR in the field of agriculture was signed yesterday in Luanda. Signing for the Angolan side was Afonso Norman, director of the Office of Legal Consultation and International Exchange, while Werner Munch, general director of the GDR Ministry for Agriculture, Forestry, and Foodstuffs, signed for the East German side. The agreement that has now been signed is the result of talks among members of the joint subcommission set up by the two countries. It provides for development of the existing cooperation between Angola and the GDR in various fields, among them potato production and development of the Matala agrarian complex. The agreement also calls for the construction and reconstruction of siloes in our country's ports. Werner Munch said on this occasion that with the signing of this protocol, a number of foundations have been established for strengthening the existing cooperation. He emphasized, "I can say that in the future, our party and government will do everything to help the Angolan people in their just struggle to develop the economy." Afonso Norman said on the same occasion that the Ministry of Agriculture does not have the slightest doubts concerning the document now signed, because cooperation with the GDR is satisfactory, and the positive results prove it. In conclusion, he expressed the desire to see the implementation of all the agreements included in the protocol. [Text] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 24 Jul 80 p 1] 11798

LEGAL PROTECTION RIGHTS RESPECTED--"The court gave the defense the greatest freedom to better defend the accused." So said yesterday, in his final plea before the Revolutionary People's Court, the court-appointed defender of some of the 28 defendants in the trial involving a UNITA ring of bomb throwers. The defense attorney, some of whose clients in this case are implicated in the most serious accusations produced in this trial, also said that "no matter how odious the crime, none of the accused has appeared in this court without counsel." Another of the three acourt-appointed attorneys was to emphasize in his address that article 23 of the Constitutional Law of the People's Republic of Angola [RPA] "serves as the basis for the defense of the accused." In this connection, he recalled that "the chief culprit and the architect of destabilization in the RPA is international imperialism, which uses a few Angolans who are less aware" in its criminal actions against our people. The other defense attorney emphasized that "the defendants are not accused because they believe in UNITA, but because they have committed monstrous acts." He said that in this trial "it is not the conscience of each of the defendants that is on trial, but their acts." In their pleas in defense of the accused, the three court-appointed attorneys acknowledged the objective nature of most of the accusations contained in the final charge by the people's attorney, and they were unanimous in praising the document he produced. USSR PROFESSOR'S LECTURE SERIES--Yesterday the JORNAL DE ANGOLA began publishing a series of the texts of lectures on various political-ideological topics in Marxist-Leninist theory, offered by Dr Vasiliy V. Krakivin, professor at the Dr Agostinho Neto National Party School. Presented in simple and easily understandable language, the lectures are directly related to current tasks in the Angolan revolution, with striking examples supported by excerpts from speeches of our immortal guide, Comrade President Agostinho Neto, Comrade President Jose Eduardo dos Santos and other eminent leaders of the MPLA-Labor Party. This is a distinguished scientific work, adapted to our national situation. It merits special attention from members of the party, party youth and students, since mastery of Marxist-Leninist theory and its application according to the conditions of a particular country constitute the cornerstone on which the success of a revolutionary process rests. The texts of this lengthy work will be published three times a week, in our Wednesday, Thursday and Friday editions. To gain the most benefit from this important and valuable work, we feel it is useful to open up discussion of the material. Readers may write to the paper, offering opinions and any questions that may arise, to which the author will duly respond. [Excerpt] [Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 19 Jul 80 pp 2, 10] 6362

FINAL MEETING OF BENINESE LIBYAN COMMISSION REPORTED

Cotonou EHUZU in French 7 Aug 80 pp 1, 2

[Article: "Final Communique"]

[Text] In the framework of the periodic meetings foreseen in the cooperation accords signed between the Beninese People's Republic and the Arab Libyan Socialist People's Jamahiriya, the second session of the important joint commission of Benin-Arab-Libyan cooperation was held in Cotonou from 2 to 6 August 1980.

The delegation from the Arab Libyan Socialist People's Jamahiriya was headed by brother Mohamed El Mabruk, secretary of the People's General Committee for Public Function.

The delegation for the Beninese People's Republic was headed by Comrade Ifede Ogouma, minister for foreign affairs and cooperation.

The work took place in an atmosphere of frank cordiality and mutual understanding. Both delegations, after having congratulated themselves on the important joint achievements carried into effect on the economic, technical and cultural plan, and after examining the ways and means necessary for the further reinforcement of the cooperation between their two countries, decided to devote more effort in the application of the agreement, as well as an effective new direction to all the projects listed in the program for this cooperation.

During this session both parties were to finalize the cooperation agreement in the domain of the PTT (Post and Telecommunications) service.

This agreement was submitted to both heads of the delegations, who signed it in due form. Both heads of the delegations expressed their wish that the competent authorities of both countries would proceed with its ratification in the very near future.

In addition,both parties recognized the need for the establishment of a friendship association between the Beninese and Arab Libyan peoples.

While reviewing the problems which trouble the African Continent, the two heads of the delegations, after having congratulated themselves on the success achieved in the last OAU summit, expressed their great preoccupation facing the various conflicts which set some states against one another, and condemned the Camp David agreements, as well as the diabolical maneuvers of international imperialism.

Both parties reaffirmed their support to the Palestinian, Namibian and Saharas peoples in their struggle for independence and the total liberation of their territories. They also condemned the aggressive intrigues aganist the integrity of the Libyan territory.

The head of the Arab Libyan delegation, brother Mohamed El Mabruk, during his stay in the Beninese People's Republic, was received in audience by president Mathieu Kerekou, to whom he transmitted a message from Mu'ammar Qadhdhafi, leader of the glorious Libyan revolution.

Brother Mohamed el Mabruk expressed his profound gratitude to comrade president of the republic and to all the Beninese people, for the warm welcome and fraternal hospitality which had been extended to him as well as to the delegation who accompanied him during their sojourn in the Beninese People's Republic.

The next meeting of this important joint commission for Benin-Arab-Libyan cooperation will be held in Tripoli on 28 January 1981.

PROVISIONAL STATUTES APPROVED FOR REVOLUTIONARY YOUTH

Bujumbura LE RENOUVEAU DU BURUNDI in French 3-4 Aug 80 pp 1-2

[Text] The president of the party and president of the republic has just signed UPRONA [National Unity and Progress Party] Decision No 0019 of 30 July 1980 concerning provisional statutes for the Rwagasore Revolutionary Youth (JRR).

The statutes are provisional because they will become final only after adoption by the First National Congress of the JRR, which will take place in 3 years. The statutes are based on the charter and statutes of the UPRONA Party adopted by the First National Congress.

It was for the purpose of making Burundi youth a dynamic force aware of its historic role in the democratization of our institutions and the pursuit of the revolution that the president of the party promulgated the provisional statutes of the JRR.

The statutes stipulate that there now exists in Burundi a single youth movement affiliated with the party and called the Rwagasore Revolutionary Youth.

The JRR is a mass organization entrusted with the task of completing and carrying further all action of the UPRONA Party among young people. It works under the political and ideological supervision of the UPRONA Party.

The JRR bases its action on the party charter and has the following objectives: to cultivate among young people a spirit of solidarity, collective work, sacrifice and self-denial, to fight individualism, greed and the tendency toward becoming bourgeois; to cultivate a sense of responsibility among young people; to fight crime and sloth; to participate actively in the eradication of illiteracy, ignorance, disease and poverty; to fight all abuses of power and the tendency to subordinate the general interest to personal interests; to participate in the development of national culture; to consolidate national unity through a firm struggle against all forms of division; to work resolutely for the sovereignty of the people based on national resources; to consolidate democracy in keeping with the principles of democratic centralism, criticism, self-criticism and collegial leadership; to fight imperialism, colonialism, neocolonialism and any other form of the exploitation of man by man; and to support national liberation movements and progressive and revolutionary parties and organizations in Africa and throughout the world.

Any Burundi citizen between the ages of 16 and 30 may be a member of the JRR, and the maximum age may be waived for leaders. Anyone may be a member of the JRR who recognizes the leadership role of the UPRONA Party in all areas of national life, who supports the UPRONA ideology and who pledges to respect the statutes of the JRR and submits an application for membership.

There are two commissions within the JRR: the Student Commission and the Pioneers Commission.

The Student Commission includes all Burundi students and pupils who are members of the JRR. It develops the spirit of unity and cohesion and defends the interests of Burundi students and pupils.

The National Pioneers Commission includes all Burundi young people between the ages of 7 and 15.

COTTON MARKETING CAMPAIGN UNDERWAY

Bujumbura LE RENOUVEAU DU BURUNDI in French 31 Jul 80 pp 1-2

[Article by Sindayigaya Zacharie]

[Text] On 29 July 1980, COGERCO (Cotton Reserve Fund Committee) launched its (cotton) marketing campaign in all areas where the plant is grown -- that is, inside and outside farming communities on the Ruzizi Plain and Lake Tanganyika.

The operation is being conducted by three teams operating in the Kabezi region in the south, at Nyamitanga in the central area and at Mparambo in the north.

Despite the somewhat tardy start, 70 tons of cotton were collected the first day, which would point to the collection of some 100 tons daily when cruising speed is reached! Such quantities require immediate ginning in order to permit storage. The ginning will begin immediately after the opening of the campaign (31 July 1980).

The price has been set at 30 francs per kilogram, which puts Burundi in second place after Madagascar for the best price offered to planters.

Planters are therefore asked to provide good drying, guaranteeing that seeds will germinate properly.

Furthermore, at the time of ginning, the cotton sticks to machinery and causes obstructions when it is damp.

Other operations that must be done properly by the planter during this period are sorting, loading and the phytosanitary campaign between seasons.

Sorting consists of separating white cotton from the yellow. Loading means packing to facilitate transport.

Planters customarily use sticks to pile cotton in baskets, a method never recommended because of the breakage of fibers.

Concerning the phytosanitary campaign between seasons, officials note that since cotton insects or diseases are generally specific, they may be carried from one year to the next if the fields are not cleaned as rapidly as possible of all plant debris from cotton.

Roots must therefore be carefully pulled out and piled with all other debris for burning.

PORT PROBLEMS AFFECT TRADE

Bujumbura LE RENOUVEAU DU BURUNDI in French 31 Jul 80 p 1

[Article by Callixte Sinzinkayo: "Burundi Trade in Difficulty"]

[Text] Since mid July, the port of Kigoma has had to slow down operations because of crane breakdowns. Salvator Sindayihebura, director of customs, and Leonard Yofani, head of the port of Bujumbura, explained the reasons to us and told of the consequences we can expect.

For some time now, cranes at the port of Kigoma have been down and everyone knows that loading and unloading problems at the port affect commercial trade between Burundi and foreign countries, given the fact that most of our exports and imports go through the port.

Normally, some 6,000 tons of goods are exported monthly, along with 8,000 tons of zinc and copper from Zaire. For the time being, nearly everything is paralyzed. The port of Bujumbura is almost at a standstill. Its activities have been marking time because the chain has been broken at Kigoma since 15 July. At the present time, solutions are being sought to correct the situation.

Coffee is the product that suffers the most from these circumstances. Since 15 July, over 2,000 tons of Burundi's coffee that were to be shipped from Bujumbura have been stored at the port. The BCC (Burundi Coffee Company) does not conceal its concern over this situation, which may cause it to lose a great deal of money.

Actually, the BCC had already signed coffee delivery contracts at very advantageous prices. If the first shipment of this coffee is not yet loaded on a ship out of Dar-es-Salaam by 31 August, firms that placed definite orders may cancel them or modify prices because of the circumstances. In any case, Burundi will be the loser.

Consequently, if the BCC does not manage to export the first shipment of 2,340 tons within the period of time initially stipulated, the second lot of 3,840 tons will also be late and therefore subject to a lower price.

It is to be hoped that the situation at the port of Kigoma will not persist for long. Otherwise, Burundi may once again suffer the effects of its land-locked nature, especially as regards exports.

To date, the northern route (Rwanda-Uganda-Kenya) has not been used to export Burundi products except for tea. Furthermore, it is not safe in certain regions.

It is because of the lack of security that part of the coffee from eastern Zaire now goes through Burundi and Kigoma.

AGREEMENT WITH CUBA--At the Ministry of Foreign Affairs on Tuesday afternoon, Lt Col Edouard Nzambimana, Burundi minister of foreign affairs and cooperation, and Cuban Ambassador Rodriguez signed a protocol between Burundi and Cuba. The document signed is a general economic, scientific and technical cooperation protocol containing provisions concerning execution of the Economic, Scientific and Technical Cooperation Convention signed in Havana on 11 October 1976 by representatives of the Cuban and Burundi governments. Cooperation already exists between the two countries and we have already reported the arrival in Burundi this year of a team of Cuban doctors and paramedical personnel. ERITREAN LIBERATION FRONT LEADER ASSESSES SITUATION, CALLS FOR CULTURAL AID

Paris AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI in Arabic 4-10 Aug 80 p 21

[Interview with Eritrean Liberation Front leader 'Uthman Salih Sabi, by al-Sarraj Muhammad Munir, in Rabat; no date given]

[Text] The conditions of international conflicts have begun to create a favorable atmosphere for the Eritrean revolution. African leaders are lending a sympathetic ear to revolutionaries who are urgently requesting all kinds of support.

The Eritrean problem is in a critical stage, after the visit of Ethiopian President Mengistu Haile-Mariam to Sudan and the resultant rapproachment between the two countries, in addition to negative reverberations on the Eritrean revolution and the information blackout imposed on the revolution. This is so, despite the interest of many African leaders in the Eritrean problem and their efforts to reach a solution to it.

In order to assess this African position, an Eritrean delegation visited a number of West African countries. The delegation was headed by 'Uthman Salih Sabi, President of the Central Council and chairman of the Executive Committee of the Eritrean Liberation Front, Popular Liberation Forces. AL-NAHAR AL-'ARABI WA AL-DUWALI conducted this interview with him while he was in Morocco.

[Question] African interest in the Eritrean problem has increased. What steps have you taken to consolidate it, and to what has Arab-African cooperation been won in support of this problem?

[Answer] Even though we are Africans, Africa has played a negative role with regard to the Eritrean problem, particularly with the development of the Organization of African Unity, the presence of Emperor Haile Selassie I as its head and the choice of the Ethiopian capital as its headquarters.

Therefore, all through the years of the Eritrean battle, from 1960 on, we have found no support from African nations which considered our cause to be that of secession, similar to Katanga in Zaire, South Sudan, or Biafra in Nigeria. Recently, after the intervention of foreign troops, such as the Cubans, in the struggle between us and Ethiopia as well as between Ethiopia and Somalia, many African nations have begun to perceive the existence of a threat to their security in that this precedent might recur in other places in Africa. We noticed this at the recent conference of foreign ministers of Islamic nations in Islamabad when we met a number of African ministers who expressed willingness to take up the Eritrean problem within the Organization of African Unity.

[Question] What is the effect on the Eritrean problem of the rapprochement between Sudan and Ethiopia and between Saudi Arabia and South Yemen, with the knowledge that Aden is allied militarily with Ethiopia?

[Answer] Sudan as a nation has dealings with its neighbor Ethiopia. As a sovereign nation it has the right to improve its relations with the Ethiopian nation. However, Eritrea is also a neighbor of Sudan, a neighbor who is a strategic and geographic entity which Sudan cannot ignore, just as it cannot ignore an armed struggle on its borders between two African countries. Our hope is that the Sudanese-Ethiopian rapprochement will lead to Sudan's playing the role of mediator in solving this problem peacefully through negotiation. So far, there have been no positive results from this rapprochement, in the sense that both the Sudanese and Ethiopian presidents have gone into the problem of Eritrea separately. The Ethiopian president has insisted on considering Eritrea as an indivisible part of Ethiopia. We have learned that his concessions are limited to the nine points, in other words autonomy similar to what Israel is proposing on the West Bank. Thus this rapprochement has produced no change either in Sudan's position with regard to Ethiopia or in Ethiopia's position with regard to Eritrea. The Sudanese government closed Eritrean offices in Khartoum for security reasons during the visit of Mengistu, although after the visit, it permitted them once again to pursue their activities.

As for the rapprochement between Saudi Arabia and South Yemen, it is important to us that good relations exist among all Arab nations, especially those next door to us, because Arab conflicts reflect negatively on us.

In principle we think this rapprochement between Saudi Arabia and South Yemen is a positive step, but we don't know how much this rapprochement can benefit us or moderate South Yemen's policy, so it may escape from Soviet hegemony which made it send troops to fight both the Eritrean revolution and Somalia. This is an extremely regretable matter. We downed a Yemeni plane in 1978 and captured its pilot. This means that there is total proof of Yemen's military participation against us. At present we hope that this rapprochement among the Arab Gulf states will lead to a balanced policy preventing South Yemen from intervening against both us and Somalia.

Region of Confrontation

[Question] If Somalia agrees to grant military facilities to the United States in the port of Barbarah, would Eritrea benefit from that, and would the Horn of Africa become a region of confrontation between East and West?

[Answer] The Horn of Africa, which includes Ethiopia, Eritrea and Somalia, has not been transformed into a region of conflict between East and West. The Ethiopian regime still maintains some relations with Western nations. The European Common Market and the United States has given it economic aid amounting to approximately $300 million over the past 2 years, in addition to foodstuffs and relief aid. This resulted from the Western nation's notion that the Mengistu regime is a military one which might return to the West if its interests so dictate. However, we do not believe that this notion is correct, because the Mengistu regime is building a communist party, and the Soviet Union has learned from past experience. It is trying to establish popular organizations upon which it relies for support, besides foreign troops which protect the organizations. Mengistu himself is even guarded by foreign troops from Cuba or East Germany. Therefore, the return of this regime to the West is not likely at present.

With regard to Barbarah Port facilities, there has been no agreement between Somalia and the United States, as far as we know, because the latter has rejected Somali requests for arms and economic assistance amounting to $2 billion. The Americans have proposed no more than $40 million. In addition, America wants Somalia to pull out of Ogaden altogether, and Somalia refuses to do so. Therefore there has been no agreement so far. If there is one, it will heat up the conflict in the region, and Somalia, at least, will become powerful in its dispute with Ethiopia. That may reflect positively on us, especially in view of the fact that Ethiopia has recently obtained advanced weaponry for guerrilla warfare, such as armored MA-24 helicopters which are impervious to anti-aircraft weaponry. When used intensively, they cause tremendous damage. This is what has doubled the number of refugees, aside from the drought in Eritrea and Ogaden.

In any case, we don't want to be fuel for international conflicts in this region of strategic importance in the Red Sea. We do not support the presence of either American or Soviet military bases. However, the fact of the matter is that the Soviet Union now has bases on islands belonging to Eritrea and at the two ports of Massawa and 'Assab. The United States is trying to establish bases in the region, in Somalia for example. This makes us prey to great conflicts. We hope the United Nations will step in.

It is committed both morally and politically to solving the Eritrean problem and conducting a referendum giving the people a choice regarding autonomy, in accordance with a United Nations resolution of 1960. We also hope that the Organization of African Unity will intervene to find a solution through negotiation. We understand Ethiopia's interests in Eritrean ports, without surrendering our independence and sovereignty.

Military Situation

[Question] What about the military situation now?

[Answer] The fighting still goes on. Ethiopian forces recently tried to reach the mountainous, very rough countryside of Eritrea. They met violent resistance from the revolutionaries who are expert in guerrilla warfare. This was not the first time. Similar attempts were made previously when the Ethiopian infantry failed and returned to the cities which had been free until 1978. At that time Ethiopia seized them, following the intervention of Cuban forces due to conflicts among Eritrean groups. This was so, despite our repeated appeals as popular liberation forces for the need to settle the conflicts and unite forces in one organization like the PLO, so that it might contain at least a minimum of national alliance. In fact, despite its density, the Ethiopian army (nearly 230,000 in Eritrea) cannot destroy the Eritrean countryside, inasmuch as Ethiopia is busy elsewhere in Somalia and Rumu (Ethiopia) which constitutes the resistance where 55 percent of the entire population is trying to obtain autonomy. Therefore, Ethiopia has an uncertain capability in all these conflicts in view of the fact that it is also economically poor and exports only coffee, which pays for Soviet arms. Therefore, if our steadfastness continues, we will force a political solution on Ethiopia. In politics there are no constants, not even in the positions of the superpowers.

[Question] Why wasn't the Eritrean problem studied at the last African summit?

[Answer] The reason stems from the fact that there wasn't sufficient preparation on our part. We didn't make the necessary contacts with member nations in order to include our problem on the agenda. As I mentioned in the beginning, we have a great task ahead of us in penetrating the African domain and acquainting African officials with the true picture of our problem. We have great hope that the problem will be included in the work of the next summit, after we make contacts with African nations with regard to military, financial and cultural aid. In the cultural field we are faced with malice which is not less significant than the war of guns and trifles, since they wish to destroy our Arab and Islamic culture. We are fighting for this sake more than we are fighting in our armed battles. We need cultural aid, whether scholarships or the opening or schools in refugee areas. Our educational apparatus is teaching nearly 15,000 students at present. We need secondary schools, and we need to expand elementary schools to accommodate nearly 50,000 students. In this connection, we make an appeal for aid, because our conflict with Ethiopia is one of civilization and culture and has gone on for 1,000 years.

ERITREAN CONFLICT DEADLOCKED AFTER 20 YEARS

Paris LE MONDE in French 16 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by Jean-Claude Pomonti]

[Text] The Eritrean conflict, which began 20 years ago, seems to still be deadlocked. In the field, the insurrection seems to have succeeded, in 1980, in restoring an equilibrium jeopardized by the large Ethiopian offensive of 1978. In the diplomatic sphere, the rapprochement between Addis Ababa and Khartoum has still not resulted in negotiations between the Derg--the Ethiopian military junta--and the two principal insurgent movements, EPLF [Eritrean People's Liberation Front] and ELF [Eritrean Liberation Front], aid for which transits via Sudanese territory.

During May, the visit of President Mengistu to Khartoum (cf LE MONDE, 27 May), on the occasion of the 11th anniversary of the Sudanese 'revolution,' was interpreted as a new stage in the process of conciliation between the two regimes whose principal dispute centers on Eritrea. It might have been thought at that time that the two countries would harmonize their views to attempt to quell the continent's oldest and bloodiest armed conflict.

So far, there has been no sign of this. Since early 1978, EPLF and ELF have been proposing to Addis Ababa a "political settlement negotiated with no preconditions." The Ethiopians, for their part, have never offered anything else than settlements which do not call into question the unitary character of their state nor even the political pre-eminence of Addis Ababa. In the field, they carried out, in 1978, a series of offensives involving several divisions which made it possible for them to retake the main urban centers and restore armed convoy traffic on the major routes.

This gigantic effort, which could not have been undertaken without the assistance of massive Soviet military aid, ran up against EPLF resistance in Nakfa, in northern Eritrea. In 1979, the insurrection managed to maintain its supply lines on the Sudanese frontier. It also succeeded in fostering insecurity in the countryside and on the roads.

Nineteen-eighty also saw large combats take place. On the Sudanese frontier, the Ethiopians have been forced to evacuate several positions and pull their troops back to the largest localities. EPLF has managed to loosen the vice around Nakfa and to threaten again the outposts at Keren; to the north of this city, in the region of Afabet, combats again broke out at the beginning of August. EPLF claims to have taken an Ethiopian camp in this sector, situated halfway between Keren and Nakfa.

The insurrection is expecting, as it does each year, new Ethiopian attacks during September, the harvest season. Addis Ababa is reported to have concentrated heavy artillery pieces and planes in order to destroy the harvest. Fearing the use of chemical weapons by their adversaries, the maquisards have manufactured gasmasks and launched a campaign to alert international opinion, claiming that about 50 Soviet experts in chemical weapons were in Eritrea where the Ethiopians are reported to have constituted stocks of neurotoxic gas.

In an appeal made on 5 August, EPLF stated that the Ethiopians had regrouped in Asmara, the capital of Eritrea, 40 helicopters, supplied by Moscow, charged with spreading fatal innervating gas. According to EPLF, the Soviets have also delivered incapacitating agents, of the type which are reported to have been used against Afghan maquisards.

For his part, Azzazi, member of the ELF Central Committee, told us that "the Ethiopian regime has not hesitated, in the past, to use napalm, and it will not hesitate to use, this time, the chemical weapons delivered by Moscow." In July, the socialist group of the European Assembly had already echoed these preoccupations by asking Ethiopia and the Soviet Union to "stop using chemical weapons in Eritrea" and to "refrain from any subsequent use of chemical weapons of any sort whatever."

The Eritrean war therefore seems to continue with equal ferocity in both camps. The Eritrean rebels have proved that Soviet aid, so large these last 2 years, had not made it possible for Addis Ababa to impose a military solution. Nothing indicates, however, that the Ethiopians have yet entertained the idea of making concessions to the Eritreans.

WARNING SOUNDED AGAINST INTERNAL ENEMIES, COUNTERREVOLUTION

Conakry HOROYA in French 18, 19, 21-23 Jun 80

[Five-part article -- parts 3, 4, 5]

[18 Jun 80, pp 1, 3]

[Text] To say that the revolution has been betrayed and to abstain from denouncing, seeking out and liquidating the traitors to the revolution who are camouflaged within the apparatus of the State Party of the people's revolution is no longer being merely lenient, it is being in league with the devil; it is, in fact, a betrayal of ones's mission, an abdication of one's responsibilities and a renunciation of the carrying out of the revolution. As harsh as the measures of purification may be, they are still less harsh than the consequences of non purification when purification becomes necessary. But once that purification has taken place, the revolution will surge forward, particularly in the domain of production of material and nonmaterial wealth.

The revolution is a solid edifice, indestructible, so long as the attacks come from outside, because the revolution expects attacks by its class enemies, whom it knows full well, and it remains resolute and ready to bar the path to the most perfidious machinations of its enemies.

But the edifice may crumble for lack of vigilance and steadfastness when, from within, as with termites, its own occupants begin to gnaw away at it, to sap it, to demolish its pillars, to destroy its foundations. The leadership which ruins through its criminal behavior the effectiveness of its revolutionary apparatus is not an enemy introduced into the citadel, but one which existed earlier in it; its harmfulness is unlimited; it is a situation worse than infiltration and intrusion.

The revolutionary people of Guinea, at present, must be firmer concerning the traitors camouflaged within it than with its enemies on the outside, however destructive they may be. The first are camouflaged traitors, the others are traitors who have been recognized for a long time and fight openly.

Such an attitude of firmness, which is the guarantee of the survival of the revolution and of the strengthening of the people's power, is worth observing by everyone and each person, with complete rigor.

It is a matter of the honor and the dignity of the people of 28 September 1958 and of 22 November 1970.

And to safeguard that honor and that dignity, to guard them as if they were the sacred fire, we need clarity in all our actions. Because the enemy of the revolution is confusion!

[19 Jun 80, pp 1, 2]

[Text] Confusion substitutes form for content, the means for the end, the object for the subject.

Confusion also substitutes enemies for friends and changes the direction of action of man and the people by false interpretation which it insinuates into the minds of both.

Finally, confusion tends to make all ideologies seem alike, all philosophies, all options and suggests the vanity of all choices, the uselessness of struggle, and that any people's revolution is only an illusion.

Revolution is a decisive choice. In order to carry it out effectively, vigorously, rigorously, the firm will of men and of the people must underlie all activities and eliminate from the understanding of the social reality all confusion.

The counterrevolution, the goals of which are selfish and reactionary and whose effects are harmful in its relations with the people, never makes clear the goal it envisions and never indicates the narrowness of the dimension of its influence, which is limited to the petty interest that only a small minority can profit from, to the detriment of the great majority. In order to lull the revolutionary militant, the counterrevolution tries to foist off the enormous lie that there is neither revolution nor counterrevolution.

That is why, the privileged arm of the counterrevolution is the confusion which camouflages its lies and gives it a certificate of moral validity.

The counterrevolution cannot be allowed to slander openly a whole people, to denigrate its fundamental values and to be clearly opposed to the realization of happiness, which is sought after by the popular masses. It fears reprisals.

But its objectives fundamentally contrary to those of the people, the counterrevolution, through insidious subtleties, big lies and a constant demogogic attitude aimed at lulling the popular masses, tries to convince us that it still supports their attitude in the face of the various problems of existence and that it is open to the happiness of the people.

That is the sort of confusion which no longer permits the people to understand the contradiction which opposes its interests to those of a group of greedy men living by the exploitation of men by other men.

As soon as the counterrevolution manages to create that confusion, it tries to isolate the head of the revolutionary movement by denigrating him and slandering him, by subtle and treacherous maneuvers in the cynical desire to decapitate the revolutionary movement, to demobilize the militants, to disorganize the popular struggle and consequently to weaken the revolutionary regime.

The method is simple: the counterrevolution begins by stating as a truth that is is pursuing the same goal as the revolution: the happiness of the people. In the second place it tries, through corruption, sabotage and intimidation, to block the actions of the revolution, to transform into breaking points points of friction which are inherent in any action.

The counterrevolution continues to undermine the revolution and then tries to show that weaknesses which it has created itself are basically the results of revolutionary action and denigrates the revolution in order better to hide its hideous, ferocious, bestial face. That is when the outside masters of the interior counterrevolution intensify their effort at subversion in order to go on the offensive, brutally and directly. That is the case of the aggressors against revolutionary countries.

[21-23 Jun 80, pp 1, 7]

[Text] To try to make it appear outside the country that the working masses are opposed to the leadership of the State Party is at the same time to make it appear that the government is not the incarnation of the will and aspirations of the masses. It is to try to attribute to the government a thousand and one crimes in order to conclude that it has a reactionary character, illegal and illegitimate.

No!

The leadership of a revolutionary movement has no personal position, because it has no personal object to gain, no personal interest to protect, no personal decision to impose.

The constraints exercised by the leadership of a popular movement are those imposed by the safeguarding and the developing of the interests of the people. These constraints come from the popular dictatorship which does not want any alienation of the rights and interests of the individuals and the people. These constraints are necessary; they are imposed on each person and on everyone.

This popular dictatorship imposes an appropriate orientation on the development of all the interests of the people by confering upon them a character marked by harmony and solidarity which is reinforced day by day.

The State Party of Guinea is the creation of the Guinean people and it can only remain the instrument of the working masses.

The exploiters of the people, the traitors to the fatherland, the allies of imperialism and of neocolonialism must be clearly identified and perfectly identified within Guinean society, which must act on them so as to reconvert their thoughts and behavior in the direction of the requirements of its harmonious evolution, the imperatives of social justice, of equality and of democratic and social progress on behalf of the individual and the national collectivity.

That is why the militants, the true militants, men and women, sincerely on the path of democratic progress, must constitute the great family of the revolution guided by the ideology of progress.

Finally, that is also why the militants, the true militants, and the true leaders of the State Party must sweep away confusion by making clear their socialist choice and the steadfast determination to defend it before and against everything.

WORK ASSIGNMENTS DURING DELEGATION'S VISIT TO USSR

Conakry HOROYA in French 11 Jul 80 p 4

[Text] A delegation from the State Party of Guinea led by Comrade Moussa Diakite, a member of the BPN [National Political Bureau] and minister of Housing, Urbanism and Domains, which included Comrades N'Famara Keita, a member of the BPN, minister of Energy and of the Konkoure, Lansana Diane, a member of the BPN, minister of the Army, and Diao Balde, a member of the BPN, minister of Domestic Trade, arrived on last 7 July in Moscow. This important economic and trade delegation was received as it left the plane by Vitali Morozov, first vice chairman of the Committee of the USSR for Foreign Relations and many other Soviet officials.

In a welcoming speech, Comrade Morozov, expressed his pleasure at receiving the high ranking Guinean delegation and his wish that this visit might contribute to strengthening the relations of friendship and cooperation between Guinea and the USSR. In his response, Comrade Moussa Diakite pointed out that the presence in the USSR of the delegation of the State Party was part of the strengthening of relations of all kinds which existed between the two countries.

The first meeting was devoted to the discussion of the program which was pre-established by the Soviet side, discussions over the reports of Comrades Moussa Diakite, the head of the Guinean delegation, and Morozov, first vice chairman of the Soviet Committee of the USSR for Foreign Economic Relations. At the end of the talks, the two sides, by common agreement, decided to set up 4 large technical working committees. Thus the Guinean delegation assigned its members in the following way:

--The first committee, charged with discussion the problems of trade relations with the USSR is headed by Comrade Diao Balde, a member of the National Political Bureau and minister of domestic trade.

--The second, charged with the examination of economic problems is headed by Comrade N'Famara Keita, a member of the BPN and minister of Energy and the Konkoure.

The third, charged with a review of our relations with the USSR in the areas of education, science, culture and health, is presided over by Comrade General Lansana Diane, a member of the BPN and minister of the Army.

--The fourth committee, headed by Comrade Hollie Ouis, our ambassador to the USSR, is concerned with fishing.

The various committees will begin work on Tuesday.

DPRK SHIP'S VISIT--A delegation of the National Political Bureau, comprised of Comrades Mouctar Diallo, minister of Transportation, Abdoulaye Diao Balde, minister of Domestic Trade, accompanied by many staff members of the two departments and of OAU Project 83, visited on Saturday 14 June, late in the afternoon, the ship "Oh San Tok" of the People's Republic of Korea, which had arrived in the port of Conakry as part of the Grand Palais OAU 83 program. In his welcoming speech, the captain of the ship spoke of the joy the members of his crew felt upon arriving in Guinea. In his response, Comrade Mouctar Diallo, after having transmitted the militant and cordial greeting of the people of Guinea and of their beloved guide, President Ahmed Sekou Toure, said that "the presence of the North Korean ship was in accord with the concretizing of relations of friendship and cooperation undertaken for so long a time by our two leaders, Ahmed Sekou Toure and Kim Il Sung. He ended by expressing the certainty that the "edifice which we want to build together will serve to strengthen our relations and the spread of the common ideals of liberty, independence, peace and nonalinement. ADF HIGHWAY LOAN--The African Development Fund (ADF) has lent 4.6 m FUA (approximately $4.8m) to Guinea-Bissau to meet the cost overrun of the first Highway Project. The loan is repayable over 50 years including a grace period of 10 years. The ADF granted its first loan of FUA5.2m. to Guinea-Bissau four years ago to finance the first highway project which comprises four distinct components: (i) Building the Jugudul-Bambadinca road together with a 200 m. long bridge; (ii) Detailed engineering studies for the road and bridge, preparation of tender documents, works control and supervision; (iii) Feasibility and detailed engineering studies for the Catio-Buba and Bube-Tite roads and the 600 m. long Joao-Landim bridge; and (iv) A general transportation study for the country. The second part (studies iii and iv) were entrusted to the Lavalin-Delcanda Group of Canada, which executed the work satisfactorily. With regard to these studies no cost overrun is anticipated. The direct benefits that will accrue to the economy are savings in vehicle operation and road maintenance costs, and more important, savings in travel time and elimination of a long detour for a distance of 130 km. As a portion of the primary road on the East-West axis, the road is an important commercial and rural artery. [Excerpts][London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1669]

UGANDAN POLITICAL LEADERSHIP CHARACTERIZED AS 'WARLORDISM'

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 9 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] Last week the Uganda Times accused Kenya of subverting its national interest and attacked President Moi both personally and as Head of State. The government paper also sought to give what it considers to be the history of Kenya's alleged involvement in Uganda politics since the fall of President Obote in 1971. The editorial saw Kenya as having supported dictator Idi Amin and also as having been involved in the Arusha meeting which organised the groups which ultimately overthrew Amin.

These charges are not only baseless but also highly irresponsible. Since Uganda's national interest is at issue, there can be no doubt that the charges did not serve it well! All they did was to fan the flames of hatred between the two countries and perhaps this was their real aim. This was not useful to Kenya or for that matter to Uganda either.

The peoples of both these countries have a long history of good neighbourliness and co-existence and the editorial did not reflect their true feelings. It must therefore have reflected the views of those Ugandan leaders who seem to thrive every time there is political chaos in that most luckless country. These so-called leaders seem always to think that Kenya is somehow responsible for their own political excesses and the trouble they occasionally throw their country into. This is nowhere near the truth. The fact of the matter is that Uganda is suffering due to a lack of committed national leadership.

Kenya has since 1963 stayed neutral as far as the internal politics of her neighbours are concerned. Nobody should have any doubts about this. She did not support any of the contending groups in the internal politics of Uganda, Tanzania, the Sudan, Ethiopia or Somalia. Her record is clean. That is why she adopts the policy of recognising only States, not governments.

It is important however, to divorce the position of the Kenyan State from activities of individuals who may have traded with Amin regime. At various times they sought to protect their trading interests by forging alliances with some of those in power in Uganda. Some of them were trading partners of the Government of Uganda. In the chaotic situation which has prevailed in Uganda for the past decade, that country has had its share of slick operators trading from and within Kenya and elsewhere. Their activities are being twisted to reflect the position of the Kenyan State and this mischievous interpretation is shown up in the editorial.

Uganda's exiles of all ideological opinion have been welcome in Kenya at different times. This may be seen by some as being "paternalistic," but this is in keeping with Kenya's position of neutrality. Our concern for being consistently neutral, has led to our refusal to be manipulated by any of the many groups who seek to rule Uganda. They are always in Kenya for one thing or another and they try their best to enlist Kenya's support.

These contending groups do not merely seek to influence the State; they also canvas the Kenyan media. The continuing internal chaos in Uganda has begun to affect our security interests. Along our common border, gangs and soldiers constantly cross to raid, kill and maim our citizens. Such incidents have become the order of the day. One such incident had just taken place and was the context in which President Moi spoke of the need to end the killings both along the border and within Uganda. In that particular incident, some Ugandan administrative officials even had to flee into Kenya. Expressing a wish that such killings be stopped cannot in any way be construed as interfering in the domestic affairs of Uganda.

In Eastern Africa these days it has become fashionable to pay more attention to personalities than to statecraft. This can only lead to problems in the long run since personalities are transient as opposed to the permanence of State interests. Nobody should confuse the interests of individuals with the interests of the peoples of the region.

In Uganda today we have a political leadership which can only be characterised as warlordism. It is a situation of a total breakdown of politics and administration. As a result, different warlords compete to influence the development of events by means of the gun. It is in this context that one must see the editorial which came soon after Dr. Obote gave a Kenyan publication a lengthy interview in which he appeared to be changing his stand on Kenya by clearly spelling out that he wanted improved relations. The timing of the editorial can also only mean that some other warlord did not relish the prospect of Dr. Obote mending his fences with Kenya. And so it was used for internal and external agitation. The editorial should not be taken as seriously as it would have been if there was a government in real control in Uganda and it had issued it formally.

Many people have compassion for the people of Uganda who have suffered for too long under all sorts of fake leaders. We hope and pray that Uganda will soon get a leadership which will be concerned with the real interests of its people and not just personal affairs.

As Kenya's Minister for Constitutional and Home Affairs, Mr. Charles Njonjo, said yesterday, all this country wants is for the people of Uganda to be able to live in peace.

COTU LEADERSHIP FACTIONS AGREE TO END RIVALRY

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 6 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

THE factions in the Cotu leadership yesterday agreed to put an end to their rivalry.

They decided instead to conduct their current election campaign in a mature and responsible manner.

The peace agreement was reached during a two-hour closed-door meeting under the chairmship of Labour Minister Titus Mbathi.

Mr. Mbathi called the meeting in the wake of a Press war and other conflicts in the organisation's leadership over the past months.

The leaders — who included secretary-general Juma Boy, chairman-general Fred Omido, deputy secretary-general James Karebe and treasurer Were Ogutu — agreed forthwith to stop the current war of words.

Mr. Mbathi told a news conference after the meeting that Cotu officials had agreed to promote sound industrial relations and avoid action that might jeopardise the trade union movement.

The officers agreed to refrain from attacking foreign missions or organised bodies operating through the Press or at public meetings. Dealing with such bodies would be through the Ministry of Labour.

They asked the Government to stop politicians from using the trade union movement for the furtherance of their own ends.

A source close to the meeting said it was heated throughout.

Last week, Mr. Omido had accused the African-American Labour Centre and the US Embassy of creating and encouraging disunity in Kenya's labour movement.

Mr. Omido had claimed that the labour leaders the US wanted elected included Mr. Boy who, he claimed, was facing a stiff challenge following his defeat in the leadership battle for the Dock Workers' Union.

There were also claims that the AALC chief representative in Kenya, Mr. Peter Kennen, was seen giving cash to voters at the national elections of the Kenya Shoe and leather Workers' Union.

Mr. Mbathi explained that it was against Government policy for any individual to receive funds from abroad for financing an election campaign.

He said it was the role of the CID to investigate such criminal activities.

GOVERNMENT ANNOUNCES NEW OIL CONSERVATION MEASURES

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 6 Sep 80 pp 1, 24

[Text] The Government yesterday announced new measures to conserve oil in the face of the worsening world fuel crisis.

And among them is a decision to lower the octane rating of Premium petrol from 95 to 91, a move which will hit big saloon car owners.

At a press conference in his office, Energy Minister John Okwanyo said the Government would give priority to low petrol consumption vehicles rather than large saloon cars.

The Minister also said the effect of OPEC price increases would be passed on to consumers on condition that oil companies did not make "windfall profits" in the process.

The Minister said lowering the octane rating would increase the yield of petrol from a given supply of crude oil.

Other short-term measures announced by the Minister are:

--A study will be carried out to establish the most desirable composition and maintenance of the national transport capacity with a view to restricting the import of equipment which may be unnecessary, unsuitable or expensive to maintain and operate.

--A concerted radio, television and newspaper advertising campaign will be launched to emphasise the seriousness of the situation and urge everyone to be conservation-minded in the use of petrol and other oil products.

--A study will be carried out to determine the exact cost of Kenya's oil imports, the nature of its use, areas of potential savings and scope of expanding exports of refined petroleum products from the Mombasa refinery to earn foreign exchange.

--An inventory of all serviceable Government vehicles will be prepared and circulated.

Mr. Okwanyo said long-term measures would include an urgent assessment of the economies of establishing a "cracking" facility at the Mombasa Oil Refinery which would increase the yield of finished petroleum products from the same quantity of crude oil.

Among the other long-term measures would be:

--The need for vehicle assemblers in the country to assemble more diesel-propelled vehicles will be stressed.

--An immediate study of the most appropriate means of oil rationing will be undertaken. "This does not mean the Government has any intention of introducing oil rationing," the Minister explained.

--Methods of transport less dependent on oil, such as electric rail systems for urban areas will be studied.

--Large firms and Government offices will be asked to provide eating places to reduce traffic congestion during the lunch hour.

--Large firms in towns will be encouraged to provide transport for workers to reduce the use of personal vehicles.

--Pooled school-bus systems will be propagated in towns to cut down the number of trips made by parents to schools.

--An intensive systematic programme for re-afforestation to increase the supply of wood fuel will be undertaken.

--The search for oil both on land and off-shore will be intensified.

KNFU ASKS GOVERNMENT TO COMPENSATE FARM LOSSES

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 10 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

MANY farmers face ruin because of a major crop failure in some of Kenya's large-scale farming areas.

The warning is contained in the latest issue of the magazine Farmers' Voice, official journal of the Kenya National Farmers' Union.

"The greater proportion of these crops were financed through the new Seasonal Crop Loan system, and farmers are now being asked to repay the loans although the crop totally failed through no fault of their own," says the magazine's editorial.

A KNFU spokesman said: "In the past, farmers have always been compensated for such crop failures. Currently, there are no facilities for compensation and the consequences could be serious — very serious."

The spokesman explained: "Rightly or wrongly, most large-scale farmers depend on outside finance for the preparation of land and the planting of crops. They repay that funding after harvest. If the crop fails, they have no money with which to repay. They are finished.

"But there is an even more serious consequence.

Guarantee

"Farmers who do have the money to finance themselves are not going to risk it on a farming enterprise unless they have some guarantee. Without that guarantee they could lose everything in a single drought.

"So they will invest their money elsewhere and our food production would suffer considerably."

Farmer's Voice says the KNFU has appealed to the Government to seriously consider paying compensation to genuine victims, particularly where unfavourable weather conditions are to blame.

In Nakuru District, some 40 per cent of the crop has completely failed for this reason.

The KNFU also advises farmers to report any crop failure immediately and ensure their crop is inspected, so whatever might be agreed upon later can be backed by sufficient records of genuine failure.

"If farmers cut down their burnt out crops before they are inspected by officials, Farmer's Voice warns, they might be unable to verify the failure if and when the time for compensation comes."

CEREALS BOARD DIRECTOR REJECTS RESPONSIBILITY FOR RICE SHORTAGE

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 10 Sep 80 p 9

[Text] Appointed rice distributors could be operating dummy retail shops in Nairobi City Council markets which they themselves supply.

This theory was put forward yesterday by the acting managing director of the National Cereals and Produce Board, Mr. A.B. Ongaro, who was at a loss to understand why there was plenty of rice in the open-air markets and none in the shops.

Mr. Ongaro said the problem must be one of distribution since his board was allocating rice to the appointed distributors in the normal way.

He disclosed that his officers, during a spot survey, had confirmed that there was plenty of rice in all the City Council open markets, though none at all in the shops.

"We are actually giving out everything we have," he added.

"We find a situation like this most unusual....we do not supply people in the open-air markets with rice and we don't know how they get their rice; yet they have much more than they need.

He said he could not rule out the possibility that some appointed distributors might be operating dummy retail shops.

He added: "We don't see any reason why people should be lining up at the supermarkets because our supplies should be most adequate--especially in Nairobi....

"When people find they have no rice they should not point an accusing finger at the board; they should point it at the distribution system."

Mr. Ongaro said his board was supplying over 100,000 kg of rice each week to distributors in Nairobi alone. It was unbelievable, he said, that with such a high allocation rice was not reaching wananchi.

The figure excludes supplies to Government institutions and schools.

It was possible, Mr. Ongaro went on, that hoarders were again back at work after being reprieved recently by the President.

He pointed out, however, that the board had refused to deal with businessmen who had been exposed as hoarders, saying they too had to be cleared by the Government.

Mr. Ongaro added that Nairobi PC Stephen Mwakisha had since given the board a new list of distributors authorised to get supplies from the board's warehouses.

He said his board would not accept the blame for the current shortage.

Kenya needs 50,000 tons of rice very year to meet the domestic demand.

This year, because of drought in many high rice growing areas, it is likely that production will fall. Accordingly, the Government has imported some 11,000 tons to help offset the short-fall.

Reports of rice shortages have been received from several parts of the country.

DATA ON GRAIN SHIPMENTS GIVEN

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 6 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

MORE than 27,000 tonnes of wheat and maize arrived at Mombasa port this week.

This is part of the massive import of foodgrains to cope with the shortage.

The first consignment of 13,000 tonnes of wheat was brought in by a Greekflag ship on Tuesday followed by another 14,600 tonnes of maize on Wednesday.

It could not, however, be confirmed whether the two consignments came from the United States or Europe.

Early this year, President Moi had visited the US and concluded an agreement for the import of more than 100,000 tonnes of foodgrains.

According to informed sources, more than 200,000 tonnes of foodgrains have been brought into the country between last March and todate.

Other sources hinted in Mombasa yesterday that food imports will continue until December when harvesting will be completed.

Some parts of the country have started harvesting maize. But other areas have just started planting.

The current food imports resulted from the prolonged dry conditions in major grain growing areas which caused sporadic shortages in many districts.

KENOL BLAMES OPEC--The Kenya Oil Company Limited (Kenol) has suffered a loss of shs. 4 million in the year ending May 31, 1980 and blames it all on the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) and price controls. In a statement to shareholders last Monday, the chairman of the company, Mr R.S. Alexander, claimed that five increases in OPEC crude oil prices from July 1979 to July 1980 and "rigid price controls" had turned a profit during the first five months of the period into a loss for the whole year. Consequently there would be no dividends. Alexander further claimed that price controllers allowed the company to raise prices on only three out of the five occasions and that even then increases were delayed, resulting in losses to the company. POSSIBILITY THAT DOE WILL BRING LONG-TERM GAINS NOTED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1639

[Text]

THE HARSH economic realities of the world have forced the Liberian regime of Master Sergeant K. Doe to try to appear less "revolutionary" and more internationally acceptable. "We cannot live in isolation," the Head of State said recently. "The actions we take here are reflected throughout the world and this certainly has a bearing on the economic progress we can make."

Liberia is seeking aid, and the good news is that the country is having considerable success. West Germany is to provide $23m. in the next two years and the United States will provide about $20m. It is hoped that negotiations with the International Monetary Fund will produce $85m. Mr. Richard Moose, the US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs, made it clear that the US had self-interested motives: he told a Congress sub-committee that Liberia had reportedly received offers of military and possible financial aid from Libya, Ethiopia and the Soviet Union. US willingness to help Liberia "will counter the temptation to accept such offers". The State Department considered that Liberia was at a critical juncture and the situation was "uncertain and fragile". The US Government could provide assistance at a relatively modest cost and "exercise influence on the course of events". It was in the US interest to maintain good relations with Liberia, Mr. Moose said.

The fact that Liberia is emerging on to the world scene again means that the government must be sensitive to the opinions of the world, and this can only be to the benefit of the Liberian people. The Minister of Planning and Economic Affairs, Dr. Togba-Nah Tipoteh, addressing the foreign press last week in Monrovia, said that to overcome the "crisis of confidence problem" that had arisen since the April 12 coup, it was necessary for all Liberians to work together to ensure the following principles: "that due process of the law be made fully operational for Liberians and foreigners alike; that no one should be arrested without being properly charged . . . and given a speedy and fair trial within the reconstituted civilian court system; that . . . sentences must be a matter of public knowledge; that humane treatment should characterise the handling of people under detention".

Master Sergeant Doe, in a major policy statement last month, said that among the problems to be reviewed if Liberia's international image was to be improved was the behaviour of men-at-arms and the unauthorised occupation of private homes by soldiers. In another speech he said some members of the PRC were going around giving wrong impressions about the Liberian revolution, harassing and intimidating citizens.

As was reported in West Africa on August 4, the People's Redemption Council has adopted a "spirit of forgiveness", releasing Mrs. Victoria Tolbert, the widow of the former President, from house arrest, freeing three of his daughters, promising a fair trial for his detained son, A. B. Tolbert, and lifting detention orders from a number of former officials. The Foreign Minister, Mr. G. Baccus Matthews, has urged the government to release all former officials because "keeping them too long in jail would make people withdraw their sympathies from the government and direct them to the prisoners". Mr. Baccus Matthews, in another speech to foreign diplomats, assured them that the PRC is committed to building a new society in which there is human dignity, equal opportunities and fair treatment for all. There have also been appeals for a general amnesty by religious leaders in Liberia.

Notably absent from pronouncements by Master Sergeant Doe's Government so far have been any promises about an early return to civilian rule. This is a fundamental point. There were two factors which caused the initial international rejection of the PRC regime, particularly among neighbouring African states. The first was revulsion over the murder of President Tolbert (chairman of the OAU at the time) and the killing of 13 of his associates (more of a lynching than an execution, as was reported at the time, with only the shadow of a trial and the military court itself recommending sentences other than death for most of the 13). Secondly, the fact that the regime was brought to power by a military coup — particularly one led by junior army men — increased the insecurity of other regimes.

Since April 12 there has been a growing recognition of the faults of the Tolbert government: its denial of rights to sections of the population (in practice if not in theory), its economic mismanagement and its "rampant corruption". It has also become apparent that there was an element of humbug in some OAU condemnation: other African rulers who came to power violently and have killed their political opponents nevertheless felt able to cast stones. However, there was also a sound basis for the objections. The PRC is now taking welcome steps to demonstrate that it not only acts "in the cause of the people" but also with some degree of respect for the basic human rights of the people. It now needs to devise some way for the views of the people to be expressed, presumably by voting in free and fair elections, and to indicate its willingness to obey the voice of the people. In what way, after all, are soldiers qualified to know what is truly "in the cause of the people"?

Previous military coups in Africa (and elsewhere) have rarely produced the results they aimed at. The days after April 12, when soldiers were seen robbing and brutalising the people whose cause they were meant to be serving, promised ill. There are now signs, however, that the Master Sergeant Doe coup may prove the exception in bringing long-term benefits.

POST-COUP POLITICAL SITUATION, RELATIONS WITH SOVIET UNION

Frankfurt FRANKFURTER ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG in German 23 Jul 80 p 3

[Article by Guenther Krabbe: "Doe on the Eve of His Trip to Moscow: Will He Take Liberia as the Bridal Gift?"

[Text] Monrovia, 22 July--The field marshal invited the sergeant-major. Samuel Kenyon Doe, president of the People's Liberation Council--the highest state body--and head of the West African republic of Liberia, informed Soviet head of state and party leader Brezhnev that he would accept the invitation. No date has yet been set.

If Doe really went to Moscow, that would be a bad sign for Liberia's development and an indication of its deteriorating relationships with the West. Throughout its entire history, which began with the settling of freed slaves through the American Colonization Society almost 160 years ago, Liberia has always had ties with the United States; as early as 1855 the Hanseatic cities of Luebeck, Bremen and Hamburg recognized the republic; since the wave of independence swept Africa 20 years ago, Liberia has been one of the reliable supporters of the West on the continent. Liberia would still be one, if Doe and a few other NCOs had not carried out a putsch in April and murdered the president, or if at least its more immediate and other African neighbors had come to terms with the event, or if the Western powers, together with the United States and the FRG, which has particular influence in Liberia, taking the lead, had recognized the new realities.

But the Federal government has not been able to forgive the new rulers for executing former Foreign Minister Dennis, a personal friend of Foreign Minister Genscher, after the coup. Because the FRG does not recognize governments but countries, Bonn is relieved of the need to decide whether to maintain relationships with revolutionary governments, but Ambassador Troemel in Monrovia has clearly received instructions to maintain cool relationships with revolutionary governments, at least not to begin any new initiatives. They could, in any case, only take the form of aid to developing countries. Liberia receives about DM 25 million annually. The distinct advantage with Liberia, unlike other recipients, was that neither the officials in Bonn's Ministry for Foreign Aid nor the local German ambassador had to worry about how to spend the money sensibly: in contrast to far too many countries, Liberia had proposed healthy projects of its own. Whenever Minister of Planning Neal--who was also shot--came to Germany with suggestions for projects, his counterparts in the ministry and at the Credit Bank for Reconstruction in Frankfurt listened to him attentively out of more than politeness.

The new rulers in Monrovia have adopted Neal's plans, so that nothing stands in the way of German financing and participation. But there are no moves to do anything new, so that the Liberians are uncertain whether and in what form relationships with Bonn will take place. Liberia has no relationships yet with the GDR. Ambassador Troemel still has no instructions to request a meeting with the new head of state Doe, even if he is only a 28-year old NCO.

The hardest blow for Doe has been that he was not admitted to the summit conference of the OAS in Freetown, the capital of neighboring Sierra Leone, in early July. He had already been excluded from two regional summit meetings. Many African heads of state, particularly those in the geographical vicinity of Liberia, are so incensed about the death of Tolbert, that they are setting conditions for Doe that he cannot meet. One of them is that he should release the son of the murdered president, A.B. Tolbert, and allow him to leave the country. In Monrovia it is generally agreed that Doe would be happy to let him go. His fellow conspirators will not allow it, and instead are publicly demanding more "trials" (with a mandatory death sentence), like the one in which Ministers Dennis and Neal, along with almost 30 other prominent members of the establishment around Tolbert, were condemned to death. But Doe has personally promised not only the Americans, but also the presidents of Sierra Leone, Togo, Guinea and several other African nations, that there will henceforth be only "fair" trials, and perhaps none at all, of former politicians. If Doe does not harm the president's son, he can expect the vengeance of his fellow conspirators, if he has the young Tolbert shot, not only he, but Liberia, will be a pariah in Africa.

The United States has been less diffident. It has sent two missions to Monrovia to determine whether the new regime will stay with the foreign policy of its predecessor. The results of the investigation have been positive, for Washington is continuing aid, both military technology and personnel and in the form of food shipments. But the Americans are not entirely certain either. Of the 5,000 to 7,000 Americans who had been living in Liberia before the coup, only 2,000 remain. Family members who had been sent home for safety have not yet returned; what Doe needs most urgently will arrive in September at the earliest and only in relatively small quantities: rice, the population's staple diet.

Because rice was to cost more, Tolbert's government had been in trouble last year; in the final analysis the April coup was a result of the rice disturbance of 1979. If Doe cannot guaranteee rice supplies at the old, low price, a second coup is possible. What it would bring, no one dares to guess; no one can expect anything better. The Liberians need 120,000 tons of rice per month. The Americans have promised a gift of 200,000 tons, sufficient for 6 weeks. What then? Liberia cannot buy anything, because the subsidy money is gone.

This is an eminently suitable moment for an invitation to go to Moscow: the Liberians can see that there is one great power that understands revolutions, even if it consists only in the liquidation of representatives of the deposed regime. If Doe were to go to Moscow, there would be not just the danger but almost the certainty that he would take Liberia as his bridal gift. The Soviet Union would have the best possible uses for it: first, it could deprive the United States of the Voice of America's relay transmitter in Monrovia, which is vitally important for radio coverage in Africa, second, the Americans would lose a base for their "Omega" long-wave communications system for ships and aircraft, and third, Liberia would be an excellent replacement for Guinea-Conakry, which has barred the Soviet Union from using its harbor and airfields for the last 3 years. After a little work, the Liberian harbors of Robertsport, Greenville and Harper could be used by Soviet submarines; Robertsfield airport, which the Americans built during World War II to supply the North African front and have since expanded, is large enough to take the planes with which the Soviet Union was previously flying long-range reconnaissance missions over the mid- and south Atlantic from Conakry. The way is already prepared for Liberia to move closer to Moscow: The Soviet client states of Ethiopia and Angola were the first to recognize the new regime in Monrovia, and Libya was the third. Doe has not yet responded to their courting. But if he concludes that a closer relationship to the Soviet Union is preferable to a poor one with the West, these three states would offer a guarantee that Liberia will not remain isolated in Africa.

READER COMPLAINS ABOUT SANITARY CONDITIONS IN RESTAURANTS

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 31 Aug 80 p 24

[Text] CAFE PIGALLE: NOT EVEN OF 15TH CATEGORY...

I find it very difficult to describe conditions in this establishment which serves the public.

I shall attempt to give some details. First, I shall speak of the employees, and mainly of the waiters.

1. Waiters in this restaurant wear uniforms that are dirty, torn, etc., not because they cannot wash their uniforms, but because they do not wish to serve their customers in clean clothes without that evil smell. It is not body odor, but the way their clothes reek. Even a blind person could perceive at a distance that these clothes have not been washed in months!

2. Let's speak of the premises: I shall only describe what anyone can observe.

When one comes into the restaurant, one is welcomed by a nauseating odor.

I cannot specify if this establishment belongs to the first, second, third or fifteenth category. The floor, the tables, the chairs, the coffee and hot water machines, the windows, the counters, the bathrooms, the refrigerators, all exude a terrible smell. There is not an inkling of cleanliness.

When one comes in to order something, one loses one's appetite right away, since the entire area has such an evil odor! And as for the smell wafting in from the kitchen... One should actually wear a mask.

3. How can the premises be clean if the very workers are afraid to wash their own clothes? The chairs have lost their coverings long ago and no one thinks of having them re-upholstered. The entire place is full of cockroaches, and cats urinate on tables and chairs.

I don't even know how many cats are running around. If I am not mistaken, the cloths used to clean the tables come from a certain towel formerly used to clean the bathroom floors.

And as for the service... One can come in at 1930 hours, and will be served only 25 minutes later, if at all. Moreover, tea is served cold. Cups were washed the day before, so there is no need to do it again. Conditions at the Pigalle are bad enough, and they are getting worse, since there is no control. This situation does not only exist at the Pigalle, but in most restaurants around the country.

SINKING OF NAVY SPEEDBOAT IN MAPUTO BAY REPORTED

Portuguese, Soviet Pilots Aboard

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Aug 80 p 3

[Excerpts] An ocean-going pilot speedboat disappeared during the night of last Wednesday near Pilot Bar, in the Bay of Maputo. The causes of its loss are not known as of now and it is feared that the boat sank in that part of the bay.

Search operations have been carried out to locate the boat since the day following the incident, involving the use of ships, small aircraft, and helicopters. It was learned on the other hand that a storm had been reported shortly before the point at which the boat ceased to communicate both with Pilot Bar and with the naval radio communications center in Maputo.

The incident was recorded around 1900 of that day when the above-mentioned boat returned to the port of Maputo, coming from Pilot Bar, where it had gone on an assignment, carrying four Mozambican sailors on board, plus two pilots, the latter being of Soviet and Portuguese nationality.

The boat, which was part of a small flotilla of two picket boats and two tugboats, recently purchased in Holland by the government, had left Pilot Bar early during the night of Wednesday because its crew had been called upon to come to the aid of the Mozambican vessel "Chai" which had one meter of water in its hold.

The "Chai" is a pilot vessel which had dropped anchor on the bar in the Bay of Maputo and whose job it was to receive foreign vessels who wanted to call on the port of the country's capital. It is assumed that the picket boat disappeared on its return trip and that the incident happened near Vasconcelos e Sa buoy and buoy number 3 at the entrance to the channel.

Search and Rescue Operations Continue Throughout Yesterday

The search operations to locate the missing boat, which were started the day after its disappearance, continued yesterday, but no trace has been found which might make it possible to determine the causes of the boat's disappearance.

Search Effort Continues

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 15 Aug 80 p 2

[Excerpts] The fate of the pilot boat which disappeared last week on the bar in the Bay of Maputo is still unknown in spite of the intensive search operations which have been carried out since the beginning by maritime authorities and by Mozambican civil aircraft.

Information supplied by the maritime pilot services indicates that several vessels, including the tugboat "Messalo" and the only remaining picket boat, yesterday participated in search operations without discovering any trace that might make it possible to determine the causes of the boat's disappearance.

Foreign Assistance Sought

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 23 Aug 80 p 3

[Excerpts] Professional divers coming from abroad will arrive in Maputo early next week to participate in what is to be considered the last search operations to locate the pilot boat which has been missing for 3 weeks from the area of the bar in the Bay of the nation's capital and which has not yet been found as of yesterday.

This information was supplied by a spokesman at the National Maritime and River Transportation Directorate. The source also indicated that the divers were hired by Mozambican maritime authorities since local technical resources employed so far in the search operations did not reveal any traces that might make it possible to determine the fate of the stricken boat.

NATION SAID TO BE MOVING TOWARD END OF MILITARY RULE

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 p 1654

[Article by Philip Modiano]

[Text]

THE CHANGE-OVER from military to civilian rule in Nigeria and Ghana naturally received considerably greater publicity in the English-speaking press than the changes in the Francophone African countries. Yet in the past year Benin, Togo and the Upper Volta have all made significant moves away from their purely military regimes, (also in the Ivory Coast there has been an important change in the more democratic selection of Assembly candidates) and, perhaps least recognised of all, in Niger an interesting process has begun which should eventually lead to the end of the, admittedly benevolent, military dictatorship there.

The changes in Benin described in greater detail in West Africa, 26 May) are as in Togo not at all as thorough-going as in Ghana or Nigeria. In both countries the military rulers (Kerekou in Benin and Eyadema in Togo) remain as President. While in Benin the cabinet changes could well be significant, in Togo the highly personalised rule of Eyadema is likely to continue unaltered. However, in Upper Volta. . . .

While all this was going on to his south President Kountché has avoided forcing any dramatic changes on to an ill-prepared country and has instead set up a National Commission which has two years in which to come up with a new plan for organising participation in the country.

The commission is chaired by Squadron Commander Boulama, the Minister for Youth, Sport and Culture and held its first meeting in April. The President addressed this inaugural meeting and spelled out that he expected not a theoretical report but a detailed practical plan to be implemented over the following three years from 1982 to 1985. In particular he stressed that Niger was not capitalist, socialist or anything else — but needed its own system.

In other speeches the President has made it known that he envisages a "Development Society" with the basic organisation cells in each village, nomadic group or urban district across the entire country, and then a hierarchy of councils in the regions up to a national one (assembly?).

One of the interesting features of the whole project is the way that socio-political structure is meant to be firmly linked to the production and economic development activity. The nature of such links will not be clear until the Commission reports, but the Commission is also charged with recommending a plan for co-operatives at the village level to promote agricultural development. Some CFA 25bn. of investment has been allocated in the Five Year Plan for the costs of establishing the new administrative system (see West Africa, 26 April 1980).

The development of the co-operatives is one of the principal planks of the Governments agricultural programme — not so much for actual production as for buying and distributing the inputs of improved seed and fertilizer.

Though Niger is famous for its mineral resources, especially uranium (see West Africa, 21 January 1980), agriculture is still nearly 50 per cent of GDP, and the livelihood for the vast majority of the population. It was the poor handling of the Sahel drought crisis in 1974 that led to President Kountché's military coup. Shortly after the inauguration of the National Commission to guide the country away from military rule the President felt able to release the two most important old politicians in the country — M. Hamani Diori, the man Kountché overthrew, and M. Djibo Bakary the old opposition leader of the Sawaba who was accused of plotting a coup in 1975.

If these are very positive demonstrations of the stability and security of Kountché's regime, it is not coincidental that Niger is on the verge of becoming self-sufficient in food for the first time since before the Sahel drought. This is certainly remarkable, but it does not mean that all is progressing smoothly in agriculture. Production of the basic crops, millet and sorghum is only back to what it was. But the groundnut and cotton crops, Niger's two main cash crops have both collapsed so that negligible amounts are being marketed. Also the composition of the herds of livestock appear to have altered. The numbers of cattle were halved during the Sahel drought while those of goats only declined a little. Cattle are only now recovering to near their previous levels while goats are well ahead. This trend may seriously increase the desertification of marginal grazing areas unless it is checked.

During the five year plan 1979-83 the rural sector is to receive nearly one-third of public investment (CFA fr 116bn. out of CFA 384bn.), of which agriculture would get 64bn. It would therefore seem that the Government is convinced of the importance of this sector and also realises that the problems that have been experienced so far, especially poor marketing and delays in supplies, will not be solved by money alone. In any case there is an acute shortage of trained personnel in this and all sectors of the economy. So by establishing the National Commission the President appears to have embarked upon an ambitious plan both to resolve the constitutional limbo of the country with a new form of popular participation, and to try to generate the motivation towards self-help that may lead to significant improvements in the most important sector of the economy.

These encouraging features of Niger's rulers will not be tarnished and the intentions not deflected. It is hoped by the news that some of the projects in the Five Year Plan will have to be cut because of the fall in world uranium prices. It is out of the proceeds of its uranium production that Niger will finance the large proportion of its development projects.

TRADE WITHIN ECOWAS--Following the recent summit, ECOWAS countries are liberalising trade between members, starting with elimination of custom duties on all unprocessed goods originating from the sub-region by May 28, 1981, to be followed by the elimination of duties on industrial goods produced within the community. With the free movement of goods likely before the end of the 1980s. Total trade between Nigeria and other ECOWAS countries declined by 4.8 per cent to N195.1m. in 1978, the latest year for which full figures are available. This was due entirely to the fall in Nigerian exports to ECOWAS states from N170.3m. to N159.9m. Nigerian imports edged up from N34.7m. to N35.2m. Ivory Coast and Senegal were the major sources of Nigeria's ECOWAS imports while Ghana and Ivory Coast accounted for some two-thirds of Nigeria's ECOWAS-bound exports which consisted mainly of crude petroleum.

MORE STATES CALLED FOR--Bendel--The former chairman of the National Party of Nigeria (NPN), Chief Anthony Enahoro, has called for the creation of five more states in Nigeria. Speaking on Oyo Radio, Chief Enahoro said that the issue of creating more states was so grave that it should be given top priority. "The new states must be created," he said, "and the sooner this is done, the sooner the people of the country will settle down." [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 p 1736]

NNPC SALARY INCREASES--The Nigerian National Petroleum Corporation has been given a 35-day ultimatum to approve a claim for 10 and 15 per cent salary-increase awards to its employees. The NNPC has also had a demand to pay the wages alongside September salaries and arrears money stretching back to last April. In the event of its failure to meet these demands, "the NNPC management should be prepared to accept the responsibility of the desirable consequence after the expiration of the ultimatum," said the National Secretary of the NNPC branch of the National Union of Petroleum and Natural Gas Workers, Mr. C. O. Obasi. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 8 Sep 80 p 1736]

POLICE REORGANIZATION--The police force is to be reorganised. To ensure an adequate maintenance of public order in the country, the programme is to include new conditions of service and increase in staff training. Speaking at the closing ceremony of a police sports festival in Calabar, Cross River State, the Minister of Police Affairs, Mr. E. C. Osammor, reiterated the determination of the present administration of to build a virile, reliable and contented police force that would do Nigeria proud. OFFICIAL INTERVIEWED ON CONDITIONS IN FISHING SECTOR

Havana MAR Y PESCA in Spanish Jul 80 pp 12-13

[Interview with Carlos B. Gomes, minister of industry, commerce and fishing of Sao Principe, by Luis Ubeda, in Havana; date not given]

[Excerpt] Taking advantage of the visit to our country by Carlos B. Gomes, minister of industry, commerce and fishing of Sao Tome and Principe, MAR Y PESCA prepared a list of six questions for the distinguished visitor to become informed about the present and future policy to be followed by the fishing sector of that country....

MAR Y PESCA: We are interested in knowing about your country's situation in the fishing sector during colonialism....

Gomes: Only one adjective can describe it: Chaotic. It is enough to know that we were never able to determine the number of fishing boats in existence or the number of fishermen manning them, much less the number of tons caught in a year. We also lacked general statistical data concerning one or another fishing region. However a few studies conducted after independence show that there had been about 1,500 fishermen and a very similar number of boats, all of wood and with drafts between 4 and 7 meters, which engaged in fishing using native methods.

MAR Y PESCA: What is the present fishing situation in Sao Tome and Principe?

Gomes: The colonial structure still persists. We have been able to remedy the lack of resources we encountered only in some respects. However, there are qualitative advances with respect to the boats. For example, our government bought a versatile freezer-trawler with a draft of 44 meters and a hold capacity of 270-280 tons, which was adaptable for use with both surface nets and bottom nets, as for shrimp drag fishing. This boat is named "30 de Septiembre" in memory of the date the country's lands and other economic resources were nationalized. In a related connection, the Cuban state gave us several iron-cement boats which catch fish up to 150 miles from shore; and we have been progressively equipping our best native canoes with outboard motors. Finally, the number of fishing boats is being maintained more or less at the level I have already mentioned.

MAR Y PESCA: What plans are being made by your ministry with respect to the development of fishing?

Gomes: In the first place, we have taken emergency measures to resolve two of the principal problems we are facing: The conservation of fish and their rational distribution. In this regard, our colonial heritage is also negative, including an individualistic attitude on the part of the fishermen. But, so long as sea products are the nation's principal food and protein source, it is urgent that we establish the conditions necessary for the conservation and distribution of these vital products to all sectors of the population.

What is more, our government is also attempting to develop the fishing sector to establish a source of foreign exchange. In short we could say that in one sense our plans are directed toward the enrichment of the domestic economy through the future establishment of fishing cooperatives and, in another sense, toward the export of several quality species to help the country's development program.

MAR Y PESCA: Are you doing any work to determine the fishing potential of your territorial waters?

Gomes: Yes. We have several studies which give us an approximation of the potential of the Gulf of Guinea. Also, Soviet specialists are conducting a partial study along these lines; and we are now in contact with them to coordinate a more detailed study.

It is of vital importance to us to have this information; without it, we cannot prepare future development plans.

MAR Y PESCA: What has been the nature of aid from other countries for the fishing development of Sao Tome and Principe?

Gomes: We really cannot speak of effective aid so long as we are not informed about our fishing possibilities. To ask for aid we must in the first place ask for it on objective and clear bases. However, during our trip to Cuba, we presented a fishing project to the Ministry of the Fishing Industry which lists some sectors in which you can help us. For example, eight Sao Tome and Principe youths are now studying in the Andres Bonzalez Lines Fishing Institute; and during our visit we have requested additional aid of this kind since we need to form technical cadres.

MAR Y PESCA: We should now like to know your impression of Cuba's achievements in the sector of the fishing industry....

Gomes: Look, the Cuban fishing sector is the materialization of a people in revolution. It is a living example of what a socialist country can do when it attempts to develop a specific economic sector. During this visit, I have been able to observe how, despite your having started practically from the zero point in the fishing sector, you have over the years become a fishing power here in Latin America and, in my opinion, of a large group of underdeveloped countries. We started from nothing; and, Cuba's example, its visible development and the fraternal aid it offers to countries which, like our own, need it, encourages us on the difficult road which lies before us and, fundamentally, shows us that through serious and purposeful effort anything can be achieved.

We do not wish to allow this opportunity to pass without congratulating all the workers of the Cuban fishing industry and its leaders for the example of this marvelous reality they have constructed and also for the example which, in short, all of them represent.

REASONS FOR WAGE DEDUCTIONS SET FORTH

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 23-24 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Cherif Elvalide Seye: "National Efforts"]

[Text] For the first time in Senegal a tax of this importance will be placed this year on worker pay. Turning over six days' wages to come to the aid of the rural areas will give the reader a measure of the gravity of our difficulties and the situation in our rural areas. The figures speak for themselves. This year, food requirements have been estimated at 118,000 tons, whereas the international community, which was asked for help in this connection, so far supplied us only with 30,000 tons. For the current harvest, the food shortage may be as much as 150,000 tons. It will be even bigger if this harvest estimate turns out to be too optimistic.

Under these conditions, a national solidarity effort was absolutely necessary. After all, is this solidarity not already manifested each month, for the workers who proceed to a more horizontal distribution of their income, in order to come to the aid of their relatives in the rural areas?

The support of the workers for this solidarity effort however is not a blank check, as was demonstrated already by the debates in the National Assembly. The workers intend to be assured that the funds thus collected will indeed benefit the stricken population groups. The assurance given by the minister of finances--to the effect that everything will be turned over to a special account in the public treasury, called the Rural Aid Fund, as well as the institution of a fund management commission in which the workers will be represented by the labor unions--should certainly be effective in this case. A balance sheet could be prepared at the end of the collection and distribution transactions. On this latter point, the census errors should be avoided.

Buying foodstuffs is not the whole story. They also have to reach those who need them. It is not admissible for foodstuff distribution to be subjected to the slightest irregularity. But that is what happened this year. There were many trouble spots. The census of the number of victims did not always tally with reality and distribution was harmed by its slow pace; shortages were detected in the quotas and a large percentage of "foreign bodies" (especially sand) in the sacks of food had to be replaced with a portion of millet.

Those responsible for these irregularities must not benefit from any indulgences because it is criminal to try to get rich at the expense of the peasants who are on the brink of famine. The restoration of confidence on the part of one group and the more responsible behavior on the part of other individuals will in effect depend on the exemplary nature of penalties.

BILL AUTHORIZES WAGE DEDUCTIONS BENEFITING RURAL AREAS

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 23-24 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Sidy Gaye: "Six Daily Wage Payments Will Be Withheld--Special Solidarity Tax"]

[Excerpts] The bills involving a special solidarity tax for the benefit of the rural areas, the establishment of an export subsidy system, and the use of weapons by officers of the Department of Water and Forests and National Parks were the major topics taken up by members of parliament who attended yesterday's afternoon session.

The first bill establishes a special solidarity tax to the benefit of the rural areas. One working day's pay will be withheld for 6 months from the wages of each Senegalese; the tax will be taken at the source and will be turned over to a Rural Aid Fund especially created for this purpose in a separate treasury account. The tax, which will be in effect from September 1980 until February 1981, inclusive, will also be placed on persons not drawing wages, based on a contribution established at 6/365 of 1979 income.

This effort is also required of emigrants working in France and elsewhere. Contracts are currently in progress to determine the ways in which they will participate.

According to the minister of economy and finances, this fund will serve to purchase foodstuffs which will then be distributed to the rural population groups in stricken areas.

In response to several deputies, who were worried about the efficient use of the money thus collected, Mr Seck--who estimates the figure at close to F 3.5 billion--did not fail to give assurances and even underscored the fact that the workers will be involved in the effective control over the utilization of this sum of money which will soon be collected.

A control commission, within which the workers will be represented by the CNTS [National Confederation of Senegalese Workers], the union considered most representative, will shortly be set up and will work in close cooperation with the General Food Aid Commissariat which is charged with purchasing and distributing foodstuffs.

AHMED NIASSE CONSIDERED TO BE IN BAD SITUATION

Dakar LE POLITICIEN in French Aug 80 p 7

[Article by K.F.: "Khomeyni Niasse's First Defeat"]

[Text] A year ago, when we asked a great sage of Sine-Saloum what he thought about the statements of Ahmed Niasse, alias Khomeyni II, the ambitious little marabout who gave a 90-day ultimatum to Leo to abandon power, he answered: "When a man isn't afraid of lying, he can say anything he wants."

Since then, more than 330 days have gone by and nothing has happened. At least, nothing promised by our national Khomeyni. Something quite different did happen. As we had predicted, Ahmed Niasse could only hide with the great Libyan leader, his Excellency Qadhdhafi, first [and] foremost disturber of the African political scene (especially Sahelian) and future emperor of federated Islamic republics (with the exception of Iran). Today, history has vindicated us by bringing to light the crazy ambitions of the sole dreamer of an Islamic Republic in Senegal.

Only Qadhdhafi is not a fellow who is easily fooled: When you squander his petro-dollars you had better prove to him that it was deserved. Amin Dada who had told Qadhdhafi that he had troups somewhere, knows this well. Because, after having the benefit of a golden asylum, very substantial financial aid and a good supply of weapons without having done anything, first he found himself almost in prison (under house arrest), before being done for without beating around the bush. That is, certainly, what our national Ayatollah wanted to avoid in trying to recruit 24 men, presumably Senegalese from Gabon, in order to prove to his Libyan host that he had at his disposal enough men who were submissive and loyal to him. But, if it is known that he had mentioned about 300,000 "jihad" soldiers at his disposal, it may be said that his counting was way off. [He had] only 24 guys who roamed about in Gabon; and, for sure, if he had come to Senegal he wouldn't have recruited anyone.

Unfortunately for the future president of the (Utopian) Islamic Republic of Senegal and, fortunately for us, not only would the number of fictitious soldiers not have frightened in the least Senegalese patriots, but, once more, Niasse came up against some hardheads who promptly discovered his game and who had the courageous idea of coming up with an escape plan that finally succeeded.

So now, as you no doubt have learned, 14 of the 17 Senegalese who had been recruited by Ahmed Niasse on the promise of work in Libya and who took refuge at the Mauritanian Embassy in Libya after Senegal and Libya cut diplomatic relations, have succeeded in coming back to their motherland, on 21 July, after many adventures. But (nak), [unidentified African term], despite the very clear presentation of events and (some) explanations of the survivors, certain observers remain skeptical about the veracity of the survivors' account. In fact, some ask themselves, once again, how can one escape from a training camp where, logically, surveillance must be more than close.

Maybe that braggart Qadhdhafi was afraid after Papa Leo's serious warning, during the last OAU summit in Freetown, which began in July and has found it wiser to close his eyes [and] let the Senegalese flee quietly. Or, merely, he has finally discovered that his protege is a little practical joker who is not worth getting in trouble with a country whose government enjoys a large international audience. In that case, the brave Kaolack Ayatollah, greatly risks finding himself in a bad spot.

GOVERNMENT TO INCREASE AID TO RURAL AREAS

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 2-3 Aug 80 p 3

[Article: "Increased Aid to Rural Areas"]

[Text] Yesterday morning the prime minister presided in the conference room of the prime minister's office, over a restricted interministerial council meeting on the food and livestock situations.

All of the regional governors, many high officials and directors of departments, participated in the council's deliberations, as well as:

the minister of state for equipment,
the minister of state for finance and the economy,
the minister of plan and cooperation,
the minister of rural development,
the minister of commerce,
the minister of the civil service, employment and labor.

As chairman, the minister of rural development, in an important communication, stressed in turn the 1980 winter fodder situation, already characterized by a considerable delay in rainfall; the free distribution of food products for the needy population throughout the entire national territory; foreign aid already received, as well as that promised and expected to arrive in the next few months; and, the worrisome problem of livestock feeding.

At the closing of the minister of rural development's remarks, the prime minister called upon each regional governor present to speak in succession.

The latter took stock of the situation in [each] of their regions in a detailed manner.

The governors' reports were followed by a long discussion at the conclusion of which the prime minister decided on important measures intended to bring increased government aid to the rural population.

He stated that the government will not spare any effort in the realm of its possibilities to come to the aid of the stricken population and our seriously threatened livestock.

The prime minister then particularly stressed the necessity for effective national solidarity in these difficult times.

He also made it a point to thank the friendly foreign nations and international organizations which have generously decided to bring aid to our country.

The prime minister, lastly, organized a restricted and permanent task force in charge of executing the important measures which he decided on.

NETHERLANDS GOVERNMENT DONATES WHEAT TO NATION

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 2-3 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] Yeserday morning, 3,400 tons of wheat valued at 200 million CFA francs was offered to our country by the Government of the Netherlands. This ceremony was held in the warehouses of the Socopao [expansion unknown], in the presence of the charge d'affaires of the Netherlands to Senegal, W. Joris Witkam and of the commissioner of food aid, Souleymane Ndiaye. This donation will allow [us] to buy millet, which will be distributed without charge to the disaster areas and will alleviate the painful experiences of the Senegalese inhabitants.

In his speech, W. Joris Witkam said that his country, being aware of the serious difficulties which Senegal is experiencing also, being aware of the disquieting of its populations, tried through consecutive years of drought, has decided to aid the Government of Senegal, to make up a portion of its food deficit. To this end the charge d'affaires added that the people of the Netherlands are sympathetic to the distress of the populations of the Sahelian regions most particularly affected: "My country has the pleasure of handing over this contribution to the Senegalese authorities; or 3,400 tons of wheat valued at 200 million CFA francs."

The commissioner for food aid, Souleymane Ndiaye made it a point to call to mind here above and beyond the concrete aspect of this cooperation between the Netherlands and Senegal so much increased: "Our trade which dates back thousands of years and, especially our common ideals of openness and greatness of soul, characteristic of coastal people."

Another fact which deserves to be stressed, according to Mr Ndiaye, is that the food aid of the Netherlands to Senegal never had any strings attached. A rare occurrence in our days, when food, as a weapon, is becoming increasingly a reality.

EFFECTS OF DROUGHT ON CATTLE DESCRIBED

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 29 Aug 80 p 11

[Article by Ibrahima Fall: "When Hunger Strikes Down Cattle"]

[Text] It is a serious situation. I would cause a specialist in death to lose his taste for pestilence. Merciless fields are being transformed into unspeakably foul cemeteries of oxen, horses and small cattle. Stockbreeders are wandering about in a state of desolation, all hope gone. The herd, an element of social promotion and respect by other members of the community, is becoming "fluid." Like butter in the sun, it is melting. Relentlessly. The cattle are surely experiencing the pangs of chronic famine. Stunted trees are becoming withered. Aerial pasturage no longer covers the vital needs. Death is taking over. People are turning to God, Architect of the world. Powerless to act, they are watching their herds vanish. Decaying carcasses are thriving. It is the discordant sound of death. Dark days have arrived and no one is enthusiastic about what tomorrow will bring.

In the entire Senegalese countryside the spectacle is the same: senseless and revolting. In all its stupidity death is covering yesterday's source of pride with its wings; the herd is becoming a burden. Animals are dying not as victims of a devastating epidemic but simply struck down by hunger. To alleviate the situation, cattle feed has been sent almost everywhere in the country, but is has proved to be insufficient. In addition, the impact of this nutritional effort has been limited in certain areas by a shameless illicit traffic.

In Linguere Department 2,400 tons of cattle feed have been allocated at a selling price of 10 francs per kg, enough to cover handling costs. The feed consists of peanut cakes, compressed foods and wheat bran. The feed supply is not commensurate with the needs. For example, in the commune of Nioro in Nioro Department 20 tons were allocated to the subprefecture of Paoscoto out of 50 tons requested; but the delivery ended up with 17 tons. The same quantity was allocated to the subprefecture of Medina-Sabakh where the request was for 40 tons.

Since the grass was slow in growing due to a late winter, the supply of cattle feed was quickly sold. Stockpiling was perceived everywhere. In view of the "nutritional vacuum," breeders resorted to various expedients to save part of their cattle. Thus, in Kaffrine Department, to "trick the cattle's hunger," breeders gave them straw, shrubbery and even "nger." With the prevailing famine, some individuals hit upon a veritable commercial vocation. They gathered abandoned straw, considered unprofitable at the time (Bope type), put it in bags and sold it at 200 francs per bag. The bags were exposed to the sun for a long time without being sold. It was only in desperation that breeders pounced upon this unworthy "feed," when famine began inexorably to strike down their cattle.

Cattle feed made available by the government has given rise to a sizable lucrative traffic. A number of businessmen have literally purchased most of the allocation of certain areas and have stocked it for subsequent unrestrained speculation on the black market. For example, a 70 kg bag, delivered at a cost of 700 francs, was resold at more than 1,500 francs. However, in principle, the feed was sold only to breeders showing their cattle's immunization card. Gossas breeders were of the opinion that such situations could be avoided if the entire allocation were entrusted to breeder cooperatives which would assure equitable distribution.

Watering the herd has also given rise to enormous problems. The Gossas commune is typical of the difficulties with which stock raisers have been confronted. According to Gossas breeders, before the first heavy showers the mayor's office demanded a daily payment of 5 francs per beef animal for watering. In the case of horses, breeders had to pay 10 francs per head. The same problems arose for humans. A barrel of water for home consumption was sold at 50 francs each. These difficulties disappeared with the first rainfall.

In view of the extent of the cemeteries of cattle and sheep, strict prophylactic measures must be taken to avoid the danger of an epidemic and prevent diseases which could result from the runoff of rainwater which, after crossing fields strewn with decaying carcasses, might flow into the wells. It would therefore be fitting for the proper services to aid the stockbreeders in burying the emaciated or decomposed carcasses of the animals which are victims of the famine.

ONCAD'S DISSOLUTION DESCRIBED AS 'JUST MEASURE'

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 25 Aug 80 p 1

/Article by Sammy L. Chaupin: "Lost Confidence"/

/Text/ Despite an alleviation of its structures, giant ONCAD /National Office of Cooperation and Assistance for Development/ could not be saved. It was ill, indeed too ill to await the convalescence of a simple reform.

Founded 14 years ago on the ashes of other organizations whose spirit and methods it had unfortunately inherited, this office had long ago lost the confidence of those it was supposed to serve: the peasants. It had two functions (direct and educate), the one of an economic nature, the other educational. The first, being of a financial nature, has always unfortunately stifled the second. In fact, there has never been true cooperative education, the administration refusing to prepare for its gradual termination and not allowing the peasants to acquire the knowledge which would enable them to unravel the customary procedures, errors and abuses inherent in the office's operational rules.

Thus, many aspects of ONCAD's intervention totally escaped the cooperative group. This was the case with the definition of the quality of seeds, the program of property transfer and the preservation of seeds but also with indebtedness and the destination of surpluses derived through recoupment.

With regard to the agricultural program, the main objective was the turnover of the production of manufacturers. There was no concern for possible deviations. The end result of such a course of action is particularly heavy indebtedness, contested by the peasants for its fraudulent maneuvers of which they have always been the powerless witnesses and victims. Embezzlement, waste, slow periods and other administrative weaknesses have increased their anger and produced phenomenal waste which is all the more serious in that the cooperative unions, identifying their own interests with those of ONCAD, have facilitated divorce with the true members of the cooperatives.

Ill-informed and not benefiting from any real power of decision or control but fortified with great experience, the peasant, while continuing to suffer, took advantage of every opportunity offered to show his dissatisfaction and distrust by refusing to pay his debts.

ONCAD's dissolution is therefore a just measure. By following it up with the establishment of SONAR [expansion unknown], the government is expressing its will to pursue its agricultural policy. Hence, a Senegalese solution has been found to a Senegalese problem of which a liability of 12 billion francs is not the only indication.

This decision is finally liberating the peasant. Witness the fact that cooperatives, the principal manifestation of this option, will continue to exist. Restructured, they will sell directly to the country's oil works which will be repurchased by the state. It is to be hoped that through reforms and reorganization the peasant will finally be able to benefit fully from the fruits of his labor. That should be the objective of the change.

BRIEFS

FRENCH BUDGETARY AID--France and Senegal yesterday signed an agreement for budgetary aid, amounting to 1.410 billion CFA francs. This pact is part of the agreements negotiated in Paris by Prime Minister Abdou Diouf, during his recent visit to France. Its objective is to increase the interest of a loan of almost 4,000 CFA francs from the Central Fund for Economic Cooperation, granted for 15 years with amortization deferred for 5 years. The central fund loan is part of the French aid package negotiated with a view to the revival of our economy, hit by the drought, imported inflation and steep increase in oil prices. NEW KRIO-ENGLISH DICTIONARY PUBLISHED

London WEST AFRICA in English 1 Sep 80 pp 1658-1659, 1682

[Article by D.W.]

[Text]

A Krio-English Dictionary compiled by Clifford N. Fyle and Eldred D. Jones (Oxford University Press - Sierra Leone University Press; £20)

IN A PATRONISING manner, the writer of the headline for a most complimentary review of this pioneering work — and enthusiastic evaluation of its subject — by the distinguished novelist and philologist, Anthony Burgess, in the London Observer, decided on "Freetown pidgin pie". Yet one of the compilers' main points, and one underlined in the review, is that Krio is not some kind of corrupted English but "a language in its own right". Their dictionary is the best evidence yet for this claim.

The standard Languages of West Africa by Westerman and Bryan, published in 1952, does not mention Krio. But it is now the mother tongue of perhaps 50,000 Sierra Leoneans and is so widely used and understood in their country as to justify the dictionary's description of it as a "national lingua franca". The first poetry in Krio appeared as early as 1888, the work of Miss Gladys Casely-Hayford, who also wrote Krio children's plays. But apart from the more recent work of the late Thomas Decker — for whom this dictionary, the first of its kind, would have been a delight — and a certain number of booklets and articles, the language has not developed as a literary medium. In education there is still a prejudice against its use on the ground that it might harm the teaching of English.

Krio is also spoken in Banjul, and is closely related to "Creole" speech in Cameroon and Nigeria, and more distantly related to other Creoles — in Surinam even, and in an area stretching from Florida to South Carolina. It also helps its speakers to understand "pidgin" over a much wider area.

The compilers of this dictionary, however — Professor Eldred Jones, Principal of Fourah Bay and former Professor of English there, and Dr. Clifford N. Fyle, the present Professor of English (assisted by numerous academics and many informants) — confine it to the language now used in the Western Area, or the former Colony, of Sierra Leone, by people between the ages of 30 and 60. Yet even the variations are significant. For example "Aku Krio", or "Muslim Krio", can be identified as the speech of residents of Freetown East who had and have strong ties with the Muslim Yoruba of Nigeria.

Eldred Jones' own "collection", started some 15 years ago, is the dictionary's starting point. He published his first article on Krio almost 25 years ago, but more recently he has had little time to develop his collection, and the dictionary could not have been completed but for the devoted work of Professor Fyle.

Although much of the introduction to the work is taken up with technical linguistic discussion — the result of Professor Fyle's careful research — the layman can learn from it not only something of the history of Krio and of the way in which the languages called Creoles are formed, but also how what Eldred Jones has called its "syntactical distance" from English can be shown. If its vocabulary is largely derived from English, Krio has inherited structures and other features from West African languages, and has logical rules for the spelling of the English words it borrows. Its idioms, too, and the images its speakers use have a West African spirit. Krio proverbs, which are legion, while they can usually be "translated" easily into corresponding English ones, have close affinity with those of other West African languages. And Eldred Jones has pointed out that yams are important in Krio proverbs, although Sierra Leone is not a yam-growing country ("if Yu yams wet, Koba am"; if your yam is white — so of good quality — cover it up; or "don't show off").

Perhaps four-fifths of the basic Krio vocabulary, Professor Jones has estimated, and the dictionary's introduction confirms, is derived from English. Yoruba is the next most important contributor. Other African languages, including Hausa and Twi, and increasingly Sierra Leone's own Mende and Temne, as well as Jamaican Creole, also contribute. Non-English European languages, in spite of a widespread belief to the contrary, contribute little. Even "boku", generally thought to come from "beaucoup", might come from Yoruba, Twi or Ga. The influx of new words, the compilers say, had by 1975 "slowed down" to the point where a full dictionary was appropriate and a Krio orthography might be established.

Krio, however, preserves some English words which have gone out of use in their native land. Among meanings the dictionary lists for "komishon" is "loin-cloth"; this comes from, although the dictionary does not refer to it, the 18th-century use of "commission" for a shirt. The dictionary defines "bambot" as "prostitute-like". But it comes from the old English "bum-boat", which describes small boats which went out to ocean-going ships riding at anchor, bringing fresh provisions, and, no doubt, women.

Many English words and phrases also undergo great changes when used as Krio, which makes them more piquant and expressive. "Big yai", for example ("big eyes"), means to be greedy. "Emptibak" (a person's back with nothing on it) means somebody without a university degree and so with no hood to hang on his back. It is hard to believe that "shudinkes" means "should in case" or "supposing that" — but that's what the dictionary tells us. A whole page is devoted to phrases using the expressive word "lef" or "leave": "lef bodi", for example, means to abandon concern about one's looks etc. Krio also uses compound words effectively: "tu-sai-pen-nef", or "two-sided pen-knife" means somebody with a foot in both camps.

Krio is rich in expressions of contempt and abuse. For example "ontoum" means a heathenish or illiterate person, and comes from Psalm 95; ". . . unto whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest" (church services often use Krio, as do politicians).

Yoruba and other African words undergo little change of meaning in Krio.

"Agbada", the Yoruba for "gown", is unchanged, as is "akara", Yoruba for a "beancake". "Gbo" means "to become old" in both languages, and "abule" is a "village dwelling" in both. "Gbajumo", however, Yoruba for "person of repute", in Krio, can mean "a heavily-built woman".

It is in the dictionary itself, in the section defining the word Krio, that the compilers most clearly reject the idea that the language is just another "Creole" or version of English. They incline to the view of F. S. F. Oburnokun Nicol that Krio comes from the Yoruba word "akiriyo", which described a Krio custom — "those who go about paying visits after a church service" (another version of this, not mentioned in the dictionary, was given to Professor Michael Banton by "Pa" Mahdi, himself an Aku, who said that Krio came from "akirio", a Yoruba word which he translated as "scrounger").

Laymen who wish to know more of the language as opposed to its vocabulary should study Eldred Jones' contribution about it in The English Language in West Africa (1971) edited by John Spencer. But there Professor Jones refers to it as "English-based", while the dictionary's introduction prefers "English-oriented".

Expensive though the dictionary inevitably is already, one would have liked it to be even fuller. Does "chop", for example, in Krio refer only to food or can it also mean "to steal" as it does in Nigeria? Is "lantan" only a "lantern" or, as in Banjul, does it also refer to those magnificent "ships" cut out of paper and paraded through the streets with lamps inside them? Was "ku" used for "coup" even before the army took power in Sierra Leone in 1967 (it is also, naturally, the sound used for calling chickens)? Has independence ended the use of "govna-get" (the impressive gates leading to the former Governor's residence, now used by the President) to denote the gaps left in children's mouths when they lose their milk teeth? Is Sierra Leone society so egalitarian that although Krio has "klas distinkshon" the dictionary assigns to "klas" itself only meanings connected with school and church? And, although all archaisms, like this one, are listed as such in the dictionary, when did ladies stop wearing "kiskidi-en-Pompado", the elaborate dress named after the Marquise de Pompadour, Louis XV's mistress?

On one point only does this reviewer think he has something to offer the compilers. They list "Ponsfod" ("Pons-ford") as a man's name but can give it no origin. It is in fact Australian, the name of a famous batsman given to one of his sons (Bradman was another) by the late Judge, Sir Ernest Beoku-Betts, an enthusiastic sportsman who particularly admired Australian cricket.

The bibliography reminds us of the existence of the Dictionary of Jamaican English whose compilers clearly did not see Jamaican Creole as a distinct language. That work, however, has only 15,000 entries against 30,000 in the present one. An appendix gives a list of Krio personal names, first with their usual spellings and then as thay appear in the dictionary ("Coleridge" and "Kolrij").

BOTHA ADDRESSES OFS NATIONAL PARTY CONGRESS

Normalizing Race Relations

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Sep 80 p 7

[Text]

BLOEMFONTEIN. — The time had come for the normalisation of race relations in South Africa, the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, said yesterday.

"All I ask is that we must begin moving — not only the Whites, but also the Blacks, Coloureds and Asians — to normalise relations while we remain ourselves," he told the Free State National Party congress in Bloemfontein.

Replying to delegates' questions concerning increasing social integration, the Prime Minister said he appreciated the open discussion.

"I object only when people keep quiet when these matters are discussed, or when they agree, and then later backbite me when I begin to move."

He said he had gone out of his way in the past two years to talk to leaders of other population groups and had been attacked from the Left, whose adherents charged he was not doing enough, and from the Right, whose proponents claimed he was doing too much.

"Neither of these extremes is correct. There are a number of minority groups in South Africa and any government has to take these into account.

"Therefore, we will continue to talk to Black leaders about the economy, labour and the building of the country because South Africa has only one economy.

"The stronger we can make the economy, the better South Africa is in a position to defend herself, which cannot be done without a strong economy.

"I will talk to Black leaders and I will not make excuses. This is the task of a Prime Minister and I will go ahead despite criticism because South Africa must be kept secure for all its peoples."

Mr Botha said he had made it clear that a system of one man one vote in a unity federal system was unacceptable to him.

"But I am willing to help build structures which will satisfy all the aspirations of all the country's national groups on the basis that what I demand for myself I cannot deny others."

People had to be brought together in their groups, with each group maintaining its identity, culture and the right to self-determination, but united in a national will to oppose communism, maintain order and secure the Christian and civilised way of life.

"The Government wants to take people in one great stream so they get their rights and greater security than what is being offered from outside.

"We must have the national will to carry this through and people must develop the right attitudes.

"We must be practical because politics is the art of the possible." — Sapa.

Role of Press

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Sep 80 p 7

[Text]

BLOEMFONTEIN. — The purpose of the Steyn Commission of Investigation into the mass media was not to deprive them of their freedom, but to put the relationship among the Press, the Government and the public on a good footing, the Prime Minister, Mr P W Botha, said yesterday.

The Government acknowledged the freedom of the Press and its right to convey the truth to its readers.

"But I do deny that the Press has a right to sow confusion in an established country.

"As far as the opposition Press is concerned, I want to state that I have no objection to criticism.

"They should only make it clear to me in a newspaper which part of a report is comment of a journalist and which are the facts on which he is reporting.

Speaking on a resolution dealing with the Immorality Act and the Mixed Marriages Act, Mr Botha said the Government continually received representations by individuals and organisation to remove these two laws from the statute books.

"The country is divided on this issue. It is no use denying it," he said.

The measures were not intended to insult any population group but to combat social evils he said, reiterating that the Government would consider suggestions to take the sting out of the Acts, but would retain the objectives of combating immorality and social evils.

PRESS COMMENT ON NP SIMONSTOWN BY-ELECTION VICTORY

'THE CITIZEN' Comment

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial: "Simonstown's Verdict"]

[Excerpt]

SIMONSTOWN has given South Africa its answer.

If the by-election in this mainly English constituency was a watershed in South African politics, as the Progfeds claimed it would be, the result has established that our politics is flowing towards the Centre, where the National Party is now ensconced.

Which was very predictable.

When the interests behind the Progs sought a verligte alliance, way back in the early Seventies, they were determined to break up the United Party as the first part of their strategy.

They succeeded.

Graaff was undermined, ridiculed, destroyed as a political leader; the Reformists broke away to join the Progs in the Progressive Reform Party; the Bassonites broke away to join the Prog Reformists in the Progressive Federal Party.

All of this in the name of a more effective Opposition.

But the 1977 election showed that the Opposition had been immeasurably weakened.

The National Party swept to its biggest victory ever.

The Progfeds still did not appreciate that the electorate is mostly conservative, middle-of-the-roadish, moderate.

Or that what they had done was to break up a party to which most English-speakers had given their allegiance over the years, without substituting for it a party to which most English-speakers could now turn.

The PFP was too far to the Left. Too committed to the liberal politics of the Houghton clique. Too keen on pleasing the Blacks, instead of achieving a power base among the Whites.

Too out of touch with the realities to appreciate that it could never hope to achieve any influence in White politics once it was identified as the party which was moving, whatever it might say to the contrary, towards Black majority rule.

A policy unacceptable to most of the White electorate, including those Opposition voters who once gave their support to the middle-of-the-road United Party.

There is, of course, still the New Republic Party, formed from the rump of the old UP. But it never achieved the same identification, the same support, as its predecessor, and it suffered from the UP's old handicaps - lack of money and of a Press to support it.

Less chance

Besides, with the National Party moving into the Centre, and taking over some of the UP's old clothes (without acknowledgement), the NRP began to have less and less chance of establishing itself as a force in politics.

To put it at its simplest:

The Left is the PFP; the Right now consists of the Herstigtes and the Connie Mulder party, the National Conservative Party. The NP is in the Centre, where the old UP was.

As Simonstown has shown, many of the old United Party supporters, who found themselves in a political limbo with the break-up of the party, having no desire to vote Progfed and unsure about what the NRP is all about, are now able to switch comfortably to the NP.

'THE CAPE TIMES' Comment

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 6 Sep 80 p 11

[Editorial: "After Simon's Town"]

[Text] MNR John Wiley's victory for the Nationalists in Sinon's Town is a severe setback for the PFI and for the cause of inter-racial reconciliation in South Africa. Predictably, the result has distressed leaders in the black community who do not believe that Mr Wiley's election will serve the interests of their people. The result is another twist in the spiral of racial reaction and counter-action. It appears to be evidence of increasing polarization in inter-group attitudes. Under stress of recent tragic events in the Peninsula, there has been a distinct hardening of attitudes and a movement of voters into laager. Unless this is a purely local and temporary phenomenon the lesson of Simon's Town is depressing, suggesting a steady growth in confrontationist attitudes in the white electorate.

For Mr P.W. Botha and the Cape Nationalist party machine, Mr Wiley's victory is a considerable coup, representing a deeper penetration into the Opposition and English-speaking vote than any of Mr Botha's predecessors was ever able to manage. As a hard-working constituency MP, Mr Wiley had earned a measure of personal support in the constituency which was probably significant in the final result. It is not clear whether a Nationalist from outside Simon's Town, without Mr Wiley's strong local links could have done it. It is hard to say. In any event the results of further by-elections will have to be awaited before it can be said with certainty that the Simon's Town result represents a national trend.

Meanwhile, Mr Botha will take encouragement from the result as an endorsement of his whole approach to the premiership. It remains to be seen whether this will speed up his tardy reformism. For the moment it suffices to note that there was a certain ambivalence in the Nationalists' Simon's Town campaign which was in some ways reminiscent of the old United Party in its declining years. While the overall tone was conservative and calculated to uphold white privilege, there was also a judicious admixture of mild reformist rhetoric--where this seemed appropriate. The voters of Simon's Town have found the mixture congenial. A majority of the electors, it appears, want to have it both ways. They want to hang on to white power and privilege. At the same time they want peace and security. These goals are mutually exclusive as time will show. A majority of Simon's Town electors have opted for policies which, if persisted in, will produce the very upheaval they so greatly fear.

SAIRR MEMBERS MEET WITH OFFICIALS ON BUS STRIKE

Johannesburg THE CAPE TIMES in English 29 Aug 80 p 2

[Text]

THE GOVERNMENT was adamant that it could not turn a "blind eye" to the use of illegal taxis nor could it permit its officials to carry out their duties unarmed.

This emerged during a 1½-hour meeting in Pretoria between a delegation from the South African Institute of Race Relations and the ministers of transport and police on Wednesday.

The delegation was also told that a new plan was being evolved for a transport pool to which many different sectors would contribute.

The meeting, initiated by the delegation, was held to discuss the Cape's bus boycott, which is already in its 12th week.

The SAIRR delegation consisted of Mrs Daphne Wilson, chairman of the Cape Western Region of the institute, Mr John Rees, the institute's national director, and Mr S M Tindleni, chairman of the Coordinating Civic Council of Nyanga, Langa and Guguletu.

Discussions

They held discussions with the Minister of Transport, Mr J C Heunis, the Minister of Police, Mr Louis le Grange, and the Director-General and officials of the Department of Transport.

Mrs Wilson said in a statement yesterday that the delegation was given a good hearing.

A six-page memorandum, laying special emphasis on three major appeals, was presented to Mr Heunis.

The appeals were that:

- Additional funding be found to augment the already heavily subsidized bus service to ensure that the amount a worker spent on public transport was no more than a reasonable percentage of his wages;
- The present rigorous enforcements of the Transportation Act regulations regarding the use of "pirate" taxis be relaxed till the boycott problem had been sorted out and
- Transport in general in the Peninsula be improved with special attention given to granting more "public permits" covering wider areas for black taxi operators.

The statement said both Mr Heunis and Mr Le Grange remained adamant that they could not turn a blind eye to the use of illegal taxis nor permit their officials to carry out their duties unarmed.

Mr Heunis, however, was prepared to recognize the predicament of workers who were unable to meet transport costs on their existing wages.

"After stressing that R87,2-million (including contributions from employers) has been spent for the 79-80 financial year in the Cape Peninsula out of the total national bus subsidy of R76-million (plus R14,8-million from employers) he stated that a new plan was being evolved for a transport pool fund into which many different sectors will contribute," the statement said.

However, no short-term relief in the form of an additional subsidy was foreseeable for this year. Both parties agreed that an all-round increase in wages should be sought as a "matter of urgency".

MANGOPE DISPUTES MINISTER ON MISUSE OF LAND

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 5 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

MMABATHO. — The Bophuthatswana President, has strongly criticised a recent statement by the South African Minister of Agriculture that erosion, overgrazing and devastation occurred on land given to Black National States.

In a statement released in Mmabatho yesterday, Chief Lucas Mangope said Mr Hendrik Schoeman's speech in Bloemfontein referring to Black States in general was misleading and clashed with the RSA's philosophy that each national group had the right to plan and decide its own affairs.

Concerned

"We of Bophuthatswana therefore have reason to be concerned when a statement is made which disparages our distinctive identity (eiesoortigheid) and which refers to our good rights to decide on matters such as land ownership and usage in terms of 'as elsewhere in Africa.'

"One thing must be said very plainly, and that is the fact that land which has been added to Bopthuthatswana in the past and which has been resettled on a tribal basis, was under the control of the Republic of South Africa during these resettlements.

"My Government was forced on more than one occasion to protest against the fact that good agricultural land was being used and wasted for the resettlement of people who are removed in terms of the Republic of South Africa's policy of clearing up so-called 'Black spots.'

Chief Mangope said that to lay the blame at the door of the Black States was totally and entirely unreasonable.

"In connection with new land which may possibly be added to Bophuthatswana in terms of a new consolidation programme, I have already frequently and clearly stated my position.

Disuse

"It is also my Government's wish that no single hectare of productive agricultural land should fall into disuse and a state of decay.

"White farmers who have the right attitude to build together in constructing a sound agricultural industry are welcome to stay and to continue with their farming activities.

Selected

"Where new land is in fact given to Tswana farmers, this will not be done on a communal basis. Selected farmers who have already shown their mettle will be given the opportunity to take commercial farms over on a trial basis," he said. — Sapa.

SOWETO GROUPS TO CHALLENGE ELECTION POSTPONEMENT

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 8 Sep 80 p 11

[Article by Lawrence Mayekiso]

[Text]

SOME Soweto civic organisations have formed themselves into an umbrella body known as the Soweto Allied Civic Association with a view to taking the Department of Bantu Administration and Development to court for having postponed the Soweto community council elections.

Mr Milton Maliza, secretary of the SACA, said yesterday that participants in Soweto's civic affairs were unhappy with the postponement.

They wanted the Minister of the Department of Co-operation and Development, Dr Piet Koornhof, to tell them under what authority the elections had been postponed.

They were to have been held in three weeks time, on September 27, but the Minister announced that he had postponed them to September, 1982.

Later Mr David Thebehali, chairman of the Soweto Council, told a Press conference that he had asked for the postponement to enable him to complete some of his commitments towards the development of Soweto.

Mr Maliza said SACA felt the postponement should have been asked for by a full sitting of the Soweto Council, and not by one individual.

He said the holding of elections in September every three years was in terms of an Act of Parliament.

INLAND FREIGHT COMPLEX--Freight Services is to establish South Africa's largest privately owned inland handling complex for transit cargo at City Deep in Johannesburg. The first phase of development will cost R5-million and will cover a 6 000 sq metre warehouse, a 6 000 sq metre open storage area and rail siding facilities. Earthworks have already started on the 6,5 ha site, and the first phase is scheduled for completion by the end of the year. At that stage, the complex will have a throughput capacity of more than 200 000 tons a year. During the next phase, capacity will be increased through the installation of advanced mechanical handling equipment and the extension of the storage space. The flexible design of the complex will allow considerable expansion including the trebling of warehouse capacity. The complex will cost R10-million when fully developed. It will provide a range of handling, warehousing and distribution services which will include the packing and railing of containers moving within South Africa, the consolidation of over-border cargoes and the management of inter-modal surface transport for unitised freight. BLACK NURSES, WHITE HOSPITALS--Durban--To employ Black nurses in White hospitals in Natal was not a satisfactory solution to the present nursing crisis in the province, the MEC in charge of hospitals, Mr Frank Martin, said yesterday. He said that if Black nurses were employed in White hospitals it would amount to blatant exploitation because the two race groups were on different salary scales. Until the scales were brought into line the move would be a mistake. Mr Martin was reacting to a threat by sisters in the Wentworth Hospital's cardiac-thoracic ward to resign unless their working conditions were drastically improved. Mr Martin said the Provincial Administration was concerned about the situation at Wentworth, a specialist hospital dealing mostly with heart patients. However, the nursing shortage was countrywide and he felt unless salaries were upgraded the shortage would continue. [Excerpt] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 21 Aug 80 p 11]

NEW HYDROELECTRIC PLANT TO BE BUILT

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 28 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The Swaziland Electricity Board is taking its biggest step forward since its inception in 1963 with a E54 million hydro electric power station near the foot of the Malagwane hill in Ezulwini Valley.

The annual output of the station of over 90 million kilowatt hours will help reduce dependence on imported power, much of it from South AFrica. The phrase kilowatt hours means electricity units, as charged to the consumer.

An explanation issued to THE TIMES by SEB says that two 10 megawatt turbo-alternators will be fed with water diverted from the Usushwana River near Siphocosini.

By the time the station is complete in 1984, the annual requirements of SEB's system are likely to be 450 million kilowatt hours of which the existing Edwaleni and Maguduza stations contribute only 130 million.

The Usushwana will be dammed by a 40 metre high rockfill embankment about 2 km downstream of the bridge on the Mbabane-Mhlambanyatsi road. From near the dam wall a 4 1/2 km tunnel will lead the diverted water under Lupohlo mountain to the Ezulwini valley. From the tunnel, a steel pipeline will pass the water to the power station.

After the water has passed through a turbine it will discharge into rivers which rejoin the Usushwana near Lobamba. The water can then be used again in the Edwaleni Power Station and once more at Maguduza.

The dam near Siphocosini will fill up in the rain season and will be gradually drawn down in the dry season. The storage of flood waters will allow the Edwaleni and Maguduza stations to increase their outputs by 3 million kWh in the dry season of each year as well as improving the irrigation potential of the Lusutfu downstream of Maguduza.

It is hoped to borrow E30 million of total E45 m from international lending agencies. Part of the rest of the needs are likely to be loaned by Swaziland government and the Swaziland National Provident Fund with SEB contributing the balance.

A further power station had been considered but has been put off until more loan finance is available. It would be an 8MW, 50 million kWh per year station on the Lusutfu near Sijvokodvo.

FOREIGN AID TO FEED POPULATION FOR SIX MONTHS

Paris LE MONDE in French 30 Aug 80 p 4

[Article by Francoise Chipaux--passages between slantlines originally published in italics]

[Text] Kampala--/"Why are you worried about Karamoja?" "Where is it?" "It's foolish to go down there."/ In Kampala, one finds very little concern for the Northeast Province, which is traditionally left to its own devices.

The fact that people are dying of hunger a day's journey by car from the capital city does not overly concern the students at Makerere, of whom one would like to think better could be expected than the indifference shown by other Ugandans. The famine is not mentioned, not even in a single line, in the two English-language weeklies, THE CITIZEN and WEEKLY TOPIC, which prefer to devote page one to the campaign promises of their respective candidates.

Thanks to the delayed but massive aid of a number of international organizations, the Karajong will apparently be able to escape the worst [effects] for at least 6 months. Today, in fact, there is enough food, medicine, and money available to save Karamoja in the short run; the UN, which has resumed its convoys of provisions, hopes to send out 500 tons per week, which should be sufficient, since the needs of the population of the region are estimated at 1,800 or 2,000 tons per month. Still, it is necessary that this sustenance be systematically sent out to all distribution centers, which requires coordination and a minimum of organization in the distribution of relief supplies. The absence of a responsible government which would normally provide for this coordination is permitting the growth of a sort of "war of charities" which hinders effective and rapid activity.

Along with the UN and its affiliated organizations--UNDP, UNHCR, WFP and UNICEF--French humanitarian organizations, "Medecins du Monde","Medecins San Frontieres," the Order of Malta, AICF, the Red Cross, "Hopital Sans Frontieres," private organizations such as Save the Children Fund and OXFAM

(British), CARE (American), the Church of Uganda (Protestant), are presently working in Karamoja scattered all about.[1]

The Distribution of Tasks

Some of these associations, all of whom are doing useful work, remain jealous of their prerogatives and are reluctant to pool their resources. They refuse, for example, to disclose to WFP the contents of their deliveries of provisions to such an extent that distribution centers are awash in boxes of protein biscuits, but totally lacking flour or milk. In Kaabong, three nurses from a British organization were opposed to the immediate arrival of a French doctor, preferring to wait /"for one of ours."/ It is /true/ that the British do not always regard in a kindly light the French /"intrusion"/, especially military, on a former territory of the crown. But London refused to give in to the UN request to supply a helicopter to keep an eye on the dispatch of convoys of provisions.

The French humanitarian organizations, for their part, have recently met in Kampala to divide up the various tasks and study the best possible utilization of the PUMA helicopters of the army. Thus "Medecins du Monde" and the Order of Malta, which are working together, are going to concentrate their efforts on the southwestern part of the province, where 17 people are already working, while "Medecins Sans Frontieres" will remain in the north at Katido, where there are still only 2, and at Katakwi, near Soroti.

The aid organizations, however, are conscious of their inadequacy. The requests sent to Paris, which in addition to the precise military aid approved personally by the chief of state has devoted 3 million francs to the immediate needs of the Karamoja, have sometimes been surprising. Thus, in Kampala, the delivery of 300,000 doses of vaccine (against measles, BCG [Bacille Calmette-Guerin, vaccine for prevention of tuberculosis], poliomyelitis) was in vain, as the doctors on the scene were scarcely capable of organizing such a prevention campaign. Similarly, the installation at great cost of the "Hopital Sans Frontieres" for which the government poured out 1 million, does not under the circumstances seem a high-priority item. The radiological room, installed in a converted cell in Namalu, would certainly be enough to make the directors of African [medical] establishments jealous, but it was not indispensable. The humanitarian aid of the government, coordinated on the scene by the French ambassador, who had never, before a brief visit by helicopter to Namalu, visited Karamoja, would doubtless have been improved by better preparation. The mission of Mr Leclerc, head of /"Operation Uganda"/ at the Quai d'Orsay, will perhaps make possible the organizing over a longer term of real French-Ugandan cooperation to save Karamoja. In any case it would be difficult to understand if the massive and spectacular French assistance should stop as suddenly as it began.

[1]"Medecins du Monde," 22 Rue de Conde, 75006 Paris; "Medecins Sans Frontieres," 161 Lefebvre Blvd., 75015 Paris; Order of Malta, 4 Ave Marceau, 75008 Paris; AICF (International Association Against Hunger), 13 Rue d'Uzes, 75002 Paris; Red Cross, 17 Rue Quentin-Bauchart, 75008 Paris.

With respect to effectiveness, according to the coordinator for the Order of Malta, it is most difficult to find volunteers willing to take on management for at least 6 months of the distribution centers where it is not always necessary to immobilize a doctor. It is in reality indispensable to decentralize these centers to the greatest extent possible, in order to avoid excessive displacement of people. AICF intends to make an appeal for volunteers.

The EEC Effort

The short duration of the tour (1-2 1/2 months) of health personnel in the field also makes the work of long-term restoration of existing medical structures difficult. There are a considerable number of small dispensaries in the countryside, and it would suffice to re-install them and pay local assistants, to get them back in operation. These para-medical personnel, often well-trained, have mostly abandoned their post and sold the stock of pharmaceuticals to subsist.

If the traditional raids practiced in these more or less uncontrolled areas have taken on catastrophic proportions, it is quite obviously the consequence of the war which turned the traditional pillagers armed with spears into large companies equipped with deadly materiel. The raids in Karamoja are giving way to a fruitful traffic with Kenya and Sudan in which even Ugandan ministers are participating.

With the absence of political will in Kampala, the job of saving Karamoja also falls into the hands of the missionaries who have been established in this region for many years, who know it well, and many of whom speak the language. However, they also have some reservations as they receive the massive outpouring of aid which could forever "vagabondize" the populace. It is for this reason that they demanded, when the famine started, a few symbolic shillings [in payment] in return for any provision of food. Several humanitarian organizations did not understand this.

The EEC, which has furnished 1 million hoes to the Ugandan peasants, including 45,000 in Karamoja, understands, for its part, the importance of peasant participation. Thus, every hoe is sold for 35 shillings, a bearable price, and the money received by the Bank of Uganda must be used to finance other agricultural projects. The EEC, which has been involved in Karamoja since March, has made a considerable effort to come to the aid of these people, and following the fall of [Idi] Amin Dada supplied immediate short-term aid in the amount of 110 million francs.

All the international experts are in fact aware of the reality that the Karamoja ordeal is only one of the aspects of the tragedy of a country adrift, and no partial solution, however generous it may be, can be more than a palliative.

BELGIUM DENIES PREPARATIONS TO SEND TROOPS

Brussels LE SOIR in French 17-18 Aug 80 p 3

[Text] The Congo-Kinshasa Liberation Council has issued a bulletin stating that it has learned that following an analysis of the international situation, the coming American, French, German and other elections, and considering the characteristic weakness of the Mobutu regime, NATO has decided to send operational troops to Zaire ready to intervene to counter preparations of the Congolese opposition embodied by the CLC.

"NATO has reportedly asked the Belgian Government to dispatch a high government official in charge of making arrangements with the Mobutu government...

"The CLC vigorously condemns these maneuvers, which prevent the liberation of the people of the Congo-Kinshasa (Zaire)," the bulletin continues.

"The CLC is convinced that the situation in Zaire requires far-reaching changes and such changes can occur without the spilling of blood.

"The sending of troops by governments belonging to NATO is proof that confrontation is inevitable. In this case, NATO and the Belgian Government will alone bear full responsibility."

Concerning the bulletin, the Office of the Minister of National Defense states that Poswick will indeed go to Zaire on Sunday for a week in response to an invitation extended following the April visit to Belgium of Zairian Commissioner for Defense Desmarets.

Poswick will have the opportunity to observe the working conditions of Belgians in Zaire within the framework of military technical cooperation.

The Office of the Minister of National Defense stated that there is absolutely no question of preparing to send Belgian troops to Zaire.

REPORTAGE ON SA DEVELOPMENT COORDINATION CONFERENCE

Mugabe Opens Meeting

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] AFRICAN countries should intensify the fight for economic independence and redeem themselves from being economic puppets and perpetual beggars "gallivanting from one metropolitan city to another telling the same old story of poverty", the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said yesterday.

Because of their economic under-development, black states had compromised their liberty and African personality by allowing themselves to become perpetual objects of pity, the Prime Minister said.

"Our hands forever imploringly open are only occasionally graced (or is it disgraced?) by miserable pittances."

Opening the nine-nation ministerial session of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference at a Salisbury hotel, Mr Mugabe said the African states must reinforce their hard-won political independence by adopting and implementing effective programmes for their economic independence for the good of their masses.

"At home our primary, secondary and infrastructural sectors have become dominated, in many cases owned, by foreign investors, the principal operators being variously known as multi - nationals or trans-nationals.

"They produce, unless properly controlled by a system of regulatory measures, a mouse's share for us and a lion's share for themselves.

"We remain d minated economically by economic lords [words illegible] were politically ominated by political lords yesterday.

"Economic domination is indeed a worse phenomenon than political domination, for in the latter case no political resources are depleted by being shipped abroad, whereas in a situation of economic domination our resources are wasting away day by day as they get freighted to Paris, London and New York, both as lowly purchased raw materials such as chrome and copper and as huge dividends and profits.

"The irony of it all is our helplessness in the situation," the Prime Minister told the meeting, which is a follow-up to the Lusaka economic agreement in March.

Apart from the exploitation of their natural resources, for which they were paid very little, African countries also had to put up with unfavourable terms for trade.

"Prices we pay are deliberately made exorbitant. Thus we meet foul play in both cases and so it is perpetual defeat for us and perpetual victory for them," said Mr Mugabe.

"So is it any wonder that we have been turned into economic puppets or perpetual beggars?

"African voices have grown hoarse from endless soliciting tunes for aid.

"Our feet have become blistered as we gallivant from one metropolitan city to another telling the same old story of poverty," said Mr Mugabe.

The only answer was to work for economic liberation, which he was confident Africa could attain.

The objective of the Lusaka accord was economic disengagement not only from South Africa, but also from any external country or groups of countries.

The signatories to the agreement are Angola, Botswana, Malawi, Lesotho, Swaziland, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

"Our over-dependence in transport and communications and a variety of goods and services on South Africa was neither a natural phenomenon nor the result of a free market economy.

"It was therefore decided that we continue to struggle until our economic liberation is achieved," Mr Mugabe said.

Mr Mmusi's Address

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] THE political victory of the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, had created a strategic position from which Southern African countries could advance to economic liberation, Botswana's Minister of Finance and Development Planning, Mr P. Mmusi, said yesterday.

He told the Ministerial session of the Southern African Development Coordination Conference, of which he is chairman, that there was still a long way to go to economic liberation, but the journey had been started with determination and optimism.

"There will be difficult times ahead, more battles to be won, more sacrifices to be made, but we must not falter," Mr Mmusi said.

"If we maintain this faith, generations ahead will say that at Arusha, Lusaka, Salisbury and Maputo, their leaders indeed matched this great challenge of our time."

Mr Mmusi announced that another conference would be held in Maputo in November, which would review the progress, proposals and decisions, made by this week's meeting.

"To that conference will be invited representatives from a wide range of governments and international agencies whom we hope to persuade to work with us towards our goal of economic liberation."

These would include both socialist and capitalist countries, OPEC, and international financing agencies.

The Maputo meeting could become a "practical workshop".

"Certainly we will provide them (these countries and organisations) with an opportunity for what we all recognise as of crucial importance and great urgency — the resumption of dialogue about world economics."

Meeting Concluded

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] The Southern African development co-ordination summit conference yesterday concluded its one-day ministerial meeting in Salisbury with agreement on the establishment of priority transport and communications projects that were "the key to the strategy of economic liberation".

A communique listed these generally as:

--Rehabilitation of all existing transport and communication facilities.

--Establishment of telecommunications and civil aviation infrastructures.

--New road, rail, air and like transport systems where feasibility studies had already been completed.

--Feasibility studies for further additions to the infrastructures for e regional road, rail, internal marine, air and shipping facilities.

A provisional list of specific project proposals will be put to the Maputo meeting of the conference on November 27-28, when funding will be sought from Eastern, Western and Arab bloc development agencies.

Invited

Most "well-to-do" countries had been invited to the Maputo meeting, the conference chairman, Mr P. S. Mmusi, Minister of Finance and Development Planning for Botswana, said at a Press conference last night.

He was unable to name specific countries invited but admitted that "very many" countries would be at the Maputo meeting.

A conference communique detailed other areas of discussion at yesterday's meeting as:

--Regional food security and agricultural development.

--Control of foot-and-mouth disease. In this regard, the communique said, Zimbabwe had been invited to convene "in the near future", a meeting of the directors of all nine member states' veterinary services.

--Agricultural research in semi-arid tropics.

--Technical co-operation in the field of soil conservation and land utilisation. In this regard, Ministers noted the intention of the Zimbabwean Government to resign from the Southern African Regional Commission for the Conservation and Utilisation of the Soil which had its headquarters in Pretoria.

The feasibility of setting up a similar organisation to serve the nine member states would be assessed at a special meeting yet to be announced.

Also under discussion yesterday were the setting up of a Southern African development fund and the establishment of a centre for Southern African studies, the communique said.

Leadership, Goodwill Needed

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] The nine-nation group of Southern African States needs "a lot of political will" and good leadership among the governments and people charged with implementing set projects to achieve their objectives.

This is the opinion of the chairman of the steering committee of the Southern African Development Co-ordination Conference, Tanzanian High Commissioner to London, Mr Amon Nsekela, who left Zimbabwe yesterday after a ministerial session of the conference in Salisbury.

"We cannot afford to fail," he said, "but that does require a lot of political will. We will need good leadership among the governments themselves and the people who will be entrusted with the work to see that the movement goes forward."

The decision by Zimbabwe, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia, Botswana, Angola, Malawi, Lesotho and Swaziland to work towards economic liberation and inter-state co-operation was "one of the most exciting experiments in the history of this region".

"It is not enough to be politically independent. Political independence must be backed by economic independence. This is an area where we must succeed," said Mr Nsekela.

He supported the views expressed by the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, against begging. "This is exactly the message we need. This is exactly the message we all expected".

Mr Nsekela believes Southern African States have the potential to produce anything, and that the Prime Minister was right in reminding the group that it was a disgrace to continue behaving like beggars.

He is also convinced that the Salisbury conference, a follow-up to the Lusaka agreement of March, achieved tangible results.

"I think it was a very successful meeting. It certainly demonstrated that the movement is growing from strength to strength."

Support for Mr Mugabe's sentiments was also expressed by Miss Lombe Chibesakunda, a member of the steering committee and Zambia's High Commissioner to London.

She thought the Prime Minister was correct in criticising Africa's predilection for begging "because most of the (financing agencies) now tended to be not so generous with funds, hence the need to look to ourselves".

The two ambassadors confirmed the Salisbury meeting had not reached final agreement on the subjects of industrialisation and a development fund.

"They are very complex subjects and more work is needed before a final strategy is adopted," said Miss Chibesakunda.

Finance and banking experts from the nine countries are expected to have talks on industrialisation and the development fund, possibly before the Maputo session of the conference in November.

At that meeting the nine States hope to convince international financiers, such as the International Monetary Fund, the group's need for financial assistance.

The States particularly want their development strategy in industry to encompass trade arrangements whereby those countries in the region with a greater capacity for production will sell to their less developed neighbours.

The efforts of the nine States are in line with the Lagos Plan of Action, worked out in April, for Africa's economic liberation.

The plan hinges crucially on the success of regional co-operation before moves towards continental co-operation can be launched.

Task 'Enormous'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] MUCH groundwork was covered by delegates at the Southern Africa Development Co-ordination Conference in Salisbury this week.

No doubt by the time the nine nations meet again in Maputo in November, an outline of the strategy to reduce economic dependence on South Africa and create a viable regional grouping will have emerged.

The task facing the nine nations is enormous, given South Africa's economic might and the extent of her trade with them.

But there can be no doubt that along with the struggle being waged by the people of South Africa this campaign will have an impact on the elimination of apartheid.

What must concern the nine nations as well is the impact of their programme on the ordinary people in their countries.

All of them, except Zimbabwe, are relatively poor, with great agricultural potential as yet unexploited. They have economic infrastructures which are still in formation.

The poverty in Africa is staggering, with ordinary people benefiting only marginally from the political independence achieved after much death and suffering.

The rich nations, sometimes represented by the transnationals, have played their part in impoverishing the continent. Any programme designed to reverse this trend and change the quality of life of ordinary Africans must be encouraged.

LAW ON PRESS, OFFICIAL LANGUAGES SEEN MORE RESTRICTIVE

London WEST AFRICA in English 15 Sep 80 p 1744

[Text]

A LAW has been passed in Cameroon severely restricting the dissemination of news that might be considered contrary to the interests of the State. Though this is little more than the legal acknowledgement of policies that have been practiced for many years in Cameroon, the report on the modified press law which we publish on page 1748 draws attention to two important and associated facets of political life in Cameroon.

The official practice of bilingualism in Cameroon has always been shrouded in ambiguity and it has not been helped by its definition in the Constitution. The preamble states that French and English are to be the official languages, while Article 44 says that only the French text of the constitution is to be considered as authentic. The announcement of the press law has followed roughly the same pattern; the French text in which it was originally made public is the authentic one, with the English translation to be published at a later date.

For practical purposes it might seem that this is a logical policy, but in Cameroon it clashes with the interests of the English-speaking minority who live in the West and which has always been very conscious of its rights as a minority. It was, after all, only in 1972 that Cameroon became a unitary state after entering into independence with a federal constitution. Independence was accompanied by a violent struggle against the entral authorities led by Ruben Um Nyobe's UPC.

Unity in Cameroon has therefore entailed considerable centralisation of political and administrative authority which has been accompanied by severe limitations to the right to dissent. It is within this context that the present law has been passed. Unfortunately, the praise that is heaped on Cameroon and its government for the type of economic progress that it has achieved and the "stability" it has ensured has to be balanced against the more sinister evidence of repression and fear. From the reporter's point of view, it is a well known fact that the reporting of facts, however petty, that are considered inimical to government interests, too often result in the reporter having to pay a visit to the local gendarmerie to explain himself. There are a few courageous journalists, but only a few, who are prepared to brave the unknowns of Cameroonian security services. The present laws will place even greater pressure on them.

It is an unfortunate reflection on the leadership of President Ahidjo, who was elected earlier this year to his fifth five-year term as President, that the authorities still consider it necessary to stifle the country's diversity, the best mirror of which would be an unshackled but sympathetic press.

BRIEFS

BOKASSA ASSOCIATE SENTENCED--Bangui, 17 Sep (AFP)--The Centrafrican Criminal Court here has pronounced a further death sentence in the retrial of associates of ousted Emperor Jean-Bedel Bokassa. Ex-General Josephat Ayomokola, deputy armed forces chief of staff under Bokassa, was sentenced yesterday to death for ordering troops to fire on students during demonstrations here in January 1979, and for personally killing some of them. A number of people condemned to death last February are being retried this week after the Supreme Court quashed the verdicts last month, citing procedural irregularities. Among those sentenced again to death was a son-in-law of Bokassa, Dr Jean-Bruno Dedeavode. He was found guilty of poisoning--allegedly on Bokassa's orders--the 10-day-old son of the widow of Major Fidele Obrou, who had just been executived as the mastermind of a failed assassination bid against Bokassa in February 1976. The Justice Ministry here has announced that Bokassa, currently in exile in the Ivory Coast after being overthrown a year ago, will be tried in absentia in November. CUT-PRICE OIL REPORTEDLY RECEIVED FROM SOVIET UNION

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 18 Aug 80 pp 5, 9

[Text]

THE Kremlin has started to supply Ethiopia with cheap crude oil to help the country out of the economic crisis caused by fighting anti-secessionist wars on two fronts.

Ironically, the crisis is due to massive arms purchases from the Soviet Union.

Until recently Ethiopia obtained all its oil from Kuwait, with Mobil acting as an intermediary. When Kuwait ceased selling oil to multinationals for third countries (other than the US), Ethiopia found itself facing another crisis — until the Soviet Union stepped in.

The Russian crude is now being shipped regularly from Black Sea ports to the Ethiopian refinery at Assab on the Red Sea Coast. No details have been released officially about the price but Western sources believe the dollar-cost per barrel is 'in the low twenties', compared to around 33 dollars on the open market.

Ethiopia is believed to owe Russia between 1.5 and 2 billion dollars for arms. It is being repaid in goods, mostly coffee, hides and skins.

Last year the interest payments alone were 28 million dollars. This is placing an enormous strain on the economy of Ethiopia, which desperately needs foreign exchange, especially to buy grain to relieve the famine that is now estimated by United Nations experts to be affecting more than five million Ethiopians.

The country's own food production has slumped since the 1974 revolution and the subsequent upheaval in the countryside, when much of the land was taken over by the State from a few wealthy landlords, including the Emperor's family and the Orthodox Church.

In spite of early attempts to enforce collective farming, the military rulers began to restrain over-zealous officials once they realised the strength of the opposition.

Persuasion is now being used instead of force. Farmers are allowed to own up to 10 hectares and, with the abolition of the old feudal system, tenant farmers no longer have to hand over 60 per cent of their crops to landlords as rent.

They are supposed to give part of their harvest to the local peasant associations, but this cannot be enforced rigidly, so by pleading a poor harvest many farmers are able to keep all they grow. Farmers' families are thus living much better than before.

In place of collectives, the tendency is to encourage the development of production co-operatives, which offer tractors, fertiliser and temporary workers — all benefits which are not usually available to peasant farmers.

The serious food problem is in the main towns and in arid areas where much of the livestock has died from successive droughts.

Recently the World Food Programme arranged with the Government to exchange surplus maize for imported wheat supplies, since wheat is in great demand by the army and in Addis Ababa — two consumer groups given high priority by the Military Government.

Coffee provides three-quarters of Ethiopia's foreign exchange but, unlike other coffee-producing countries, the Ethiopian variety mainly grows wild and not in plantations. The harvest is there for anyone to pick and there is no way to control the marketing of 90 per cent of the crop.

Figures I was shown in Addis Ababa indicate that the United States is still Ethiopia's best trading partner and last year bought coffee worth 88 million dollars.

Next on the list of customers for coffee was Saudi Arabia, followed by EEC countries and the German Democratic Republic. The USSR was fifth, with coffee valued at 28 million dollars handed over as part repayment for arms supplies.

When a multi-donor mission recently came to Ethiopia under UN auspices, members were told that the country's food deficit was 258,000 tonnes and the United Nations sought funds to import this amount to feed just over five million people.

However, American experts dispute this figure and claim the Ethiopians are inflating the shortage in order to get more food aid and thus save their own dwindling foreign exchange reserves.

The government in Addis Ababa has embarked on an ambitious drive to improve communications in the rural areas and to achieve universal literacy, so that the Marxist-Leninist message can spread throughout the country.

East Germans are in charge of the ideological campaign and one urgent project is the complete revision of all text books to include the new doctrine — an operation which is being carried out in a large brick building immediately opposite the sprawling compound of the United States Embassy, from which Ambassador Frederick Chapin has just been expelled on orders from the Dergue.

BLACK STAR LINE PROBLEMS DESERVE SERIOUS REVIEW

London WEST AFRICA in English 15 Sep 80 p 1744

[Text]

GHANA'S Minister of Transport and Communications, Mr. Harry Sawyerr, was in London last week for a news conference on the reorganisation of the national shipping line, the Black Star Line. The Minister reiterated that there was no question of winding up one of Ghana's major sources of foreign revenue. He also gave vigorous assurances that rehabilitation of the troubled shipping line was "in full swing", and that every nerve was being strained to clear the line's debt.

The basis for this operation of resuscitation was the dismissal of the most senior management, and of nearly all the Ghanaian officers. Four West German consultants have been given a free hand and a four-year contract to reshape BSL, and an assortment of foreign officers, have been recruited to man the vessels. Fleet replacement is under way with four new vessels at $16m. each.

During the Minister's news conference, someone asked him why there should now be any Ghanaian officers at all on BSL vessels. This half-serious question in fact points to a flaw in the strategy of President Limann's government. In attempting to carry out an uncompromising policy on labour disputes — apparently, one of sacking any group of people who go on strike in key sectors — can the government bind the workers to its own purpose and convince them of the greater national interest at a time of greater social hardship than ever before?

The Ghana Merchant Navy Officers' Association feels strongly that the officers have been made scapegoats for the failures of BSL management. Again, the recruitment of foreign officers can only be a short-term "solution". The short-term result of the Limann government's strong-hand approach is news that the International Transport-Workers Federation (ITF) has told all its affiliates around the world to refuse their services to BSL vessels. If observed uniformly, this "blacking" of BSL will render futile all the reorganisation of BSL's operations.

Cries of "blackmail" notwithstanding, the government still has to resolve long-term questions of management and labour in Ghana. The cost in foreign exchange of recruiting foreign consultants and personnel must be compared with their productivity and effect on Ghanaian managers and workers. In fact, the problems facing the government are so fundamental that reappraisal of certain abiding assumptions about the economic structure recommends itself. This is surely not the time for flexing political party muscles towards very limited (and counterproductive) ends. There can be little satisfaction gained from trying to show that you are the only party capable of solving Ghana's problems if in fact you are not seen to be solving those problems.

DOE WARNS AGAINST COUNTERREVOLUTIONARY ACTIVITIES

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 1 Sep 80 pp 1

[Excerpt]

Master/Sergeant Samuel K. Doe, Head of State and Chairman of the People's Redemption Council (PRC) has warned against what he described as counter-revolutionary activities by people who want to sabotage "the interest of the PRC".

In a strongly-worded nation-wide broadcast on Saturday, a day after his return from a four-day official visit to Socialist Ethiopia, Sergeant Doe ordered members of the PRC "to arrest anybody who is found engaging in activities contrary to the ideals of the Revolution."

Reminding his fellow countrymen that what Liberia has now is "strictly a military Government", Head of State Doe noted that it had come to his notice that "some ministers, directors and deputy ministers have been fond of holding certain meetings at certain times".

Sergeant Doe said that "hereafter, we will not allow any minister or director of any agency to issue any statement against the Government while we are in the process of bringing changes in our Revolution. If any of such ministers or directors is caught, he will be brought to justice without procrastination."

He also warned church leaders and other religious groups in the habit of pressurising Government to consider the release of political prisoners, to desist from such actions forthwith. He said all such appeals should in future be addressed to him directly.

Sergeant Doe also said that anyone visiting prisoners at the Post Stockade without authority "would be harmed".

The Head of State further declared: "we will not also tolerate or allow any group of people to publish any paper against the Government while we are in the process of bringing free education and relief to our people."

Sergeant Doe repeated that accordingly, the Co-Chairman of the PRC, the Speaker, the Armed Forces Commanding General, the National Security Agency and other law-enforcement agencies should "effective immediately arrest and confine any woman, man, school boy or yana boy" who would try to sabotage the interest of the PRC".

last Friday at the Executive Mansion, Sergeant Doe said a high degree of discipline must be injected in all levels of the people in our society.

REPRESENTATIVE ASKS CHRISTIANS, MOSLEMS TO AVOID POLITICS

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 29 Aug 80 p 12

[Text]

Ministers of the Gospel have been called upon to do away with politics and only preach the Word of God.

The call was made by the special representative of the People's Redemption Council of the Armed Forces of Liberia, Captain Johnson B.N. Jayswen when he addressed members of the press at the Capitol building last Tuesday.

Captain Jayswen said that many Pastors and Bishops of the Liberian churches were involved in politics and corrupt practices during the ousted government.

He said that those in prison were arrested by the PRC government for rampant corruption, misuse of public office, abuse of human and civil rights, and others for security reasons.

He added that these charges were sent to the central government and a special team has been set up to find out facts from the prisoners, and when these facts are ascertained, the prisoners will be released publicly.

Captain Jayswen appealed to all Christians and Muslims in the country to pray for the new Liberian Government and not to interfere with the government and its handling of political prisoners.

DOE RETURNS FROM CAPE MOUNT COUNTY, TO VISIT LOFA

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 5 Sep 80 pp 1, 8

[Article by George S. Khoryama]

[Text] County and territorial Superintendents have been warned by the Head of State, M/Sgt. Doe, against demanding money from citizens and residents for entertainment purposes during visits of government officials to other parts of the country.

M/Sgt. Doe gave the warning in Cape Mount County from where he returned yesterday to the capital after a two-day visit at the head of a 61-man entourage.

This brings to seven the number of counties M/Sgt. Doe has visited since he started his nation-wide tour on August 3. He has already visited Maryland, Sinoe, Grand Gedeh, Nimba, Bong and Grand Basca, where the rural people for the first time had the opportunity to catch a glimpse of their redeemer.

Montserrado County being the seat of government from where M/Sgt. Doe and the People's Redemption Council direct the affairs of the nation, he only has Lofa County now to visit.

Reports reaching New Liberian indicate that a tumultuous welcome awaits the Head of State in Lofa County.

As he continued to interprete the goals and objectives of the revolution during these visits, M/Sgt. Doe Wednesday told Grand Cape Mountaineans that the success of the revolution depended on hard work, discipline and the dedication of all to build a just society.

The April 12 revolution, he said, was meant to eradicate oppression, injustice and nepotism from the Liberian society, and to ensure full social and economic benefits for all.

Cape Mount County, as a matter of fact, is the birth place of the former First Lady, Mrs. Victoria A. Tolbert.

The Government of PRC, he said, was committed to minimizing the suffering of the rural masses "and not to exploit them."

He called on the youths of Liberia to engage in productive activities such as farming in order to meet the basic needs of their counties.

The citizens of Grand Cape Mount County on their part proposed to government a number of development programs aimed at uplifting their living standards and to encourage fair distribution of the county's natural resources.

They suggested among other things, that clans be organized into multi-purpose rural development cooperatives to speed up the construction of bridges, roads, schools and similar development projects throughout the county.

They also urged government to provide each clan and district headquarters with vocational school, a health center, pipe-borne water system, communication facilities, and to build roads to link the Headquarters with county capitals.

Before returning to the capital yesterday, M/Sgt. Doe visited the Tubman Center of African Culture in Robertsport and was led on a tour of the Center by the Director, Dr. Abdu Jones.

Dr. Jones told the Head of State that the center was making efforts to contribute to the development of the cultural heritage of Liberia.

She asked government for $3,000 to help implement proposed programs for the Center.

M/Sgt. Doe and party also attended a program at the St. John Academic and Technical High School at which time Chief Education Officer Mrs. Amelia T. Mason, stressed the need for three additional high schools in Grand Cape Mount County.

CHURCH OF APOSTLES BISHOP RAPS CATHOLIC BISHOPS' APPEAL

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 5 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Article by J. Blamo Robinson]

[Text] The recent appeal made to government by two Catholic Bishops for the release of all political prisoners has come under sharp attack from Bishop J. Samuel Browne of the United Church of the Apostles, Inc. on Bushrod Island, Monrovia.

He said it was Biblically unethical for ministers of the Gospel to call upon government to free political prisoners because "as followers of Christ, it is not the duty of ordained ministers of the Gospel to get involved in politics and incite the public to perform diabolic acts."

Speaking in an interview over the weekend at his Church, Bishop Browne said, "it is the responsibility of the ministers of the Gospel to stand on guard and watch over the lives of the masses or congregation as well as the state."

Citing Biblical verses, the Bishop said when a Christian minister saw his flock move towards temptation, it was his responsibility to warn them and win them back to the fold through teaching and prayers.

A priest, he noted, must stand like a soldier to guide his members away from the false teaching of those who deceive and mislead the weak, calling them "leopards in sheep's skin."

Bishop Browne stressed that "Biblical ethics do not allow ordained ministers of the Gospel to talk foolishness in order to bring about disharmony among the people of our country."

He maintained that the eight-point appeal made to government by Catholic Bishops Michael Kpakala Francis and Boniface Nyema Dalieh was unethical, noting that "although it is our duty as Gospel ministers to visit those in prison, and if need be, to make requests to the authorities on their behalf, this must be done honestly, obediently and faithfully."

He said it must not be a demand or an attempt to force government to release any prisoners.

The Bishop described the clergy as a watchdog of a nation who sought the interest and welfare of individuals or group in need of both spiritual and material assistance.

As ministers of the Gospel, it is our duty to see to it that the sick and the prisoners are visited, followed by meeting with those in authority and preaching the word of God to them with the aim of convincing them. "You may request or appeal honestly and spiritually for the release of a brother in prison."

"Where were the Catholic Bishops when Gabriel Baccus Matthews and others were jailed and their political party banned? Are they not children of God? Were their actions to talk for the human and constitutional rights of the masses wrong at that time?" the Bishop asked.

Concluding, Bishop called on all churches in the country to pray for the safety and success of the new regime and "not to institute politics among brothers, sisters, friends, neighbours and co-workers of the nation."

Two weeks ago, the Catholic Bishops made it clear to government that it was the duty of the church to provide "guidelines and offer concrete suggestions towards the establishment of sound social, economic, cultural and political state of affairs in line with the deepest understanding of man."

In a joint Pastoral Letter read in Catholic Churches throughout the country on Sunday, August 10, Bishops Francis and Dalieh called the government to grant amnesty to all political prisoners, lift the curfew immediately, set a time-table for a return to civilian rule, and hand over security operations to the police force "which is trained in the business of law and order."

SHORTAGES OF BABY FOOD, ESSENTIAL GOODS TO EASE

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 1 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] Worries over the shortage of baby foods by nursing mothers will soon be over by the arrival early this month of a shipment of Nestle baby foods.

This was revealed over the weekend by the management of the Bazzi Brothers Import and Export Corporation in Monrovia.

Other essential commodities, such as soap, canned fish and electrical and household appliances, among others, shortage of which have equally caused concern in the country, are expected to also arrive soon.

The general manager of the corporation, Mr. Ghazi Bazzi, said the recent shortage of some basic commodities on the local market was due to the delay in shipment by shipping lines.

He said another factor was the refusal of overseas companies to accept previous negotiations until banking institutions provided facilities to conduct importation operations.

Mr. Bazzi said that following the April 12 coup, some banking establishments in the country gave major business companies "necessary facilities" for smooth operation of business.

He said the re-instatement of his corporation's previous facilities by banks and overseas companies provided a climate to continue normal operations through which the forthcoming shipment was made possible.

On the quantity of supplies expected, the general manager said the consignment was "enough to cope with the need" of the Liberian people.

He said a business delegation from London, England, recently met with Bazzi management in an effort to get food importation in "full swing."

Mr. Bazzi said from talks held, there was no need for any major delay in the future and expressed the hope that the re-instatement of companies by local banks would continue in order "to get the economy moving."

NEED FOR VACCINES FOR ANIMAL HEALTH EXPRESSED

Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 27 Aug 80 p 7

[Text]

SUFFICIENT meat in the country depends largely on the efforts made by the governments to provide cattle Fulani with proper vaccines and drugs for their animals.

This was the view of Malam Isyaku Sambo while contributing to a motion tabled before the Kaduna State House of Assembly calling on the state Ministry of Animal and Forest Resources to provide vaccines and drugs for curing animal diseases.

The motion was sponsored by Alhaji Ibrahim Mu'azu (Batsari West). Malam Isyaku Sambo noted that cattle died due to lack of effective vaccines to cure them of animal diseases.

Alhaji Sani Sambo, Alhaji Yusi Tela, Alhaji Abba Kalle and Alhaji Sani Maitumbin Kudi said people indiscriminately destroyed forest reserves where cattle Fulani used for cattle grazing.

They contended that because of this action, cattle Fulani had to travel for long distances to find suitable grazing fields. They said this prompted some of them to find suitable grazing fields elsewhere.

Mr. Kure Malam suggested that the motion should be changed to calling on the state government to ensure that the officials of the Ministry of Animal and Forest Resources promptly gave vaccines and drugs to cattle. But it was resolved that the motion should be left as it was presented.

The House also called on the Ministry to expand forest reserves throughout the state so that domestic animals would have pasturing grounds for the benefit of the cattle Fulani.

The motion was passed together with the one calling on the Federal Government to construct a by-pass around Katsina starting from the Katsina Oil Mill to join the Dutsin-Ma Road and end at Kofar Yandaka, a distance of about three kilometres.

It was sponsored by Alhaji Abba Zubairu (Katsina South West).

COOPERATION WITH U.S. NOT AGAINST PEACEFUL COEXISTENCE

Mogadishu HEEGAN in English 5 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Foolish Lies"]

[Text] Since the advent of our Socialist Revolution the principle of peaceful coexistence among the peoples of the world has been strongly recognized and has been the principle of positive neutrality. These two principles and our commitment to the support of all national liberation movements constitute: the cornerstone of our foreign policy. All our intercourse with foreign countries and governments should therefore be viewed in the light of the articles of the Charter of our Revolution. Not to do so would be to be biased. And no fair-minded person can ignore the true facts of our activities in this connection in regard to the outside world.

Of course, the junta at Addis Ababa cannot be expected to be objective towards us. But we know what we are doing. The question is who do they think they can fool by their unfounded allegations against us.

Is it not something to be laughed at that Mengistu denied he sent his forces to invade the SDR, even while their traces were still fresh? Our recent talks with the USA have been dragged into the junta's argumentation. This is a red herring at best.

For how can this be tantamount to a declaration of war against Abyssinia. Does the principle of peaceful coexistence preclude cooperation between the Somali and American peoples?

But we know what is worrying Mengistu. He is simply itching for another excursion, although he might think twice this time before he will rush into our territory.

As for the allegation that the SDR has sold its sovereignty, of course, few people would need to be reminded of the way Ethiopia is used today as a springboard of aggression by a superpower and the presence of foreign troops there, in consequence of which there is chaos and instability in the Horn.

While we shall not budge from our avowed principles in our foreign policy, we are determined to safeguard our freedom and sovereignty in the full knowledge that self-defense is the only guarantee against foreign aggression.

NEW PARTY LEADERSHIP STRUCTURE--Dodoma--Vice chairman of the party Ndugu Aboud Jumbe has said Chama Cha Mapinduzi [COM] has established a new structure of party leadership in the forces to ensure that the party's control is fully observed in the forces. Opening the first party conference of the prison forces being held in Dodoma, the vice chairman sought to remove the fear of the forces commanders that the new party system in the forces would affect discipline. He said the intention of the COM in introducing this system in the forces is to build discipline in these organs, not to demolish it. Ndugu Jumbe stressed that in implementing the party's policy in the forces, officials at various levels in the forces are required to eliminate misunderstandings between them. There should also be no inconsistencies in the discharge of the responsibilities of the party and the carrying out of military duties. On the election of officials in the forces, as a result of the new system of party leadership in the forces established by the party in 1978, the party's vice chairman said officials who will be elected to hold various posts should be capable, good leaders and obedient to the party's instructions. The conference will elect 10 representatives, who will join the party's central committee in the prison forces and three other representatives of the executive committee. STRONGER SECURITY MEASURES IN KINSHASA URGED

AB061404 Kinshasa AZAP in French 0820 GMT 6 Sep 80

[Text] Kinshasa, 6 Sep (AZAP)--Peace and the unity of the country constitute basic goals of the policy of the second republic and have always been presented as the most eloquent and tangible results of leader Mobutu's actions. All development depends on them. And Zaire, which is engaged in war against underdevelopment in all its forms, will not tolerate an inch of its territory experiencing any form of insecurity.

It is within this context that the new authorities of Kinshasa on Thursday declared war on all unpatriotic elements who try to disturb the peace of the city. These bandits are coming back again in force after a long lull following the moving and resounding trial of Wallace and other vagabonds.

For some time now, the capital has been experiencing some agitation caused by these same people, who have no sense of human dignity and have made killing and stealing their daily job. The man on the street wonders who arms these assassins who commonly use all sorts of small arms in their macabre operations.

It has become necessary for the competent authorities to take the appropriate steps to face up to these heartless people so that order and security can be restored in the capital again. The issue facing the new municipal authorities comes down to this price because the capital is overflowing with all sorts of irregulars [irreguliers] and the unemployed as well. This class of people reduce the chances for success of any action taken by the city's authorities to improve the situation, and the contribution of these parasites to the effort for the country's revival is nil.

Security precautions should be reinforced and the people should redouble their vigilance in order to expose any enemies who might infiltrate our ranks to divert the people's attention from their real concerns. Precautions should also be taken so that excesses are avoided in carrying out any orders and security agents do not go beyond the limits required by public security.

In the recent past we have seen some unfortunate cases in which some troops called to keep order ended up terrorizing the people. Security agents should contribute actively to the maintenance of order and avoid collaborating with wrongdoers, who often turn out to be relatives they dare not denounce to the legal authorities.

Militants of the capital have the heavy responsibility, along with the government, to help the effort to establish security and order in Kinshasa. Only permanent vigilance will help confound the wrongdoers and render them harmless.

MUGABE HOLDS TALKS WITH MTOKO GUERRILLAS

PM Leads Delegation

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, today leads a Government, military and ZANU (PF) team to Mtoko, for meetings with ZANLA forces in assembly point X-ray, following the recent violence in the area in which two policemen were killed and another wounded.

Government sources said yesterday that Mr Mugabe, who would also address a ZANU (PF) rally, might meet commercial farmers, some of whom had threatened to leave the area because of the unrest.

Mr Mugabe's entourage includes ZANLA Commander Mr Rex Nhongo and the Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Mnangagwa, who is also in charge of State security, the sources said.

This would be Mr Mugabe's first known visit to an assembly point since independence, and the sources said this signified the importance he attached to the Mtoko situation.

Previously, visits to the assembly point had been undertaken by Mr Nhongo and other Government and ZANU (PF) leaders.

Spurred

Mr Mugabe would probably outline to the ZANLA soldiers the plans Government had for their resettlement and redeployment.

The onset of the rains has spurred the Government to redouble its efforts to find accommodation for the men, and a Cabinet committee has made recommendations on sites to house them.

The X-ray guerillas are expected to be among 15 000 to 17 000 men to be given temporary accommodation in Chitungwiza while awaiting the construction of new barracks.

Temporary accommodation has also been found for ZIPRA soldiers in Entubane, in Bulawayo.

Given Rousing Welcome

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Robert Mugabe, told a rally of 6 000 people in troubled Mtoko yesterday that the Government was working as quickly as possible to rectify injustices practised by the country's former white administration.

"We are bringing about changes at all levels of Government. The majority of the people must be seen to be operative in the Civil Service and even in commerce and industry," he said.

Mr Mugabe also received a rousing welcome from guerillas at the nearby X-ray assembly point later in the day. It was not known whether he addressed the men at length, or whether the recent murders of two Mtoko policemen, allegedly by guerillas from the camp, were discussed with the camp commanders.

It was the Prime Minister's first visit to an assembly point and interest in it was heightened because of the recent violence in Mtoko and police accusations that the camp commanders had poor control over their men.

However, local and foreign journalists were turned away from the assembly point gate by ZANLA soldiers.

Some of the journalists were told they would be arrested if they persisted in trying to enter the camp.

Later in the day a BBC team was admitted, apparently as part of a prior agreement, but the Prime Minister had already made his appearance in front of the guerillas and the team was only allowed to film some of the troops drilling.

The atmosphere in this once-productive tobacco-farming region has been tense ever since more than 1 000 ZANLA guerillas occupied the old Security Forces base at X-ray in May.

The situation reached a climax two weeks ago when two policemen were murdered and the police station in Mtoko was fired upon three nights in succession.

Since then talks between police and the X-ray camp commanders seemed to have calmed the situation. There have been no incidents since the police station was fired upon on September 6.

Last week ZANLA soldiers freely wandered the area, but they no longer carried their weapons. Patrol officers and constables were also seen on patrol without weapons.

Farmers in the area remained pessimistic, several saying that there were too few of them left to make farming in Mtoko viable even if X-ray were moved immediately.

Leaving

In the last two weeks 12 of the area's remaining 32 farmers have either left or announced that they would do so.

At the rally, Mr Mugabe urged the people to co-operate with police, but said that if the police exceeded their authority they would be dealt with. When he asked what particular problems the people had in the area there were shouts of "the police, the police".

"The police must be with the people and the people must co-operate with the police, but if the police don't co-operate with the people then down with the police," he said.

Mr Mugabe made no mention in his hour-long speech of the recent violence against police in Mtoko.

He congratulated the crowd on the unity Mtoko had shown behind ZANU (PF) and thanked the people for the sacrifices they had made during the war.

HEALTH MINISTER CRITICIZES WHITE STAFFERS

Emotion-Charged Meeting

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] There was a need for a fundamental change of attitude among white medical staff in Zimbabwe, the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, told an emotion-charged meeting of hospital staff at Andrew Fleming hospital yesterday.

Speaking to about 400 off-duty members from all grades, the Minister said the meeting was called to review the situation "as it was, as it is, and as it will be".

It was the attitudes among staff which affected the effective delivery of service to the patient. The white staff would have to accept change naturally or they would have it forced upon them, he said.

There was widespread discrimination in the medical services towards both black staff and patients. The Minister was loudly applauded when he said blacks had been made to feel inferior and there was a lack of promotion opportunities for them in all fields, from nursing to domestic work in the hospitals.

Dr Ushewokunze claimed certain members of the nursing staff were not prepared to nurse African children, and that some nurses, both black and white, had assaulted patients. These patients did not complain or fight back because they were simply unaware of their rights.

A white senior member of the nursing staff retorted: "Prove it."

Dr Ushewokunze continued that this attitude to patients must change or they would have to be protected — by law if necessary. Patients could also be given pamphlets when they arrived at a hospital, so they would know what their rights were and what they should expect from the nursing staff.

A comment from Dr Ushewokunze that, in general, the treatment given to blacks at the Andrew Fleming Hospital was inferior to that given to whites, drew a sharp reply from a young white male student nurse in the audience.

"Come and work here and look for yourself," said the man and got up and started walking out of the conference room.

DISMISSAL

"Get out, you're fired," shouted the Minister at the back of the departing man, to which he replied: "A pleasure, sir."

Applause followed Dr Ushewokunze's dismissal of the man.

The Minister said one of the things that appalled him was the way in which injured or sick "comrades" were treated. He quoted the case in which two men injured in a car crash in Mozambique were flown to the Andrew Fleming.

These men were refused admission to a ward in the hospital because the sister-in-charge said she had had relatives murdered by ZANLA forces. They were then transferred to the Central Hospital where they encountered similar antagonism, said the Minister.

To illustrate his point, Dr Ushewokunze showed a short film on the Chimoio raid. After the film had finished, he said: "I was there and I survived a terrible story. But would I be justified if I dwelt on Chimoio?"

The audience shouted back: "No."

The past mus be forgotten and the country should work together in the spirit of reconciliation which had been promoted by the Prime Minister, he said.

The movement from war to peace was a difficult one and he would not be true to the fallen guerillas if he tried to put the brakes on it, the Minister said.

"We are the custodians of human life and our prime concern should be the patient and not career advancement," he said.

He said he did not view every white as an enemy, but appealed to the staff to ensure that the hospital was run on a fair, non-racial basis.

Nurses Threaten Walkout

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

AN emergency meeting has been called for tomorrow at Salisbury's Andrew Fleming Hospital after threats of mass resignations by white nurses over criticisms of them by the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze.

The hospital's principal matron, Miss Frances Healey, sent out notices yesterday to call the meeting.

A student nurse at the hospital said last night: "The Minister has accused us of neglect of black patients and worse.

"None of these allegations are true. Treated this shabbily, some nurses feel there is no point in staying in the service. They want to leave straight away.

"Others say they'll wait and see what happens. But everyone is angry and upset.

"We work hard for very little reward and then have groundless accusations made against us.

Why should we stay?

"If we all leave there just won't be an Andrew Fleming hospital left."

week, Dr Ushewokunze said there was widespread discrimination in the medical services towards black staff and patients.

He said "certain members of the nursing staff" were not prepared to nurse African children, and alleged some nurses, both black and white, had assaulted patients.

He went on to show a film of the people wounded in the Chimoio raids.

The student nurses last night firmly denied the charge of discrimination.

One student said: "White nurses treat everyone equally. To say we neglect black patients and won't bath and change them is rubbish."

The students said they were prepared to accept secondment to Harare Hospital, as proposed by the Minister, provided they were treated fairly and equally there.

A sister at the hospital, which has nearly 600 beds, said: "The accusations were horrifying."

Another nurse said: "I have experience in other parts of the world and I can assure you the standards here are as high as anywhere."

Many of the student nurses were shocked by the film of the Chimoio raid. One said: "There are two sides to every story. The showing was totally unnecessary."

A black student nurse said Miss Healey had posted notices calling the meeting to discuss "the present situation".

She said white students had threatened to resign if they were sent to Harare Hospital. "Many of them did not like what was said," she added. "But the African students say the Minister stood up for our rights."

On the Minister's allegations of assaults, she said some sleeping or unconscious patients were manhandled by nurses in a rough manner. "That is not necessary," she said.

A Salisbury management expert, Colonel Michael Clarke, who gives lectures to black nurses on motivation and communication, complained to The Sunday Mail that the Minister was needlessly introducing racism to the hospital service.

He said: "It is an insult to a profession of compassionate and caring people who do their work out of love of patients — not for the financial rewards.

"The hatred and bitterness being provoked by the Minister will destroy the medical service in this country."

PM Urged To Gag Minister

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 14

[Editorial]

[Text] It really is about time the Prime Minister put a curb on the alarming activities of his Minister of Health, Dr Ushewokunze.

Mr Mugabe's policy of reconciliation stands no chance of success if this minister is allowed to storm round the country like a rogue elephant, denigrating the white members of the medical profession and making the wildest of accusations.

In a series of stage-managed tours of hospitals, he has reduced staff to tears, publicly criticised people who are in no position to defend themselves and subsequently gone a long way to undermining the whole medical infrastructure in the country.

His latest outburst, at Salisbury's Andrew Fleming Hospital, was typical. While issuing a string of allegations about discrimination by white staff against blacks, he was reported yesterday as saying that white and black nurses had assaulted patients.

This was an incredible and most serious statement to make and we call on the minister to prove what he said.

A few weeks ago he talked about "knife-happy doctors who think there are too many Africans walking the earth".

On Friday, Dr Ushewokunze showed a film on the raid on Chimoio during the war by Rhodesian security forces. What on earth was the point of that? Is this the spirit of reconciliation, when official policy is to draw a curtain over the past?

What would the Minister have said if one of his white audience produced a picture of the massacre of the families at Elim Mission?

Maybe in the past there has been racial discrimination in the government health service rank structure. Maybe there are wrongs and anomalies in the treatment of patients which should be righted. We are in no position to judge.

But there is a correct procedure for making change--through normal civil service channels. If the minister feels he has to speak directly to hospital staff he could at least be less emotional, more rational and constructive.

In Parliament the minister shows little or no sense of decorum and vilifies white MPs as often as possible. Thoughtful debate is something he seems to avoid.

Most Zimbabwe whites expect and are prepared to live with political and social change.

But for how long are they prepared to accept the behaviour of Dr Ushewokunze, who is apparently quite happy to ignore the dedicated service given over the years to all races by white members of our medical profession, in government and private practice?

He said on Friday he was not an enemy of whites. He has a strange way of showing it.

LABOR LEADERS CALL FOR ABOLITION OF INDUSTRIAL ACT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] Two leading trade unionists in Zimbabwe yesterday called for the abolition of the Industrial Conciliation Act.

They claimed it was not representative enough "to serve the interests of the majority of workers".

In an interview, the general secretary of the Commercial and Allied Workers' Union, Mr Shangwa Chifamba, said the Act should be abolished to reflect the change taking place in the country.

Under the Act trade unions had "very limited power and this should not be allowed to continue".

"We, as trade unionists, must have more effective powers in the solving of industrial grievances." Mr Chifamba also said the work of the present industrial officers "must be done by trade union officials".

"The role of industrial officers should be that of Government watchdogs who see that the industrial regulations are not violated either by employers or trade unions."

He urged the replacement of the industrial boards by "more effective councils which will be elected. At the moment the people on these councils are not elected. They are hand-picked."

The chairman of the recently formed Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions, Mr Alfred Makwarimba, said his organisation would like to see the Act changed immediately.

"It must be changed to give more room for trade unions to operate freely. We have not been operating freely in the past. Now that we are independent, this Act, which has a lot of restrictions on free trade union movement, must go.

"We cannot continue to operate under the same Act which was designed by previous racial governments."

He said the Act had over the years served white interests, which caused most blacks not to do apprenticeships in many "important fields".

"They did not do the apprenticeships because they could not be employed after the course."

Mr Makwarimba appealed to employers to cooperate with trade unions now that "we are a truly independent country. We must move forward together in unity."

He said his organisation would get "very tough" with employers who were not observing the Government's minimum wage. "Once we get them they will be in serious trouble."

TEKERE CALLS FOR FOREIGN TECHNICAL AID

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] Countries which made the guerillas' sophisticated weapons during the war were now to be asked to provide the modern technical assistance needed for progress, the Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Edgar Tekere, said in the House yesterday.

Mr Tekere said these countries could be expected to assist in rebuilding the economy during peacetime.

"To put it bluntly, if those who supplied AK47 rifles which caused lots of terror could supply us with such sophisticated weapons how could they not produce for us enough technology to get this country moving economically during peacetime?" he asked.

Mr Tekere rose to speak spontaneously when the $8m. vote for the Ministry of Manpower Planning and Development came up in Committee of Supply.

He said the Minister of Foreign Affairs had stated the Government would remember from where they got assistance when they "were still a bunch of terrorists out in the bush, as some people would call it".

Mr Tekere said there was a shortage of skilled manpower in Zimbabwe. It was necessary to recruit more skilled personnel but the question was from where they should be recruited.

"This may be a little controversial," he warned MPs. "We are not going to draw in expatriate expertise as it has been traditionally understood."

The Minister said there was a need to draw in people who would come in "on the same terms as we in Zimbabwe". It would be necessary to discuss this at the level of government to government, he said.

Mr Tekere said his Ministry had been "a new concept altogether" and as a result he had been able to attract bright people to it.

"It is my boast as a Minister that it is probably one of the topmost reflections of the process of revolution in this country."

But he added that he was not "selfish enough" to attribute that to his own ability as a Minister.

Mr Tekere said he could also boast about the composition of his Ministry in terms of race and sex.

"Because of this directional orientation I am also able to boast that it has achieved a great measure of efficiency."

Mr Tekere told MPs that he could be absent from his Military "without losing any sleep".

"The direction will not be lost," he said.

MUGABE OPENS NEW TRIANGLE ETHANOL PLANT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] THE Government would soon want to know from private enterprise whether the role of industrial workers was being fully recognised, the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, said yesterday when he opened the $4 million Triangle ethanol plant.

Mr Mugabe said the Government intended to examine whether the following principles had gained acceptability "in each and every" private enterprise:

- The minimum wage structure and general level of wages and other conditions of service;
- The existing training facilities and how much workers were being exposed to them and to the process of progressive improvement;
- The organisation of workers' committees and the role they played;
- The participation of workers in the decision-making process and the extent of that participation.
- The plans that existed to raise Africans to managerial levels;
- The opportunities for worker participation in share-holding where share equity existed.

The Government believed workers must be encouraged to develop a sense of belonging in every enterprise so they could be motivated into being more productive while at the same time acquiring a greater sense of responsibility, he said.

The Government was calling for "a revolution" in the approach to labour by private enterprise.

Often one encountered labour situations in Zimbabwean industries which were "reminiscent of the labour conditions of 19th century Britain", Mr Mugabe said. Such situations were "obviously a contradiction of the qualitative transformation that has occurred in regard to the technological base of our industry and the modern trend to the adoption of new production techniques".

The country could not afford the luxury of strikes at this crucial stage of its economic reconstruction, Mr Mugabe said.

"Let us remember that a contented worker produces a contented manager, and a contented manager a contented industry. I am glad that the dispute which existed here (at Triangle) has now been amicably resolved."

The ethanol plant was built at a cost of $4 million — of which less than one quarter was foreign currency. Tanks and columns were built by local contractors, while pipe work was entirely fabricated on site.

The plant was now producing "very high quality" ethanol which was being produced at a rate of about 120 000 litres a day — equivalent to 40 million litres a year, or about 15 percent of Zimbabwe's petrol requirements, Mr Mugabe said.

TEKERE GUARDS' BAIL TERMS EASED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] With police permission, the seven bodyguards of Cabinet Minister Mr Edgar Tekere may leave the Salisbury house to which they have been confined while on bail on allegations of murder and attempted murder.

A judge gave this ruling after it had been argued that there was no scope for entertrainment at the house in Alderson Avenue, St Martins.

An application to vary the bail of the seven bodyguards was made at the High Court in Salisbury before Sir Hugh Beadle on Thursday.

In a judgment yesterday Sir Hugh said the application was to allow the men to move freely within a radius of 20 km of Salisbury Post Office.

He pointed out that he could not alter the bail conditions unless some new circumstances came to light.

One of the grounds of the application was that there was no provision for entertainment at the St Martins house, as the area to which the men were confined was not large.

The State argued that there had been no alteration to the house since the order was made.

While agreeing with this submission, Sir Hugh pointed out it was an accepted principle of the law that a prisoner awaiting trail should be allowed the maximum liberty consistent with the satisfaction of the State that he will present himself for trial on the due date.

"One does not want any conditions of bail to bear unduly hardly on unconvicted prisoners . . ." the judge said.

He offered a suggestion to which he understood the State had no objection.

"I suggest, therefore, that the order remains in force, except that in any special circumstances, whatever that may be, whether it is to attend some special entertainment or to receive medical attention, the investigating officer may give permission for the particular accused to leave the premises," Sir Hugh said.

"The order is therefore altered to that effect--subject to the investigating officer being authorised to give permission for any particular accused to leave the premises for any purpose which he considers justifiable."

He pointed out that, although it did not appear in the order, there was nothing to prevent visitors from going to the St Martins house.

He also granted permission for the seven men to leave the house to go to their attorneys' offices for consultation, provided they travelled by the shortest direct route.

SITHOLE SEEKS HOUSING FOR EX-GUERRILLAS

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] ZANU leader the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole yesterday called for a concerted effort to solve the problem of ex-guerillas housed in assembly points.

The APs, originally designed as "cooling chambers", had become "boiling points of frustration" for those who had fought in the liberation struggle.

Addressing a party central committee meeting Mr Sithole said the guerillas had become "frustrated and embittered" by being confined in what, for them, had become concentration camps.

Those it was not possible to integrate into the new national army should be retired as soldiers and given the means to support themselves, he said.

The Government should also help guerillas wishing to further their education or training. Those with former professions and trades should be helped to make a new start.

Instead of being kept in camps, the guerillas should be allowed to return home, giving parents, relatives and friends the chance to help rehabilitate them.

Mr Sithole condemned kangaroo courts and country-wide armed intimidation, political murders and abductions.

"These do not help to instil, internally and externally, confidence in this country and lack of confidence and stability is no good for the politics and economy of the nation."

NEW HOMES PLEDGED TO AP MEN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THE City Council has agreed to provide hundreds of its new houses at Entumbane, North-Western Commonage, for assembly point guerillas.

The acting Mayor, Councillor Doug Rowland, said yesterday: "Bulawayo City Council is happy to assist where it can. I do not anticipate any problems. With Bulawayo's record of co-operation and commonsense I feel sure the whole exercise will go smoothly."

The Town Clerk, Mr Ian Edmeades, said: "This (the homeless state of the soldiers in assembly points) is of general concern to us all. In due course the Ministry will tell us what numbers they want us to accommodate."

The first approach to the council was a telephone call last week from the Deputy Secretary for Local Government and Housing, Mr Leslie Brown, "who asked if we could assist the Government in its predicament", Mr Edmeades said.

"He explained accommodation would be needed for a temporary period only, until the army could provide other accommodation. He made it clear it was a stop-gap measure and estimated it could be for about three months."

The urgency of the matter was to get the soldiers housed before the rains came. Mr Edmeades said.

"On Wednesday morning a delegation of four Cabinet Ministers flew to Bulawayo and discussed the plan with Mr Rowland, Councillor Eugene Gordon, and myself. We took them to one of the new villages in the Entumbane housing area and they looked over it.

"We said we could make new housing units available at the rate of about 300 a month."

The four Ministers were Mr Eddison Zvobgo, Minister of Local Government and Housing; Senator Enos Nkala, Minister of Finance; Mr Clement Muchachi, Minister of Works, and Mr Ernest Kadungure, Minister of Transport and Power.

They were accompanied by their aides.

When Bulawayo officials asked if the soldiers would bring their guns they were told: "They are soldiers. They have their guns at the moment," said Mr Edmeades.

The housing sector to be allocated would be completely fenced and gated.

"There will, apparently, be an armoury within the fenced area, and after that it is a matter for the military. We were told that it is normal for soldiers to have their guns with them," he said.

The Joint High Command would not comment on the move. It is understood army headquarters regards the temporary housing of assembly point soldiers as a Government problem.

RF FIGHTS TO KEEP 'WATCHDOG' TESTS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 6

[Text] THE Rhodesian Front yesterday refused to support moves by the Government to lower minimum qualifications for members of three constitutional watchdog bodies to enable the appointment of more blacks.

In his second reading speech on the Constitution Amendment Bill, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, Senator Simbi Mubako, said: "When these amendments come into force our constitution will have been adjusted in such a way as to make every citizen of Zimbabwe feel that the constitution is for all people and that more people can aspire to the various positions which were formally reserved for a small section of the community."

His remarks were greeted by shouts of "the racists" by some black backbenchers.

The RF opposed the Bill, which is the first amendment sought for Zimbabwe's five-month-old constitution, on a voice count. But, outnumbered 42-13, they did not call a division they appeared certain to lose.

Throughout the following prolonged and heated debate between angry RF MPs and Ministers and backbenchers, UANC leader Bishop Abel Muzorewa and Patriotic Front MPs sat impassively without intervening.

The UANC holds three of the 80 black seats in the 100-member house and Dr Joshua Nkomo's PF holds 20.

Any amendment to the constitution, in terms of the Lancaster House Agreement, requires 70 votes in the House of Assembly to be passed into law.

The ruling ZANU (PF) holds an overall majority of 57 seats, but needs 13 more votes to ensure it has its way on a constitutional alteration.

RF member Mr Chris Andersen, a former Minister of Justice, urged the house to resist "change for the sake of expediency to meet a temporary inconvenience". He argued that a case had not been made showing that suitably qualified Zimbabweans could not be found to fill the posts.

The outspoken Minister of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo, called out : "They are there. They are all white."

Mr Andersen replied: "That is simply not true," but Mr Zvobgo persisted, charging that the Senate Legal Committee was "under white minority rule".

The amendment seeks to lower appointment qualifications for members of the Senate Legal Committee, the Public Service Commission and the Judicial Services Commission.

At present only people qualified for seven years to practice as advocates or attorneys, or who have been magistrates for seven years, are eligible for appointment to the Senate Legal Committee.

Senator Mubako said the Government considered the seven-year requirement "excessive". Five years' experience was sufficient, and "the President of Zimbabwe should have the power to define other legal qualifications as suitable".

"That means that the ZANU (PF) can do it," Mr Donald Goddard (RF, Lundi) interjected.

Senator Mubako said it was also felt the requirement that the chairman of the Public Service Commission must have held specified high posts for a minimum of five years was "unnecessarily high". He believed that three years would be sufficient.

The Government also disagreed with the ruling that a judge who had been a member of government or local government within the preceding three years be disqualified from appointment to the Judicial Services Commission.

The disqualification was inappropriate in the case of a person sufficiently well respected and trusted to be appointed a judge, and the amendment sought to remove it.

"I believe the amendments are necessary to correct what I consider to be the faults in the Constitution to make positions created by the Constitution more accessible to a larger section of the community," he said.

Mr Andersen argued that the move would jeopardise credibility in the Constitution, which was the foundation of stability.

The RF was not differing for the sake of opposition, "but in the spirit of seeking to offer a constructive contribution towards the good government of our country," he said.

"In considering the proposed amendments to the Constitution the overriding question we have asked ourselves is whether they are necessary or desirable to ensure good government. We have reached the conclusion that they are not.

"I need hardly say how important it is to us and, I am sure, Government, that the integrity of the judiciary should be maintained and that the efficiency of the civil service should be of the highest order. Our attraction to outside investors must depend largely on the quality of our public service," he said.

Advocate Godfrey Chidyausiku (ZANU - PF, Mashonaland East) accused the RF of setting up the commissions at the time of the Government of National Unity headed by Bishop Abel Muzorewa to keep power out of black hands.

"That is why the qualifications are so high — so that no African would get appointments and they would retain power in the hands of whites, though they might have a black Prime Minister and Cabinet Ministers," he said.

The purpose of the Bill was to try to broaden the commissions to include some blacks, so that the Government would be seen to be governing.

INCOME-PRICE COMMISSION BEGINS INQUIRY

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 11

[Text] The chairman of the Commission of Inquiry on Incomes, Prices and Conditions of Service, Mr Roger Riddell, said yesterday the commission would start advertising its activities in the media today.

"We would like to make known our aims and objectives so that we can get full co-operation from the public during our inquiries," he said.

Mr Riddell was sworn in along with seven other members of the commission on Wednesday.

He obtained his BSc Economics degree at the University of Zimbabwe in 1973 and did a post-graduate diploma in Pastoral Theology at Heythrop College, University of London.

This was followed by a Master of Philosophy in Development Studies at the University of Sussex. He completed this in Zimbabwe with a dissertation, The Land Problem in Rhodesia.

He worked until recently with the Catholic Institute for International Relations in London as an economic research officer.

Papers

His major publications include: The poverty datum line as a wage-fixing standard (in conjunction with Mr P. S. Harris); and The urban poverty datum line for Rhodesia (in conjunction with Miss V. S. Cubitt).

Of the other members, Mr Xavier Kadhani, is a lecturer with the Economics Department of the University of Zimbabwe, specialising in labour economics.

He has a BA Social Studies (Economics) degree from the University of York and obtained a Master's degree in Philosophy in Development Studies at the University of Sussex last year.

Mr Albert John Lister Lewis was born and educated in Zimbabwe and trained as a chartered accountant in London. He has practised in Bulawayo since 1945 and is a senior partner of a firm of auditors.

Mr Lewis has had considerable experience as chairman of industrial boards and in providing secretarial and accounting service to two trade unions and an industrial council since 1963.

Mr Edwin Murwira Nyashanu is chairman of ZANU (PF) Midlands, secretary of the interim committee of the Zimbabwe Congress of Trade Unions and a director of ZTV.

Mr Mtshele Loyola Sidile obtained his BSc (Social Science) at the University of South Africa and went on to study at the University of Adelphi in the United States where he obtained a Master's Degree in social work.

He is now a senior community services officer with the Bulawayo City Council. He has been chairman of the Bulawayo Municipal Workers' Union for nine years.

Degrees

Sister Mary Aquina graduated from the University of Zimbabwe in 1959 and later did her MA and PhD at the Universities of Manchester and Oxford respectively.

She has lectured at the School of Social Work in Salisbury and at the university. She undertook extensive research work throughout Zimbabwe resulting in the publication of eight books and numerous articles.

She has also worked for two years with UNESCO.

Mr James Sinclair, a farmer, is vice-president of the Commercial Farmers' Union.

He was educated at Bishop's, Cape Town and at Gwebi College.

Mr Sinclair became the Norton representative on the Salisbury Area Cattle Committee in 1972 and later became chairman of the Norton Farmers' Association and the Salisbury Area Cattle Committee.

He was elected chairman of the Cattle Producers' Association in 1978.

PRESIDENT RAPS 'COLONIAL ASPECT' OF CHURCH

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] PRAISING the vital and "dangerous" watchdog role played by the Roman Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace, President Banana yesterday criticised the Western, institutionalised and colonial aspect of the Church in Zimbabwe.

Opening the Catholic commission's annual meeting at the University of Zimbabwe, the President traced its work in exposing massive ignorance, misinformation and deformation of truth during the past struggle.

"The Church as a whole had a definitive 'Good Samaritan' role to play in society and the Justice and Peace Commission played this role by making the fate of victims of war a public issue of paramount importance," he said.

He recalled among other things the "clear stance for social justice" taken by the Catholic Sister Janice in 1977 in supporting the changes which freedom fighters were trying to bring about.

The commission had been dubbed a "subversive, disreputable and biased" organisation by the then government because it had taken a prophetic role.

The President said: "This is how they persecuted the prophets before you."

He said a most important aspect of the Christian message had been disregarded in Zimbabwe. The Church was supposed to be one with the people, and especially the poor.

However, it seemed that "highly organised church structures" had become a barrier between the Church and the people. Impressive "fortresses" or buildings were set up in poor countries where most of the people went hungry.

The Church should have ceased to be a "Western church" and become the church of the people. By becoming independent from Western domination it would have become the universal church of all men and races.

President Banana said national liberation had caught some churches "napping": overburdened with a colonial image and dragging their feet with regard to change.

A speedy process of mental decolonisation should be started to foster the promotion of African culture, idioms and values and "indigenising the leadership of the Church" at various levels.

"A Zimbabwean church will identify with the people, without losing anything of its universality."

The President said the Justice and Peace Commission and the Church could make a meaningful contribution towards the development of the country.

It was important for the commission to identify the enemies of the people. The Church had a responsibility to learn the global situation in which justice was denied and travestied, and peace was threatened.

The denial of human rights and democratic principles in South Africa, through the obnoxious system of apartheid, defied the dignity of men everywhere, he said.

ROLE OF MULTINATIONALS DISCUSSED

Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Terry Blocksidge]

[Text] PLUNDERERS or providers? This is the two-sided picture of the multinational companies at the heart of Zimbabwe's economy.

Until the issue is resolved, the Government is determined to curb a wild rush at the country's riches, certainly by newcomers.

That circumspection by the politicians is, in the eyes of the businessmen, a brake on investment and development of the country.

"The entrepreneurs are mistaken if they think they can exploit this country without control," says a senior Government man. "This is a new country and we are looking for a new solution."

A spokesman for a multinational says: "We have a social conscience. The big companies opened up and developed this country. We brought health, education and wealth to the people here, not the missionaries."

Two big multinationals, Anglo American and Lonrho, between them employ about 45 000 workers in Zimbabwe.

Rio Tinto Mining (Zimbabwe) Ltd, a locally incorporated company, employs nearly 5 000 workers.

From their involvement in mining and agriculture where communities have grown, the total number of dependants is estimated at 250 000.

LONRHO

A Rio Tinto spokesman says: "The siting of mines in remote areas caused the group to spend large sums of money on the construction of dams, roads, housing, health facilities and other social amenities.

"The mines have become growth points and, in most cases, towns have grown up around them."

All the giant companies have similar developments and services.

Rio gives free housing to all mine employees. It has health facilities, free medical care for the lower paid, semi-skilled and unskilled, and the rest of the workers can join the company's medical insurance plan.

With junior schools at all the mines, Rio reckons to have more than 3 300 pupils in classrooms at present.

Mr George Julyan, general manager at the Wankie Colliery — part of the Anglo group — recently told a visiting party: "I spend more time on running the community than mining coal!"

Wankie is a company town. "The company owns everything here from the paving stones to the hospital," says Mr Julyan.

aac

It employs midwives at the start of life and a carpenter to make the coffins at its end. Schools, hospitals, clinics, clubs, bars, property for supermarkets provide the services for the time in between.

Apprenticeships were naturally introduced. Today, adult literacy schemes have become part of the picture, reminiscent of the Workers' Education Association that encouraged schemes of Britain in the 20s and 30s.

Rio set up a foundation in 1974 to develop education and practical training. The foundation was financed by a grant of 2 000 000 Rio Tinto shares given by the parent company in Britain. It is more than 10 percent of the total issued share capital of RTMZ.

The foundation is financing a hostel for black apprentices at the Bulawayo Technical College, a secondary school in Zhombe, and a farming and building centre which will be the first of several throughout the country.

LONRHO

Grants towards technical education are provided, and scholarships in engineering and agriculture are awarded annually to University of Zimbabwe undergraduates.

Not all enterprises make money all the time. Says one top executive: "I've got 5 000 men in one of our agricultural enterprises. At present I'm subsidising them by $250 000."

The sugar estate at Hippo Valley suffered a series of losses until the world market improved.

"You must be a large company to sustain that sort of situation," says an executive. "And don't forget the sugar prices could slump at any time."

The interests of the multinationals in Zimbabwe go beyond mining. They are involved in manufacturing, real estate, insurance, among others. Lonrho is the country's biggest coffee producer and runs its biggest beef herd.

But mining has become the country's biggest earner of foreign currency. Mr Ken van der Plank, chief executive of the Chamber of Mines, says: "Other ways in which the country benefits are from income taxes, and the employment and wealth created which ripples through the communities."

He says: "The industry requires a lot of capital, a considerable amount of equipment, which must be imported, and expertise. The multinationals have the means to organise such finance, and also to market exports outside the country."

Developing a medium-size mine costs about $30 million.

Mr Van der Plank adds: "If you look at the multinationals here, they are committed to Zimbabwe. They are not British, Americans or South Africans trying to get what they can at best advantage.

"They are looking for profits, sure, but they have a stake in the economy here."

Most executives deny any form of price suppression — Zimbabwe's mineral exports are sold at world prices — and they insist the multinationals compete too fiercely against each other to fix prices.

aac

There is not, however, a payment to the Government for minerals extracted from the country like the crude barrelage paid to the oil countries.

An organisation of mineral export countries, similar to OPEC, is discounted by the executives but may have appeal to some countries.

One executive sums up: "In the end, it must always come down to a question of: If you're putting money in, can you take money out?"

A Government official comments: "We're not going to be raped."

It seems likely that the expansion of the economy will, at least in the first place, involve multinationals already established in Zimbabwe. They have a major stake, financial and community-spirited.

As football teams took the field across Zimbabwe yesterday, Mr Van der Plank said: "Look to any sport and see how many sportsmen and women have come through the facilities provided by the major concerns. That is typical of their involvement."

BISHOP LAMONT DEPLORES SECRET EXECUTIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 10

[From the Letters to the Editor]

[Text] SIR — In the Herald (October 30 1976), a Rhodesia Front Minister was reported as saying that he did not know if his Government did not release the names of people who had been sentenced to death and hanged, and he added the incredibly callous remark: "Anyway it is academic, because they are normally dead after it".

The present Minister of Justice and Constitutional Affairs, whom I regard as a friend, is reported in the Herald (September 3), as saying that it was accepted policy never to reveal the number of people sentenced to death.

I find it hard to believe that this Minister, a man of compassion and high academic achievement, has been correctly reported.

Surely things have changed or must change soon? Surely our new Government does not intend to continue to execute people in secret?

If so, it deserves to be condemned as roundly as was the previous regime which earned the contempt of the civilised world and the particular castigation of the International Commission of Jurists.

+DONAL LAMONT,
Bishop of Umtali.

BRIEFS

UANC TO CONTEST ELECTIONS--The United African National Council (UANC) announced yesterday that it will take part in the forthcoming local government and district elections, but warned that it could withdraw if voting was not by secret ballot. A statement issued in Salisbury yesterday accused ZANU (PF) of applying "dirty tricks" in order to win votes. The statement also questioned the Government decision reducing rental charges for lodgers in former African townships to a maximum of $7,50 while those living in formerly European areas such as Southerton, Lochinvar, Houghton Park, Ardbennie, and other areas were left unaffected. The Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU), led by the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole last week announced it would not take part in the elections, alleging irregularities in the ZANU (PF) campaign tactics. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1]

ZAPU DENIES ATTACK--The Patriotic Front (ZAPU) "vigorously" denied any part in Thursday's shooting and grenade attack at Chitungwiza, Salisbury, in which a man was killed and nine other injured. Five gunmen said to be wearing PF T-shirts were reported to have opened fire on a crowd of about 400 ZANU (PF) supporters holding a meeting near the former township's Kubatana beerhall. They also threw a grenade. One eyewitness said that immediately before the attack the men advanced on the crowd shouting: "We are going to kill you." A statement issued by Mr M. Nziramasanga, of the PF's information and publicity office said Patriotic Front cadres were under strict orders not to interfere with meetings held by other political parties. Any suggestion that the PF was involved was an attempt to cover up what had been established to be a faction fight involving another political party, he said. Police investigations into the incident are still continuing. [Text] [Salisbury THE SUNDAY MAIL in English 14 Sep 80 p 1]

CHINA SIGNS AID PACKAGE--China yesterday gave its first $17,5 million in aid to Zimbabwe through an interest-free loan to be used to finance joint projects, as well as technical and economic co-operation. The agreement was signed in Salisbury by the Chinese Vice-Minister of Economic Relations with Foreign Countries, Mr Li Ke, and Zimbabwe's Deputy Minister of Finance, Dr Oliver Munyaradzi. Finance Minister Senator Enos Nkala was out of the city on business. The aid package is known as a commodity aid deal, by which the loan is tied to joint projects, goods bought from China and co-operation agreements. Mr Li, speaking through an interpreter, said the deal highlighted the friendly relations between the two countries. Dr Munyaradzi said the agreement represented "the fulfillment of our years of co-operation in the military struggle. We are putting down the guns and picking up the pen and hope to work hard for the reconstruction of our country." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 3]

NEW LUNDI DIOCESE--The Anglican Synod of Matabeleland yesterday voted overwhelmingly in favour of establishing a Midlands diocese, to be called the Diocese of Lundi. The synod of the Diocese of Mashonaland will debate and vote this morning on whether it too should divide into two dioceses by creating a new Diocese of Manicaland. Midlands is at present part of the Diocese of Matabeleland. The vote was taken after more than three hours of debate by the 150 delegates on whether the move would strengthen or weaken the Church. TEKERE PROTEST IN COURT--Cabinet Minister Mr Edgar Tekere walked out of a courtroom at Salisbury Magistrates' Court yesterday in protest against a State application to have his case held in camera. The magistrate, Mr J. Makhaza, ordered the court be cleared--but members of the Press remained seated. As lawyers discussed the application after the magistrate had left the bench, Mr Tekere left his seat in the public gallery and started to protest. He said loudly: "I want one thing--if I am a bandit I am a bandit. I have been a public figure for over 20 years and I am going to be a rogue in open. "I am charged for murder in time of war and war is the greatest equaliser of men. Do not get me equalised here." Mr Tekere then left the court followed by the Minister of Mines, Mr Maurice Nyagumbo, and a defence counsel, who persuaded him to return. When the court resumed--in open--Mr Makhaza indicted Mr Tekere and seven of his bodyguards direct to the High Court in Salisbury, to appear on September 22. The eight are facing allegations of murder and attempted murder in connection with the death of a farmer. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 13 Sep 80 p 1]

TEKERE HEARD IN ASSEMBLY--Mr Edgar Tekere took his seat on the Government front bench in the House of Assembly yesterday, wearing a battledress-type suit, when the $8m. vote for the Ministry of Manpower Planning and Development came up in committee of supply. None of the 32 MPs present rose to ask questions as the committee chairman put the vote for discussion but Mr Tekere himself volunteered a policy statement in which he attacked Zimbabwe's "evil yesterday" in the sphere of manpower utilisation, and he repeatedly expressed his pride in his newly created Ministry. Concluding his speech, which was received in silence, he told the House: "Finally, I think I owe an explanation to Members here." Said Mr Tekere: "I am standing before you as a man who has just come out of prison. I still belong there. "A lot has been written about me. Fine. I am a rogue. The day for reckoning is coming. Thank you." Mr Tekere then sat down and there was silence when the chairman called for further debate. Mr Tekere's vote was then approved without objection and the Minister rose and left the Chamber immediately.--Iana [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 1]

FARM SCHEME--The Government has not yet been able to implement its plan for collective farming in the rural areas because of the scarcity of land "caused by restrictive clauses in the Constitution", Mr Simbarashe Makoni, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, said yesterday. Interviewed by the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation, Mr Makoni said co-operative farming would be introduced when land was available and when "the people have the desire to participate" in such schemes, Iana reports. About 90 farms had already been acquired by the Government for resettlement, he said, adding that the most advanced resettlement plans had been implemented in the Victoria Province where about 500 families had been settled. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees was providing funds for the purchase of maize seed, fertiliser and farming implements to help peasant farmers who had suffered both from drought and the war. NEW ARMY BARRACKS--A battalion of the Zimbabwe national army is to be based in [word missing] barracks to be built outside Mrewa village. A spokesman for the High Command declined to comment on the project yesterday, but workmen have already started laying a water main to the proposed site, which nestles between two hills a few kilometres west of the village. According to a Mrewa source, the new barracks will be on the same scale as Llewellin Barracks, near Bulawayo. A battalion's strength is normally 1 000 men. MINISTER RETURNS FROM KOREA--The Minister of Information and Tourism, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, returned to Salisbury yesterday after a week's visit to Korea. He was accompanied by Mr Justin Nyoka, a senior official in the Ministry of Information, and Mr Dominic Mandizha, a director of the Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation. The team is understood to have signed a number of agreements related to the development of Heroes' Acre, the erection of statues and monuments, and co-operation in the dissemination of information. LAST LOAD OF REFUGEES--The last convoy of 627 Zimbabwean refugees left here yesterday for Salisbury aboard 11 Zambian buses. They were mainly adults and their younger children who fled Rhodesia during the war. A spokesman for the Zambia Christian Refugee Service of the World Lutheran Federation, which has been repatriating the refugees in conjunction with the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, said that any remaining adult refugees would have to make their own travel arrangements with the UNHCR. The Christian Refugee Service has been transporting about 1 000 refugees a week since it stepped up its operation last month.--Iana-AP [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 12 Sep 80 p 1]

ZAMBIAN DISTRICTS SUFFER RESULTS OF SOUTH AFRICAN RAIDS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 14 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Arthur Simuchoba: "The Plight of Imusho People"]

[Text]

MAURADING South African soldiers have on several occasions violated and even occupied Zambian territory. That these soldiers of apartheid are fighting a losing battle is amply demonstrated by the recent nationalist victory in Zimbabwe.

But then, their frequent expeditions into Zambia have created a very serious situation in two districts of the Western Province.

As a result of South African raids accompanied by looting and harassment of the populace, normal life has virtually broken down in parts of Senanga and Sesheke districts.

Reports compiled by the Catholic secretariat, a body that has shown a keen interest in alleviating the people's misery, talk of "starvation, malnutrition, malaria, lack of clothing and a continuing sense of insecurity", in the areas.

"The people," notes one report, "are really suffering."

Imusho, a locality of 2,000 people near the Namibian border in the Sesheke district is among the worst hit.

The situation is described as "critical" around Sinjembela in the same district. There are reports of starvation, disease and misery in Sioma, Kaunga Mashi, Mutomena, Mulele and Nalukanda areas in the Senanga district. All together at least 25,000 people are said to be affected.

According to reports by the Catholic missionaries in the area, Imusho is not exactly a booming area even in the best of times. Situated about 176 km east of Sesheke boma, the area is said to be semi-desert and very poor.

The major source of income for local people was from selling fish to Government workers. Early last year, most of these workers fled the area for fear of South African troops.

The fascist troops, for their part, have systematically looted and robbed the villagers of what few possessions they had. Today therefore the situation in the area is pretty grim.

The main problem has been identified as starvation. The people are not merely hungry but are now dying of malnutrition.

The district public health coordinator, Mr A.S. Sinonge reported having seen three children die of malnutrition during a tour of the area in June.

Further, a survey carried out by this officer revealed that malnutrition was increasing particularly among children. Out of 251 children examined, 184 were found to be malnourished.

Marasmus, lack of enough food, was the most common type of malnutrition diagnosed. Even the adult population is suffering from the same ailment.

Killer

There are many cases of enlarged spleens in children. Of the 251 examined 200 had enlarged spleens. Deaths are frequent. between January and May this year, 36 people died mainly from malnutrition and more have died since. The average death rate is put at one to two per week.

Although malnutrition is the leading killer other diseases, such as malaria, measles, whooping cough, pneumonia and diarrhoea are also exacting a toll.

The rural health centre in the area was looted and damaged by the fascist troops. The area is virtually cut-off due to the many landmines planted by the boers and their bushmen collaborators.

As a result getting food supplies to the area is a logistical nightmare. The people have not cultivated since 1978 because of harassment by South African soldiers from occupied Namibia.

People are known to have fed and in some cases are still feeding on wild watermelons and seasonal wild fruits. In early June, 30 bags of maize were sent to the area as famine relief. With the assistance of the Zambia National Defence Force personnel they reached the area. But somewhat suprisingly they were for sale at K10.61n each.

Not many people could afford that price.

Destitute

In a report on the situation prepared in June, Sister Mary Luke, Medical Officer in Charge of Sesheke, had this to say about this maize: "Some of the 30 bags are still lying there unsold while people are dying."

A few individuals did however, afford some. But they became "businessmen" reselling it to the destitute people in small cups. They ended up realising an extra "profit" of K8.39 per bag.

Food and disease are not the only problem. There is also the problem of clothing: people are reported to be walking half naked. Most of the population has been reduced to the stage of putting on a small cloth to cover only their nakedness.

Noted the district health coordinator: "One cannot definitely believe that the people of Imusho are Zambians and live in Zambia, where all of us live. It is very disheartening to see a lady moving almost naked."

From all accounts the clothing situation is critical. It is said that if a woman manages to find a torn blanket she uses it as a chitenge to cover herself while her chest remains bare.

The same applies to men and children.

But this does not appear to be the way people dress usually in the area. Evidence of this, is the reported clamour by the people to exchange their chickens and some of their remaining possessions for long and short trousers each time people from outside visited the area.

Commodities such as salt and soap are hardly available. "Some very kind army officers had to give soap to children and even take 10 or 15 children down to the river and bath them for the first and last time in their lives," wrote the district heath coordinator in his report.

Sinjembela in the same district is also in misery. There is reported to be a lot of malnutrition cases, scabies, leprosy, sore eyes, septic wounds and malaria and there have been no vaccinations in the area.

Reports the refugee department of the Catholic secretariat: "The clothing situation in the area is very critical. Most of the people had hardly any clothes while most of the children were naked. We managed to distribute material for clothing to the mothers who had nothing."

The primary school in the area is virtually deserted. All the teachers fled the area fearing for their lives. And the school had to close indefinitely not until one patriotic teacher, Mr Mutomena, volunteered to come from Kaoma was to reopen.

Impressed

He is all by himself and since the school is a full primary school with Grades One to Seven, he has to teach all the classes.

Of this courageous teacher, the Catholic secretariat report had this to say: "All of us were really impressed to see patriotism, selflessness and commitment for fellow men in Mr Mutomena. He is suffering together with fellow beings by volunteering to be with them. He has really shown rare qualities and patriotism."

The school which he runs is under-enrolled for obvious reasons and has only a few desks. The rest were destroyed by the invaders when they raided the area.

The situation in the area appears to be extremely critical. An officer of the refugee department of the Catholic Church had this to say on the general situation there: "I did not believe for once that such sufferings were in Zambia and that the people were really Zambians. They have resorted to eating roots of certain trees, which they showed me and I brought some back.

"The situation is very grim indeed in that more than half of the population are children."

Starvation

In Senanga starvation and disease have rendered the population in the affected areas destitute. Early in May this year a team of three officials from the Mongu branch of the Red Cross visited the area to assess the situation there.

They were flown to the Kalenga area by the Zambia' Air Force and this is what they had to say:

"Three villages in this area were burnt to ashes. What could not be burnt was broken. The villagers have been left with practically nothing, except what they had on them at the time of the attack. They sleep in the open air, near the plain which is infected with mosquaitoes."

The report adds that the people are still insecure. They are reluctant to settle in places for fear of encountering the enemy. So they stick close to the unhealth plain.

Again food is reported to be the major problem here. At least 8,335 people have been displaced in the area. The situation has been accentuated by the arrival of at least 200 refugees from Angola.

Everywhere in the affected areas the story is of starvation, disease, lack of clothing and medical care. According to the Catholic secretariat short term plans should revolve on urgently providing medicines, particularly antibiotics, bandages and vitamins. There is need for food such as rice, groundnuts, dried fish, mealie meal, skimed milk, beans, flour and biscuits.

Also urgently required are second-hand clothes for men, women and children. In the long term it is proposed that since the affected people are not refugees but proper Zambians they should be provided with vegetable seeds, onions, tomatoes and maize seeds free of charge to help them return to a normal life.

Task

Already the Catholic Church is very active in the area. They distribute as far as possible mealie meal, clothing, beans and other foodstuffs. Catholic nuns in the area are also active treating people as far as possible.

The task is, however, a very hard one in view of the uncleared landmines in the area. In fact, those with first hand information say that a helicopter preferably belonging to a neutral organisation is very neccessary if the people are to be helped.

In the absence of such a "chopper" however, the 25-ton truck and trailer belonging to the Catholic secretariat has began a shuttle between Zimbabwe, Botswana and Zambia to bring in the neccessary supplies for the displaced people.

Apart from the Catholics other relief organisations have come to aid. Oxfam, the British relief agency has already donated K9,500 for the purchase of supplies and some of the food that has been distributed was bought from this generous doanation.

The Zambia armed forces too are said to be doing a very commendable job there. In fact, it was the officers of ZNDF who first reported "an epidemic," in the area and without them the little assistance that has trickled through to the area would not have reached the affected people at all.

What is disheartening to those attempting to do something about the matter is the Government's slow response to what is obviously an urgent matter. Several reports have been made about the situation and there have been calls to declare the areas national disaster areas.

But the Government has been quiet on the issue. In some ways the Government's silence is understandable.

The situation that has arisen in the Western Province is sensitive and an open declaration of a national disaster would by some analysis be tactically unsound.

But the sensitivity of the matter is certainly no excuse for inaction. It is imperative that the Party and its Government embark on a massive relief effort preferably an airlift to save lives.

If for some reason direct Government participation is not feasible then such assistance could be channelled through the Red Cross.

For such requirements as second-hand clothes the public could certainly help if only they are told where and how to make the donations. What is needed is ACTION NOW and not silence and inaction while people continue dying of starvation.

FIRST LUANDA FRONTLINE YOUTH CONGRESS FAILS TO MEET

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE first youth congress of Frontline states scheduled for September 3 to 4 in Luanda, Angola, did not take place because Tanzania, Mozambique and Botswana did not attend.

Zambia was to be represented by Minister for Youth and Sport Mr Ben Kakoma, accompanied by Luapula Province Youth League chairman Mr Alex Kabaso.

Disclosing this in Lusaka yesterday, executive secretary of the Youth League and member of the Central Committee Mr Bautis Kapulu, said the three countries had offered no explanation for their failure to attend the meeting.

The meeting was to be held on the same lines as the Frontline heads of state summit.

Meanwhile, the Young Women's Christian Association (YWCA) Grade Seven school leavers' project has increased its annual intake from nine to 15 students this year, programme secretary Miss Ute Hoffmann said at Mindolo Ecumenical Foundation in Kitwe yesterday.

Miss Hoffmann said the project trained young girls in such courses as hand-sewing, dressmaking and crocheting for 11 months.

She said the project was introduced last year to help solve problems of Grade Seven school leavers.

More than 300 women and young girls have received short and long courses at Buseko home industries since its inception in 1967, programme secretary Mrs Joan Sitemba said.

Self-reliant

Mrs Sitemba said the main objective for training was to make women self-reliant in their homes and to earn a supplementary income.

Asked if the trainees are helped in securing employment, she said:

"We are not training them to get employment, but only to enable them to become effective housewives. We also prepare young girls for the day they marry so that they will not face problems of house management.

"But the few who are privileged get employment in factories and it is not our main intention to train for jobs. The whole idea is to teach them as housewives and to help them stay with their husbands," she said.

BRIEFS

ZAIREANS HARASS ZAMBIANS--Zairean soldiers patrolling the border with Zambia are allegedly confiscating bicycles from Zambians traveling near the border at gunpoint, Zambian customs officials at Sakania border post near Ndola have confirmed. Already five bicycles have been grabbed from residents of Kawama township in Ndola. Two of the bicycles were confiscated last Wednesday and three last Friday. The seizure of bicycles by the Zairean soldiers was first brought to light by Kawama constituency chairman Mr Morris Mutale. The Zairean soldiers are patrolling the border area with Zambia and according to some officials in the area, they have no transport of their own and have allegedly resorted to seizing bicycles from Zambian travelers near the border. Mr Mutale said over the weekend the seizure of bicycles started last week. "We are really having problems in this area. We have been trying to get to the bottom of the issue and have already reported the matter to the regional office," said Mr Mutale. He said Zambians who ventured near the border wither to go to their fields or to burn charcoal were now being harassed by the Zairean soldiers. Immigration officer-in-charge at Sakania, Mr John Lukuzhi, said he held discussions with the commander of the soldiers at the frontier last Friday which dealt with the problems he experienced with Zaireans crossing in and out of the country. MAIDOU'S, AYANDHO'S REMOVAL CAUSES SPECULATION

London WEST AFRICA in English 15 Sep 80 pp 1798, 1799

[Text] The removal from office of two of the more unpopular members of President Dacko's government has only served to raise the level of speculation in Bangui to an even greater intensity than is usually the case. Speaking to some members of the media recently, President Dacko failed to explain precisely why the former Vice-President, M. Henri Maidou and the Prime Minister M. Ayandho were sacked at the end of August. He limited himself to the observation that he would have preferred not to change the government for two years, but these two men had become too unpopular. The President had reshuffled the government in mid-July.

The signs of some government changes were evident well before the decision to remove these two ministers and place them under house arrest. On July 11, when the new cabinet was announced, the positions of Prime Minister and Vice-President were left open. This encouraged the view that the President was giving way to public pressure.

It is clear that M. Ayandho was always extremely unpopular in Bangui. However, there was evidence that M. Maidou was regaining some respect after being tainted by his association with Bokassa. He was the fallen Emperor's last Prime Minister. At the end of July he gave a radio interview in which he asserted that he had asked the French to intervene in order to remove Bokassa. By saying this, he stakes a political claim to the succession to power in the Republic. Nor did his claim contradict the intentions of President Dacko who had envisaged M. Maidou as a possible successor. M. Maidou is only forty-four years old and highly regarded by many.

However, in the course of the interview M. Maidou expressed his support for multi-party politics. An opinion which caused considerable excitement at the Presidency where political opposition has been brushed aside and where it was also known that M. Maidou had participated in the drawing up of a new constitution--still to be published--in which he supported the creation of a one-party state. The Vice-President's comments immediately received the favourable attention of the Movement Centrafricain pour les Libertes Democratiques which acts as an umbrella organisation for the opposition groups in the Republic.

It was clear, therefore that he had either played his hand too early or had made a serious mistake. Either way, it placed him in opposition to the President.

What has given rise to more serious questions is the detention of the two politicians by French guards. President Bongo's adviser M. Fabien Ombouma was to be found at the Presidential Palace in Bangui on the day of the arrest. It is widely felt that the Gabonese who have offered substantial financial assistance to the Republic are acting on behalf of France. The queries surrounding the precise intentions of France in Central Africa still remain unanswered though there is little doubt that French military presence, especially in Bangui is proving crucial for the security of the new regime. The suspicion of observers has been aroused by the peculiar nature of the incarceration of the two politicians. President Dacko told journalists that they could speak to M. Maidou. However, the French Colonel who is responsible for the Presidential guard later persuaded the President that this would not be advisable.

CONFRONTATION MOVED TO DIPLOMATIC FRONT

London WEST AFRICA in English 15 Sep 80 p 1799

[Text]

Hissen Habre, on a visit to Senegal, has accused President Goukhouni Weddeye of using Palestinians, supplied through Libya to fight against him in the Chad civil war. The statement was made during a visit to Dakar in which Habre had talks with the Senegalese Prime Minister, M. Abdou Diouf.

He claimed that "Chadians are actors in a war imposed from outside" blaming Libya and France. He went on to add that Libya had occupied a strip of country in the north — the Aouzou strip — which he said was rich in minerals after the area had been ceded to Colonel Gadaffi in exchange for the "liquidation of Chad's revolutionary movement".

Habre also attacked France for supplying arms to Libya and disagreed with the French view that Chad should have a federal system of government. This Habre said, would be "an open door to secession". He preferred the installation of a neutral peace-keeping force.

A correspondent writes: While the fighting continues in Chad and N'Djamena is reduced to rubble, the contestants have moved from the purely military confrontation to the diplomatic front. Habre's ends suit official Senegalese fears of Libyan expansionism in the Sahel. However, the attack on France appears to be more of a smokescreen; France's supplying Libya with arms does not preclude aid to Habre and the evidence is that the French continue to favour the former defence minister of the Transitional Government rather than the chosen President, Goukhouni. Habre's isolation is, at least temporarily, compensated by a far more efficient public relations machinery than he has at his disposal. It is interesting to note, therefore, that the forces drawn up against Habre have started up something of a publicity campaign. Ahmat Acyl, the Foreign Minister, has been to Bonn; Lt.-Col. Kamougue has been lobbying in Paris where he is best equipped to operate since he represents the cotton-growing interests of the south. The British Government has said that it will give aid to Chad and there is the likelihood of more visits to London.

JERUSALEM ISSUE VIEWED AS THREATENING WORLD PEACE

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 30 Aug 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Jerusalem--Tactics of Diversion"]

[Text]

WHEN in 1939, Nazi Germany started encroaching on the lands of its neighbours, little did the world know that what appeared to be little acts of rascality was to cost the world a disaster.

Many countries are still counting the cost of the Second World War. After the war, the world sympathized with the Jews for the harsh treatment they received from the Nazis and wished that there will be no repetition of such injustices and inhuman treatment anywhere in the world.

Next Monday will be exactly 41 years ago when Hitler's men attacked Poland and thus triggered off a new dimension in the world war.

But how far away really is the world from 1939 and thus from expansionist policies, propelled by the trigger?

Quite noticeably, victims of Nazi Germany, now settling in Palestine, have been venting their spleen on Palestinians and seizing Arab lands from time to time, and adopting similar Nazi methods to silence the owners of the land.

Although their latest move in making the whole of Jerusalem the eternal capital of Zionism has drawn protests from far and wide, the world is gradually turning its eyes from the explosive situation.

For example, Western propaganda outfits, especially radio stations, have been diverting the world's attention to the internal industrial dispute in Poland, as if there has never been a strike action under the capitalist system.

Aggression

But the danger posed by the Zionist aggression in the Middle East cannot be simply covered up by a noisy sensational news coverage elsewhere.

Events in Jerusalem threaten to draw in more international combatants, including the whole Moslem world, into the Middle East conflict.

As we have been insisting in the past, unless the waywardness and criminal acts of the Zionist regime in Tel Aviv (now shifting to Jerusalem) are checked, the world should prepare for a major conflict on the issue.

Unfortunately, the Carter Administration which promised the world a lasting peace in the Middle East through the Camp David Accord is bogged down with internal affairs and is therefore not enthusiastic now about criticising Israel on its Jerusalem decision.

Indeed, the U.S. Government is even pretending not be aware of the embarrassment in which it finds itself with the failure of the Camp David agreement.

Meanwhile, all is not yet lost. And we appeal to the sponsors of the Jewish State to back their proclaimed peaceful intentions with action and discipline the Zionist aggressors.

The hungry world cannot afford a third major war. Middle East is the problem. Not Poland or Afghanistan.

DISAGREEMENTS IN MUSLIM COMMUNITY DEPLORED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 9 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Muslims: G.M.R.C., But....?"]

[Text] It is rather unfortunate that the calm and unity that returned to the Muslims' camp early this year should gradually give way to simmering troubles that can even end up in conflicts once again.

With the election of new executive members for the Muslims Representative Council, many inside and outside the Moslem community heaved a sign of relief that the disagreements and petty quarrels among Muslims were going to end.

Recent developments, however, threaten to sow seeds of dissension once more among Muslims.

We, therefore, appeal for calm, because the country does not seem now capable of absorbing such conflicts which have nothing but negative effects on national development.

Since the country has a sizeable Moslem population, matters affecting the Muslim religion cannot be easily ignored or carelessly handled.

Indeed, unity in the Moslem community is a major factor of national unity, so all dedicated Muslims must pray for Allah to guide them in their search for unity and peace.

RELATIONS WITH LIBYA REVIEWED, PRAISED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 1 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] The Libyan Jamahiriya, in line with her policy of solidarity with Africa, Asia and Latin America and of concern for world peace based on justice and international co-operation among nations, maintains very cordial relations with Ghana.

Indeed, the friendly ties have of late received a fresh boost with an agreement reached between the two countries in Libya last November during a visit by a high-powered Ghanaian delegation led by Dr John S. Nabila, Minister of Information and Presidential Affairs.

As part of the decision, a joint commission is to be set up to work on the establishment of joint bank and holding companies.

The two countries are also to set up mining, industrial and agricultural ventures under the commission. It will also promote cultural and information exchanges.

Another meeting in furtherance of the programme is expected in Accra soon.

It will also be recalled that Libya had to come to Ghana's aid during the oil crisis in the country last year.

To concretize the friendly ties between the two countries, the Jamahiriya has now set up an embassy in Ghana and it is hoped Ghana will soon re-open its mission in Tripoli, closed down after the events of 1966.

The Libyan Jamahiriya is among the Arab countries which are firmly opposed to Zionist aggression in Palestine and a front-liner in the cause for justice to the people of Palestine. The country also strongly opposes the so-called Camp David Accord.

WESTERN COOPERATION, ASSISTANCE COMMENDED

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 2 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "External Debts"]

[Text]

IN SPITE of great odds, Ghana has made good progress since September 1979. The fact that it has been able to pay ₵120.9m of her short-term external debts is particularly impressive, considering the havoc caused to the country's economy by seven years of military rule.

But the country still has numerous problems and it cannot itself remain unaffected by the growing uncertainties for the developing countries as pointed out in the recent United Nations Economic Survey.

Predominantly an agricultural country, the improvement of Ghana's agriculture is a necessary condition of development in general. It is a wise decision therefore that the Government has given first priority to agriculture in its programmes. But Ghana like many other developing countries lacks the technical knowledge and financial capital necessary to develop her resources.

It is especially in this field that we commend the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, Federal Republic of Germany, Canada and other friendly nations for the many schemes they have sponsored for assisting Ghana to resuscitate her ailing economy.

We warmly applaud the immediate response of the United States to our needs by the granting of a 21.2 million dollar grant and loan to provide agricultural production inputs and services to small-scale farmers in the country. For this act of faith, Ghana is indeed grateful because it shows America's belief in Ghana's future.

Ghana greatly admires the efforts of all friendly nations who have come to our aid and we shall continue to be grateful to them for all that they are doing to help us build our economy. We look for further financial expression of confidence in the future of Ghana.

Having paid tribute to the nations who are assisting us out of our difficulties, the 'Graphic' would want to stress that the future of the country depends on our own efforts to help ourselves.

This, we cannot do if we are not working together in unity. Indeed, unity today is Ghana's greatest concern and it is the duty of everyone to work to strengthen it.

POLISH EVENTS SEEN AS SIGN OF COMMUNIST HYPOCRISY

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 5 Sep 80 p 3

[Article by Elizabeth Ohene]

[Excerpts]

THE minute the conclave of cardinals was guided by the divine spirit to pick Karol Wojtyla as the new Pope, the whole world should have braced itself for a period of Polish dominated headlines. It took less than a forthnight for the amazing Pole Pope John Paul II to change the face of the papacy forever.

Anything after such carrying-ons ought to have been anti-climax and yet Karol Wojtyla's countrymen have still managed to spring surprises. For almost one month now, Polish workers have managed to hold the attention of the entire world by engaging in something as routine as a strike action. Ask any GIHOC worker and you would know all about going on strike to back up demands for higher pay, so what can be so earth — shattering about a group of shipyard workers demanding higher pay?

But then really, trust the Poles to turn a straightforward and uncomplicated thing like a strike into a world-wide crisis.

There they were asking for completely free trade unions and an end to press censorship; and that was where the stickiness came in. At face value one is tempted to ask what on earth could be wrong with workers asking for a free trade union uncontrolled by government or by political party, surely the entire history of trade unionism has been a struggle by workers to have some control over their own destiny.

And what is more, it should not be a communist country whose workers should agitate for a free trade union — isn't that the basis for the credo they have been propagating around the world for six decades and over — free trade unions, free from government, free from control by proprietors and managements, controlled only by the workers themselves.

It therefore, becomes obvious that that which is preached over the roof tops and that which is practised are usually many poles apart.

Free trade unions for as long as they are practised very far away from the shores of the nations that are loudest in extolling their virtues. The problem with such things of course being that it is usually difficult to insulate your own shores from being infected with the propaganda directed at other countries.

Why else do you think that laws were enacted to prevent the Voice of America and other similar radio networks from beaming their programmes to the citizens of their own countries?

Consider the general tone of the British press for example in their coverage of the entire Polish crisis, they could hardly supress their glee at the obvious embarrassment of the Communist world that at long last they were tasting a bit of their own medicine.

In the meantime, the Soviets could only look on and squirm; how could the Soviet Union, champion of the working classes which had always urged workers all over the world to stand up for their rights, to shake off the oppressors yoke be seen as fighting workers who are only asking for what other workers have always been told are their due?

It is obvious that one can only keep sermon and practice poles apart for only so long, one day the chicken will all come home to roost and you will have to decide which one to adopt — the sermons public relations stand or the private practice.

And that is where the other demand of the amazing Poles come in: an end to press censorship. At face value that again sounds harmless enough both to those demanding it and the government from who it was being asked.

But when you realise that even a legally guaranteed free Trade Union is stillborn at birth without a free press, you then realise that the Polish problem really had nothing to do with the price of meat.

And the Polish leaders were not unimpressed by the gravity of what they faced. They were well aware of the fact that the workers could have started off asking only for an end to press censorship — all other things like free trade unions and higher wages and accountability and an insistence on sermon and practise being the same shall all follow unto them.

Anybody who does not grasp the significance of the lessons from Poland must surely be operating on a plane poles apart from the reality of the Ghanaian situation.

WARNING SOUNDED AGAINST EXPATRIATE MANAGEMENT

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 2 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Looking Backward"]

[Text] There is a growing sign of some perpetrators of neo-colonialist ideas preparing the ground for a subtle return of expatriates to run or head certain organizations, including even sensitive ones, in the name of efficiency.

As if the Ghanaian can never be efficient or as if all Ghanaians are corrupt, the propagators of these dangerous ideas have seen everything bad about Ghanaian administration and continue to yearn for the return of the "white man" to head this or that organization.

What these neo-colonialist agents refuse to admit is that the "white man" is not an angel and that the overflowing prisons in the "white" countries are filled not by Ghanaians!

What is necessary in Ghana is to ensure proper control and accountability from those who run the affairs of public organizations.

The services of many Ghanaians in other countries, especially with international agencies, have been acclaimed as efficient. This record can be achieved at home, too.

Ghanaians should not be made to believe that all will be well if Ghanaian administrators are booted out in favour of expatriates.

Except in very exceptional cases, the solution of Ghana's problems lies in Ghanaians' own hands; it cannot be added to the imports list.

What Ghana needs is genuine assistance and co-operation from outside, and not expatriate bosses.

EMPLOYERS WARNED AGAINST DISMISSING WORKERS

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 3 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Redundancy Cuts Both Ways"]

[Text] The Minister of Labour, Youth and Social Welfare, Mr F.Q. Amegah, has warned that his Ministry will take drastic action against any employer who hides behind "import licence problems" to resort to arbitrary dismissal of workers.

He also warned that the Government would not deal kindly with any corporation, company or firm which declares workers redundant without first obtaining a fiat from his Ministry.

The Minister's warning, coming at a time when workers, especially in the private sector, are being threatened with redundancy, should be viewed with all the seriousness it requires.

Time and again, we have cautioned against the dangers of unnecessary retrenchment which is prevalent in private companies.

Apart from compounding the unemployment problem for the country, retrenchment brings woes to many families and contributes to social decadence such as stealing and wandering.

It is against this background that the fiat principle is necessary, to ensure that the employer's retrenchment exercise is justified.

We cannot subscribe to redundancy decisions that ignore the workers' contribution to the making of large profits for business owners when the going was good.

For, one would like to ask whether it is impossible to keep the workers on "subsistence" with part of the profits accumulated over the years until the raw materials arrive for production to improve again.

Appreciation

Indeed, a number of sympathetic and fair-minded employers have expressed their appreciation to their workers in this manner.

On the other hand, is it not appropriate for the workers, if they are mostly factory hands, to be redeployed on farms set up by the management?

In view of these and other avenues open up for convenient redeployment of workers threatened with redundancy, it would be unacceptable for any management to retrench employees by hiding behind the import licence "problem."

The nation cannot accept any moves that would worsen the unemployment situation and adversely affect the economy.

The situation now calls for give-and-take from the private sector and the Government. While Government is instituting measures to keep the factories running, managements must appreciate Government's efforts and not to act on in a manner prejudicial to the smooth running of the country.

Managements must help to bring down unemployment.

Laying off workers is, in any case, a double-edged sword that could cut both ways: How safe is investment in a nation fraught with social unrest resulting from too many idle hands hanging about?

So when some employers do their myopic thing of looking only at what profit comes to their pocket, they should not forget that they are creating long-term trouble for themselves by laying off workers at random.

The Government is right in deciding to stand against it. We expect that the TUC will be adequately consulted in the matter.

INVESTIGATION OF REPORTED VALCO MOTIVES URGED

Accra GHANAIAN TIMES in English 6 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "What does VALCO Say?"]

[Text] The authorities of VALCO have some explanation to give to the nation over the company's attitude to the Kibi Bauxite/Alumina project.

The story put out by the VALCO authorities to anyone who cares to discuss the Kibi bauxite project with them is in two parts.

In one part they declare that VALCO has all the goodwill towards Ghana and would almost naturally be interested in the bauxite project if the money involved were not so prohibitive and impossible to put up.

In the other part, they state positively that it is absolutely impossible to get anyone or group to provide the 600 million dollars needed to get the project going, particularly since the project would have a negative cash flow for the first seven years of production.

However, the executive secretary of the Aluminium Industries Commission (of Ghana), G.J.A. Renner, has revealed that a group of Japanese investors interested in the project later withdrew because VALCO strangely increased its potlines, thereby increasing its electricity consumption from Akosombo so the Japanese found that they could not get enough power to establish a smelter for the project.

This revelation means a lot: One, that it is not true that no one can raise the 600 million dollars. Two, that VALCO actually took action which is tantamount to blocking the project. Three, that VALCO is not interested in seeing the project established.

The matter is a serious one, and it would be in the interest of all concerned to hear what VALCO has to say.

Perhaps it is useful to tell all those who have ears to hear that even in her worst national tribulations, Ghana cannot be taken for granted!

GOVERNMENT ASKED TO HELP RESTORE ESSENTIAL SERVICES

Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 4 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "Breakdown of Essential Services"]

[Text]

A MATTER of great concern to many Ghanaian workers is the constant breakdown of essential services like water, electricity and telephones.

Of these water comes out as the most important service the public cannot do without. Any disruption of this service is bound to cause frustration among consumers.

As the Water and Sewerage people tell us, there is no substitute for water. Any breakdown of water supply can also affect the health of thousands of people since other means of supply must be found and this can be dangerous, at times, to our health.

Tamale, Ho and Sunyani are important regional centres where the water problem has become chronic. Day in day out residents in these areas are seen with buckets and containers looking for water from anywhere.

The situation in certain areas of Accra and other regional centres are the same.

Electricity and water supply go hand in hand. Any breakdown in electricity supply affect the supply of water.

Apart from a cut in electricity supply affecting the flow of water, it also affects and actually damages electrical appliances like fridges, deep-freezers and television sets. In other parts of the world such a situation would have led to law suits. Yet consumers are made to suffer all these inconveniences without uttering any word.

The situation as regards our telephone system is not different from the other two services. Telephones are meant to save us from walking over long distances to deliver a message or to hold important discussions. But what do we see now, especially in this period when there is so much campaign against conserving fuel?

Telephone breakdowns are also disrupting business. People are wasting fuel to attend to businesses when a few pesewas wasted on the line could have done the trick.

We have turned our attention to these three important services because we believe they are being neglected at a great cost not only to the consumers but also to the Government.

There have been several cases of consumers of water and electricity organising themselves against payment of services rendered them because of dissatisfaction with the services so rendered.

The society is facing a whole lot of problems and so many areas seem to need more attention than others.

It is our determination to point out to the authorities areas which are creating a lot of frustration among the public.

The three discussed today are serious and we call on the Government to pay attention to them so as to put the smile back on the faces of consumers.

BRIEFS

TUC PASSIVITY ASSAILED--The Ghaip Division of the General Transport and Petroleum Workers Union of the Trades Union Congress (TUC) yesterday accused the Congress of "being toothless thereby allowing the rights of Ghanaian workers to be trampled upon." In a statement issued at Tema, the Division asked the top hierarchy of the TUC to "resign honourably if the going is too tough" for them. The statement said the TUC "which is supposed to be the mouthpiece of the workers, has failed to explain the present poor living conditions of the workers to the Government for the situation to be improved." The statement said the success of the Third Republic was the wish of all workers because "we all know the harm that political instability has done to the country" and appealed to the Government to create avenues for redressing political grievances without recourse to confrontations.--GNA [Excerpts] [Accra DAILY GRAPHIC in English 10 Sep 80 p 1]

TUC: PEACEFUL POLICY DESIRED--The Ghana Trades Union Congress (TUC) has stated that it will continue to help in the resuscitation of the national economy. It will also "in the face of financial constraints continue to champion the cause of workers by promoting their standards of living." The Director of the Ghana Labour College, Mr J.F. Nortey, made the statement at the closing session of a two-week monitors workshop for chairmen, secretaries and treasurers of the 17 national unions of the TUC in Accra. The workshop, organized by the TUC in collaboration with the Washington-based African-American Labour Centre, was attended by 40 participants. Mr Nortey noted that those who were "vociferous" in the condemnation of the peaceful role the Congress was playing in the national economy were "those who have their own axes to grind." Those people, he said, would want to see the TUC in constant confrontation with both Government and Management over matters that could easily be settled around the conference table. AUSTALIAN AWARDS FOR GHANA--Australia has pledged a package of agricultural training awards to Ghana to ensure the success of the declared agricultural programme. Under the package, existing pattern of training for Ghanaian students in Australia would be changed and focused on the vital field of agriculture. The new Australian High Commissioner in Ghana, Mr Anthony F.

PROGRESSIVE TAX--The Head of State said Government has proposed new tax measures for implementation this year. He said this means that income tax rate on individuals, stocks, estates and partnerships had been increased by two, six, 10 and 20 per cent, thereby making the rate more progressive. The hut, progress and development tax, paid by hut dwellers in Liberia, has been abolished under the new tax measures announced by the PRC Government. Master Sergeant Doe said that this step was necessary to further ease the burden of taxation on the Liberian people. He also said that the new tax measures would produce an additional revenue of $54m, while the sale of assets would yield $6m. He added that the new tax on petroleum would generate $2.7m. The PRC Government has also authorised the Minister of Finance to pay the expenses of the Government from 1st July, 1980 to 30th June, 1981, under the approved budget of fiscal 1980/81. Such expenses include approved allotments, personnel lists, notices and warrants of the Head of State. On budgetary transfers, the Ministry of Finance may approve such transfers upon recommendation of the Director of the Budget as may be necessary to give priority to the more essential Government operations. However, such transfers shall not exceed the sum total of the budget. [Text] [London WEST AFRICA in English 15 Sep 80 p 1799]

INNOVATIVE MOLASSES-STRAW COMBINATION COULD BE USED AS FODDER

Brussels SPECIAL L'EVANTAIL in French 12-18 Sep 80 pp 29-30

[Text] It is appalling! An independent agronomist, specializing in missions for UN agencies such as the FAO, is hard put to hide his frustration, even though he has seen everything from the time he started traveling to the four corners of the world. After the Congo, it was Haiti, then Burundi...and now it is Mali.

In the course of his missions, this agronomist must understand not only problems affecting the poor implementation of FAO and UN-financed projects, but also the root causes for them. This is not always due to technical factors.

Thus with sugar cane, a problem which has awakened his interest in Mali. This country bathed by the Niger River acquired its independence at the beginning of the sixties. The French, who were aware of the exceptional micro-climate it enjoyed precisely because of the existence of the Niger, had developed the cultivation of sugar cane. This is a relatively simple process and is very much needed in the economy of countries such as Mali. Sugar cane produces an income of 800,000 Malian francs per hectare, as against 200,000 francs per hectare of rice. Moreover, Mali used to be an importer of sugar. The main by-product of sugar cane, molasses, is also very profitable. Thus, our agronomist was astonished to find out that 7,000 tons of molasses are poured into the canals each year. He notes that the country, despite the presence of the Niger, is often affected by drought. Cattle are dying in neighboring Sudan. It is precisely on the border between Mali and Sudan that molasses are poured out. And yet, the agronomist remarks, 40,000 hectares of rice produce one ton of straw, one-fourth of which is used as fodder for the cattle. Studies have proved that "sugar-straw," a mixture of straw and molasses, is an excellent source of food for cattle...

Meanwhile, entire herds are succumbing to the drought, especially in the Timbuctu region! The Malian government, obviously overwhelmed by the existing problems, has never thought of keeping the molasses or the rice-straw--which, more often than not, is burned--to produce food for cattle that could prove indispensable during periods of severe drought.

So it is that this agronomist is raising the alarm; he is impatiently awaiting the agreement of the World Bank for which he is now working, to perfect the organization of a system to mix molasses and straw. It may well be that the fate of an entire region hangs in the balance.

SWAPO'S UN REPRESENTATIVE ACCUSES SA OF PRACTICING DECEIT

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 6 Sep 80 p 18

[Text]

NEW YORK: The latest reply by the South African Foreign Affairs Minister, Mr Roelof Botha, to the United Nations Secretary General, Dr Kurt Waldheim, about the implementation of Security Council Resolution 435 for the holding of internationally supervised elections was a litany of abuses, insults, falsifications and distortions. These were the words of SWAPO's United Nations Representative, Mr Theo-Ben Gurirab.

Mr Gurirab was interviewed in his New York flat about 72 hours after Mr Botha's latest reply, handed to the Secretary General on Friday afternoon of last week. He said it was a negative response. It was a response that was indicative of the real position of South Africa, that being that the illegal occupationist regime had quite clearly opted for an internal settlement and a neo-colonialist solution in South West Africa in favour of the puppet elements of the Turnhalle Group, he said.

"We are still consulting here at the United Nations in respect of where we are and of what has to be done next. Quite clearly SWAPO, the Front Line countries and our friends would wish the Security Council to meet as a matter of urgency to impose comprehensive mandatory sanctions under Chapter Seven of the United Nations Charter as the only alternative left for the United Nations to end illegality and repression and exploitation in South West Africa", Mr Gurirab said.

Question: We have heard a story circulating here - in fact it was on Radio South Africa - stating that "radical" elements in the Organisation for African Unity are urging a Security Council debate for September 25?

-- The import of the report is correct, but as to the specific date when the Security Council meeting might be convened, we have not as yet agreed. But you will recall that, during the last summit in Freetown, the OAU directed African ambassadors at the United Nations to look into convocation of the Security Council in the event of another negative response from South Africa. Now that we haved the so-called reply and have satisfied ourselves that, even though at this stage only on a preliminary basis, it is now for the African Group at the United Nations, as directed by the OAU, to start the performance which must lead to the holding of a Security Council meeting.

Question: Rumours are rife here about the possibility of a Lancaster House type conference with the South African government and the Turnhalle elements on the one side, and you, the Front Line States and Dr. Waldheim on the other side?

-- That is a figment of the imagination of the South African racists and those who dance to their tune. What the Front Line countries, the United Nations and SWAPO might consider would be a meeting . . . . a bilateral meeting by SWAPO and South Africa, presided over by the United Nations Secretary General, a meeting at which the two principal parties to the conflict, that being SWAPO and South Africa, would discuss practical details which could lead to the implementation of the PLAN. The idea of a Lancaster House style conference is a negation of the United Nations PLAN. We are not interested in it now, and we will not be interested in it in the future.

Question: Mr Gurirab, as a result of the latest developments, do you foresee an escalation of the problems, I mean especially as far as military affairs are concerned?

-- Well, quite clearly, the attitude of South Africa is one of arrogance, of belligerence. South Africa maintains an attitude of confrontation, is daily committing acts of aggression and daily launching armed military invasions into independent African countries neighbouring South West Africa. Therefore, one can expect that this aggression will continue and escalate, and correspondingly I am sure the African countries would defend their territorial integrity against such aggression. I am convinced, I know that SWAPO will intensify its military resistance against the occupation of our country, and therefore, quite clearly, the war is going to escalate, violence will increase and destruction will rocket in South West Africa.

After the inverview was concluded, and Mr Gurirab thanked for the time he had given to the Observer, he asked if he could add, what he thought, something which was of great importance at this stage, as he put it in his conversation with us:

"To conclude, we expect now the Western countries, the major trading partners of South Africa, to take the initiative in the Security Council to support and cooperate with the rest of the United Nations in ensuring that punitive measures under Chapter Seven of the United Nations Charter are taken against South Africa. It is time now for them to take the lead in ensuring that the Charter of the United Nations is upheld and that they support the efforts of the international community to increase material assistance to SWAPO and to the South West African people in their struggle for liberation", Mr Gurirab said.

NEWSPAPER PURPORTS TO DISSECT BOTHA-WALDHEIM MANEUVERING

Windhoek WINDHOEK OBSERVER in English 6 Sep 80 p 18

[Editorial: "The Naked Truth About the Botha-Waldheim Maneuvering"]

[Text]

It is time that the truth about the Roelof Botha-Kurt Waldheim manoeuvring be squarely faced for once. Perhaps in that manner one can understand Mr Botha's hesitancy and his delaying tactics. Perhaps there are those not given to the habit of converting wishful thinking into realities.

Mr Roelof Botha has not always had fools for advisers. In recent years, whether one agreed with him or not, he took a cool assessment of the political realities of South West Africa and realised that SWAPO would smash any opponent in an internationally supervised election. Mr Botha, and we say this without hypocrisy, realised what this could mean to South Africa.

He could at no stage turn his back on the Western Powers, and at all times he tried his utmost to be an honest broker without admitting that SWAPO is currently the most powerful political force. A difficult, unenviable task for which one has a lot of understanding, although one totally rejects the methods employed to solve the tricky problem.

Mr Botha resorted to the one and only alternative offered him: to establish in South West Africa a new social order which he hopes could pull the rug from under SWAPO's feet. He hoped, over the past 42 months since the Western initiative started, that by the tactic of delaying things, there would be internally constitutional developments in South West Africa, leading to an ever growing better understanding between the various factions, and finally to defusion. In short, to neutralize SWAPO not only as a political force, but to sap the military strength so that the movement becomes a nonentity. When that has been achieved, Mr Botha, like a general von Mannstein, would spring the trap. Then there would have been participation by SWAPO in a constitutional process.

Very fine objectives for a political personality who firmly believes that a SWAPO government will bring into South West Africa the communist ideology, the communist industrial know-how and, above all, the military strike power of the communist world.

He would have achieved this, and sooner than he thought, if Mr Botha were of greater political calibre and a man not paying attention to the bazaar-like politicians we have in this country.

And this is where Mr Dirk Mudge comes in. Mr Mudge, you, and you alone, are the man in this country today who can still achieve what Mr Botha hoped for but was unable to do. Yet, Mr Mudge, are you possessed of the political qualities to look beyond the bazaar types and to forget the short term advantages of little ethnic exercises and to grasp for the ultimate goal -- nationhood? Again we stress that we are not in the least hypocritical if we say that our country is in need of a national leader, no matter whether his name is Dirk Muge of Theo-Ben Gurirab. We need a man to reach beyond the standards of the camarilla clique and to go for the greater objectives, no matter the squealing of a few political mice who, in the final upshot of our country, will be less than an erased nought.

And that is where we are on this day. We are in a situation where the military might of the South African soldier is not only keeping at bay the armed wing of South West Africa's strongest political movement, but is busy sapping that wing's strenght. An accompanied political solution to go hand in hand with that is imperative, or there can be no success.

Rise, Mr Mudge, for if you are a politician and, above all, a leader of people, you will realise that there is but one recipé -- the truth, no matter how hard, no matter how unpopular, for it triumphs in the end. White political leaders of the past have not complied with one of their promises. They were at best parochial, parishlike,limited in the impact of their sermons and even bleaker in personality.

Try the formula for once in your life, for despite our bitter opposition to you and our personal resentment to what you have done to us, we are also aware of the knowledge gnawing at your heart which you are afraid to air. Mr Mudge, this is not the time to ask if a black skin or a white skin is able to unite people of different colour and of different languages. This is a time to do the job, for you are not an alien but a native of the country.

We, who are outspoken supporters of the now shelved 103 point constitutional proposals of the SWAPO nationalist movement, would like to tell you this, that you must stop pussyfooting. You are facing an adversary which knows the rules of fighting and, above all, the unselfish commitment to a cause. Like you, we regret that the old SWAPO nationalist movement, which was the father of the original 103 point programme, has since adopted a number of very radical and very severe socialist and Marcist principles. That, though, does not detract from the dynamics of the movement, from the fire with which the movement is imbuing the hearts of the overwhelming bulk of South West Africa's youth.

Mr Mudge, you can't win with such activities as protracted debates on non-existent brothels in Windhoek. You are lowering yourself to a pitiful level. You have the reins in your hands at the moment. Try to be worthy of them.

PROSPECTIVE SHORTAGE OF SKILLED LABOR LOOMS OVER NAMIBIA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE BULK OF our potential university-trained manpower is being lost to SA through our students not returning to this country on completion of their studies.

This stark message was brought home this week by the Director of National Education, Mr A de Jager, when he addressed the Women's Agricultural Union congress in Windhoek.

With a figure of 2 000 boys and girls studying at universities in SA, the Territory was losing valuable manpower in a steady drain because most of these students did not return home.

He pointed out that certain promises had been made in the new political dispensation and it was time that these promises were met.

The shortage of skilled manpower is one that is looming larger over the Territory.

The Advertiser this morning approached a number of key people for comment on the issue.

Mr Piet Kruger, Secretary of Economic Affairs underlined the seriousness of the situation, blaming it mainly on the fact that students were unaware of posts available here.

"In the past we have never had any feedback from SWA students studying in South Africa and this can mainly be ascribed to the fact that they are unaware of the opportunities here", he said.

Neither the universities nor students were aware of posts here and normally recruiting was done at the universities for newly-qualified persons.

He said that steps had now been taken to acquaint both universities and students of the posts and opportunities available here in the Territory and that it was not necessary to search for employment in South Africa. This was mainly being done by private concerns.

"But I believe that the public sector will now also start moving in this direction", he concluded.

Mr G M de Villiers, Secretary for Manpower and Civic Affairs, felt that the continuous drainage of young manpower was also to be ascribed to the economic boom being experienced in SA at present.

"Of course the boom hits us a bit later. But we are experiencing a serious problem getting trained people, especially graduates and we are now awaiting legislation to enforce a manpower survey."

He said that there was a particular shortage in the professional fields — such as architects for example, although he felt that this could also be due to the building slump.

"As soon as the manpower survey is completed, the matter will be referred to a higher level for the appropriate steps to be taken", Mr De Villiers said.

Mr Kurt Böhme, Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce and Industries felt that at present there were not sufficient trade and professional opportunities.

"However", he said, "as the economy develops, so will the opportunities and more students will return after completing their studies.

RENE OUTLINE IMPORTANCE OF YOUTH SERVICE

Victoria NATION in English 8 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Text]

PRESIDENT France Albert Rene has outlined the importance of the National Youth Service as the "school of life" which will prepare young people for their future as good citizens.

The Head of State was addressing a large crowd at a cultural evening on Saturday, when he officially closed the three weeks of youth camps at Port Launay, which the young people themselves have described as a "youth paradise".

Recalling the history of Port Launay, the President said it had its roots in the capitalist system. The land there had changed hands several times and the people in the district had continuously exploited the workers of that region.

"Today, the government has acquired this land and has laid it into the hands of the young people. This is also a historic event, because the young people who will be passing through Port Launay are the future leaders of the country".

He pointed out that this had been proved to him during the past three weeks of school holidays, adding that it was there at Port Launay and there only where the youth of the country would be developed, where they would be able to decide their future and what to do for their country.

"For too long, our education system had been copied from Europe and other countries. Our children when they went to school in the morning sat for the whole day at a table and we said they were learning. But what had they learned ?

"They were taught that London was a big city, they learned that the river Seine flowed through Paris and that in the Mediterranean sea there was an island called Malta. But they did not know, as Minister Jumeau earlier pointed out, what a "capucin" plant was yet we were saying that our children were learning.

"First of all our children must be taught now to live together, they must know that it makes no difference having a black, white or red skin. They must know that between brothers and sisters there is equality, that they should respect one another and not abuse each other. This is what we mean by learning and from this they will also learn other things.

"In learning to live together, work, play and eat together, the young people will develop and from this they will be able to develop this country in turn.

"For too long in the past we had the belief that having a certificate or just going through university was enough. It made us think we had people capable of leading others. Unfortunately, on several occasions those same people were not in a position to lead others because, to quote a Head of State, "they had not been through the school of life".

"We had not been through life the way it is and we could not look after ourselves," said President Rene asking how many young people had grown up in this country who could not cook, look after their clothes and even after themselves.

"Why is that so?" he said. "Because too frequently there have been parents who spoilt their children. There were people who never asked their children to help around the house and in the end they became slaves of their own children. These then grew up with the belief that there would always be slaves."

"It is only in this place which you yourselves have named "youth paradise," where you will know what it means to work together, looking after each other and respecting one another."

The Head of State hit out at those people who have been spreading false rumours about the National Youth Service. Describing these people, he said: "They do not want their children to mix with others. They either believe their children have been specially chosen by God, or they themselves believe they are above all other human beings, or they have a false idea of the colour of their skin or they had once cheated the people and now did not want to see others becoming prosperous.

"If we are to examine these rumourmongers, we see the reason why they are against us. The reason is always malicious, wicked and vicious.

President Rene also explained that there were people who were easily influenced, who never tried to find out what was happening. "In the past we had too frequently believed that others were trying to hurt us.

"Why do you think I, or any other ministers including Minister Jumeau who is looking after the youth, would want to hurt our young people? Are we wicked? Why should we want to take our young people here and punish them?

"A reason for this is only seen in the minds of people who are always thinking bad of others. For three weeks, young people have come here in camps. You have now a small piece of land but you have managed to live a normal life during these weeks. In future it will be much different, because you will be better organised. Of course if we assess what you've done in one week we can calculate what you will do in 12 months. In that one year young people who have been through here will be able to name any tree or any fish. They will know everything young people of their age ought to know, because they will be working together in teams."

"It is here where we will get our musicians and it is here we will know who can sing and who can do craft-work. It is here all the children will be developed, it is here they will find their future and it is here at Port Launay, like it or not, where the Government will invest all its resources because it is here where all the leaders of tomorrow will come from, and nowhere else."

"This doesn't mean that we intend to punish those who do not come here, but we believe that those who come here will be far ahead of those who do not come. They will have more knowledge, more fraternity, more love and in general they will be those men and women who are ready for the future."

Earlier the Minister for Youth and Community Development, Mr. Esme Jumeau, had spoken about the success of the camps. He said over 490 young people attended the three camps voluntarily and had a wide programme of activities apart from learning to live together as brothers and sisters with discipline.

Each camp ended with its own cultural evening which attracted many people. Minister Jumeau thanked all those people especially the advisors--most of them school teachers--and those who helped with the cooking.

The youngsters at the camps also helped with the construction of National Youth Service buildings

COOPERATION WITH PROGRESSIVE ARAB STATES PRAISED

Victoria NATION in English 10 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Text]

THE CO-OPERATION between Seychelles and progressive Arab states will in time surpass the success of any other bilateral agreements that the Republic has so far been involved in.

This is the belief of the Seychelles Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Jacques Hodoul, who returned from a week's tour of Arab states last Sunday, during which he held several sessions of talks on Seychelles-Arab relations and co-operation.

Minister Hodoul's first stop was Tripoli at the head of a delegation from the Seychelles People's Progressive Front that attended the 11th anniversary of the Libyan September 1 Revolution. The Seychellois delegation attended a four-hour anniversary parade and listened to a three-hour speech by Libyan Head of State, Col. Muammar Gaddafi on the Libyan National Day.

During the address Col. Gaddafi promoted the proposed union between Libya and Syria, declared his intention to fight alongside the Palestinians and explained the assumption of power in Lib,a by the masses.

On September 2, Mr Hodoul and the Seychellois Minister for Education and Information, Mr. James Michel, called on the Libyan Foreign Minister, Dr. Ali Triki for talks. Minister Hodoul also handed his counterpart a message for Col. Gaddafi from President Rene.

That same afternoon Mr. Hodoul left for a three-day visit to Beirut and southern Lebanon at the invitation of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation. The PLO, which is based in Beirut, organised "a simple but very fraternal visit" during which Minister Hodoul met the PLO leader, Mr. Yasser Arafat, and other members of the Organisation's Executive Committee. They discussed the Palestinian struggle for their homeland, Seychelles' stand concerning the demilitarisation of the Indian Ocean and Seychelles-PLO co-operation in several fields.

Minister Hodoul was also taken on a tour of war-torn southern Lebanon which has left a profound and lasting impression on him.

Finally, last Saturday the Seychellois Foreign Minister spent a day in Baghdad, the Iraqi capital. There he met his counterpart, Dr. Saddoum Hammadi, to whom he delivered a message for Iraqi leader, President Saddam Hussain from President Rene, and the Minister for Agriculture for talks on bilateral co-operation.

During President Rene's visit to Iraq in late April this year co-operation agreements were signed by the two countries which Minister Hodoul followed up last Saturday when he clarified one or two points.

The fact that an Iraqi aid mission is expected in Seychelles soon to study the implementation of the various agreements is a sign of Mr. Hodoul's success.

Looking back on his trip as a whole, Minister Hodoul said that Seychelles had many friends among the progressive Arab states which several political parties and movements sharing similar ideals. These friendly states, he continued, were ready to do all they could to help Seychelles build its new socialist society.

As these friendly relations develop and the Seychelles-Arab solidarity is strengthened, Seychelles could expect more co-operation, Minister Hodoul said.

"The help we are getting is very important but better relations with the progressive Arab states and movements in the future will, I believe, be much more fruitful than any other bilateral agreements with any other countries in the past. I do not believe that in the future there will be anyone as generous as our progressive Arab brothers.

ARABS HELPING WITH OIL EXPLORATION, ELECTRIC POWER OUTPUT

Jiddah SAUDI BUSINESS in English 5 Sep 80 pp 16, 17

[Article by John Rossant]

[Text]

THE BURDEN OF THE rising costs of imported oil doesn't fall on the industrialized countries. In fact, the burden is perhaps heaviest on those countries who consume the least amount of oil. These are the developing nations of the world, the poor lands of the southern hemisphere. For them, importing what little oil they consume has become a "ponderous drag" to their development and growth, as American Secretary of State Edmund Muskie put it last week from the rostrum of the United Nations.

The large East African state of Tanzania provides a typical example of a developing nation whose economic growth is constantly hindered by the jumps in the price of imported oil. But Tanzania is also taking concrete steps to lessen its reliance on crude imports, and in that it is being aided not only by the usual Western and international development funding organizations, but by bilateral technical and financial agreements with oil-exporting countries. These latter donors are a new and significant force in economic development not only in Tanzania, but throughout the developing world.

By African standards, at least, Tanzania is doing fairly well. Its 16 millions enjoy a fairly diversified agricultural economy and stable political leadership. Despite shortages of teachers and school buildings, universal primary education exists. Some 40 per cent of Tanzanian villages now have clean tap water; 35 per cent have a dispensary; and 75 per cent have their own shop.

A look at the current accounts ledger however, reveals that all is not well. This month the Bank of Tanzania announced that its foreign exchange holdings had dropped to the perilously low level of 300 million, although it reckons that some $1.5 billion will have to be spent in 1980 for essential goods like spare parts, medicine, machines — and oil.

Oil is by far the largest item on Tanzania's import list, even though Tanzanian per capita consumption of crude oil is barely a tenth of that in the United States. The Energy Minister Al-Noor Qassum told Saudi Business last week that some 50 per cent of all Tanzania's foreign exchange earnings will this year go to pay for oil imports. "That," said a young Tanzanian economist at the Ministry of Finance in Dar Es-Salaam, "is an almost intolerable burden for us."

Julius Nyerere, the President of Tanzania since the country's independence in 1961, told Parliament last month that "the a terms of trade have moved against us." He said that the "present world economic system results in poor countries being automatically exploited by rich countries, even if a rich country does not intend to be an exploiter." He added that "in 1976 one ton of cotton could buy 11 tons of oil; today that ton of cotton buys only 7 tons of oil. Four years ago a ton of coffee could pay for 24 tons of oil; today it only buys 15 tons."

Tanzanians, like Americans and Europeans, have been forced to use less oil, either by decree or by skyrocketing prices at the pump. The government has issued tough regulations to item energy consumption. Gas stations are closed from Thursday to Sunday, and all vehicles except ambulances and public transport are banned from roads each Sunday.

But the only way a country like Tanzania can really hope to reduce crude oil imports is through searching for and exploiting its own hydrocarbon resources. The chances for finding commercially exploitable quantities of oil look good, say officials at the Ministry of Water, Energy and Minerals. So far, promising, large deposits of gas have been found along the Indian Ocean coast, and the search for oil is intensifying as never before. But Qassum warns that his country has " not yet found oil in commercial quantities, only traces of it." He added that " we must show a lot of patience. "

The Tanzania Petroleum Development Corporation (TPDC) within Qassum's ministry has been receiving a wide range of technological and financial aid for hydrocarbon exploration and development. Importantly a lot of that aid will now be coming directly from oil-exporting countries, as well as from Tanzania's historic donors in the community of industrialized nations.

At the moment, activity is concentrated on the Songo Songo islands south of Zanzibar, the ancient center of slave-trading. Last year two test wells on the small mangrove and palm-studded islands revealed proven gas reserves of around 100 billion cubic fest — not bad for starters. Qassum says that additional tests confirmed the possibilities of an oil accumulation with the gas.

With a $ 30 million interest-free credit from the International Development Agency of the World Bank, TPDC will drill two wells in the Songo Songo region this year, one off-shore, one on-shore. Significantly, the Songo Songo project is the first time that the World Bank has directly funded actual drilling operation in any country.

Songo Songo is not the only place in which Tanzania hopes to find oil. This year a financial aid agreement was reached with the Algerian state oil company Sonatrach. The program will get underway in a few months with the arrival of Algerian geologists and technicians who will conduct seismic surveys, exploration and drilling in various locations around Tanzania. Sonatrach is also arranging for Tanzanian personnel to study hydrocarbon sciences in Algerian institutes, beginning next year.

Iraq, too, Tanzania's main supplier of crude oil, is understood, to be prepared to provide TPDC with technical aid for hydrocarbon prospecting. Already, that Middle Eastern country has given Tanzania extensive credits for expanding hydroelectricity generation along the four major rivers streaming into the Indian Ocean.

Iraq will be playing a crucial part in helping TPDC expand Tanzanian refining capacity to meet the country's need for oil products. A feasibility study was completed by BEICIP Consultants last month on the expansion on Tanzania's only refinery, in Dar Es-Salaam, from 750,000 tons a year capacity to 1,600,000 tons. According to diplomatic sources, Iraq has indicated a willingness to fund the rump of the $ 256 million that TPDC says will be needed for such a project.

TPDC has also been cultivating Arab aid for its plans to erect a petrochemical industry utilizing Songo Song's gas as a feedstock. A feasibility study has already been completed on a 345,000 ton a year ammonia plant. Part of the plant's projected output will go to the existing Tonga fertilizer plant on the northern coast, but the bulk will be processed to yield half a million tons of urea, most of which will be exported. ●

PARTY, COOPERATIVE DELEGATIONS TO USSR--A 10-member delegation of the Revolutionary Party [CCM] along with a seven member delegation from the CCM youth union departed from the city of Dar es Salaam yesterday for the Soviet Union, where they were invited by the Communist Party of the Soviet Union [CPSU]. When he was talking at the airport, the assistant executive secretary of the CCM, Jacob Mbutu, who is heading the party delegation, said that the trip to the Soviet Union which will continue for one month is a result of an agreement between the CCM and CPSU to exchange their ideas as one means of maintaining relations between the two countries. He said that when it is in the Soviet Union, this delegation which includes three district executive secretaries and four regional executive secretaries, is expected to learn various party tasks and their implementation along with exchanging views in order to assist them when they return home. The head of the CCM youth delegation which also departed yesterday, Robert Machiwa, said that many of the members of the youth union who are teachers in various schools and colleges in the country are expected to teach at the College for Youth in Igumbiro, Iringa Region, after returning from the Soviet Union. One of these youths, Omari Byabato, was unable to accompany his comrades yesterday as a result of family problems at his home in Iringa and he is expected to depart next week to join his comrades. In addition five staff members from the United Association of Cooperatives departed from Dar es Salaam yesterday for the Soviet Union for 5 years of economic studies, according to a statement issued yesterday by the Office of Members of Cooperatives. CLOSER COOPERATION WITH IRAQ PLANNED

Kaunda Visits Baghdad

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Sep 80 p 1

[Article by Robby Makayi]

[Text]

BAGHDAD, Thursday. ZAMBIA and Iraq have reaffirmed their desire to strengthen links between the two countries.

A communique issued at the end of President Kaunda's three-day visit here said Iraqi President Saddam Hussein and his guest called for the speedy implementation of a long-term world fund to help developing countries against the effects of inflation.

The idea of the fund, to which industrialised countries will be expected to contribute sums amounting to the annual inflation exported by them to developing nations, was first mooted by Iraq.

President Kaunda and Hussein condemned attempts by some industrialised countries to divide oil producing countries and other developing nations.

They hailed the efforts of developing states, including Arab nations, towards obtaining advanced technology.

The two sides stressed the need for containing comprehensive negotiations between the industrialised countries and developing nations on international economic cooperation in progress.

Dr Kaunda and President Hussein emphasised that the negotiations should be action-oriented and should have an integrated and balanced approach to major relevant questions.

The two leaders said the negotiations should cover main issues in the fields of raw materials, energy, transport, trade, development, currency, finance and the transfer of technology.

"These negotiations should be an important contribution to the implementation of the strategy of international development for the United Nations third development decade," the two sides said.

They stressed their determination and resolve to abide by the principles of the Non-Aligned movement and enhance its role and effectiveness in the establishment of a new international, political and economic order.

They agreed on full cooperation to ensure the success of the seventh summit conference of the Non-Aligned movement which will be held in Baghdad in 1982.

Zambia and Iraq expressed concern at the cooperation between Israel and South Africa and condemned the nuclear collaboration between the two countries.

Joint Bank Venture

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 1

[Article by Robby Makayi]

[Text]

BAGHDAD, Friday.

ZAMBIA and Iraq have agreed to establish a joint commercial bank in Lusaka.

Iraq is also going to send agricultural experts to Zambia in two weeks to carry out a feasibility study of 18 sites selected for the "operation food production" on a free grant.

This is the result of President Kaunda's 18 hours flying visit to Iraq.

According to official sources, the Iraqis, who have already given Zambia a K30 million loan, and a K9 million grant, are keen to assist Zambia in any of its development projects, especially in the agricultural programme.

A team of Zambian officials is expected to come to Iraq soon to work out the details of the aid offer.

At the end of the visit, Zambia and Iraq issued a joint communique during the talks held between President Kaunda and President Saddam Hussein.

It covered bilateral relations and the international situation, particularly the Middle East crisis the Southern African problem and the Non-Aligned movement. Iraq will host the seventh Non-Aligned summit in 1982.

Aggression

Zambia and Iraq condemned Zionist aggression in the Middle East and stressed that a just and durable peace could not be achieved without the full and unconditional withdrawal of Israel from all occupied Arab territories.

They condemned any separate accords on the Middle East and the participation of imperialists in the problem which they said contributed to the liquidation of the rights of the Palestinians and disuniting the Arab ranks.

They expressed their determination and resolve to abide by the principles of the Non-Aligned movement.

Iraq and Zambia stressed the necessity of continuing negotiations between the industrialised states and the developing countries on international economic co-operation.

These should cover main issues in the field of raw materials, energy, transport, development, finance and the transfer of technology.

Zambia expressed its support for the Iraqi proposal to establish a long-term world fund for assisting the developing states against the effects of inflation.

Oil producing states, including Iraq, would contribute to the fund.

COOPERATION ACCORDS WITH INDIA SIGNED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

NEW DELHI, Saturday. ZAMBIA and India today signed letters of protocol on agriculture, trade, small-scale industries and industrial co-operation.

The ceremony was witnessed by President Kaunda and India's Prime Minister, Indira Gandhi at the presidential palace.

Minister of Agriculture and Water Development Mr Unia Mwila signed on behalf of Zambia for the agricultural agreement while his Indian counterpart Mr Rao Singh signed for his country.

Commerce and Industry Minister, Mr Remmy Chisupa signed three agreements on trade cooperation, small-scale industry and industrial co-operation.

Dr Leonard Chivuno, the permanent secretary for National Commission for Development Planning said the agricultural agreement would enable India to provide finance and technical assistance for the agro-industries and agricultural extension services.

According to the agreement a team of experts will visit Zambia next month to make an on-the-spot feasibility study for agro-industry, small-scale industry projects and extension services.

The team would then determine how much financial assistance in soft loans Zambia needed, Dr Chivuno said.

He said Zambia had already identified areas where the money would be spent although the actual amount would be determined by the feasibility studies. —Zana.

TERRORIST LEADER MUSHALA DESERTED BY GANG, MILITARY REPORTS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

NOTORIOUS terrorist leader Adamson Mushala has been deserted by his gang and is starving, according to military sources.

The sources said yesterday that Mushala, who has been terrorising the people of North-Western Province since 1976, had now run out of ammunition.

He had been using LMG 7.62 mm (light machinegun).

Mushala is said to be dying of starvation as he is unable to kill game on which he had been surviving.

The sources said the Zambia National Defence Forces had picked up the body of the terrorist's chief collaborator who was understood to have come from South Africa where Mushala and his gang were trained.

The coloured man, whom the sources did not name, was buried in Solwezi last Wednesday.

Mushala himself, after running out of ammunition, had fled into Zaire, according to the information with military sources.

But a fortnight ago he reported at Ikelenge Mission Hospital, near the Zairean border, seeking medical attention.

The ZNDF were apparently informed late and they arrived after he had already escaped.

Mushala has been terrorising people with his gang of Blackson Mushala (his young brother), Saimbwende, Friday Kananda. Mwanaute. Failo, Filaso. Achula. Ngondwe, Ben Sendela, Mujimanzovu and unidentified man.

According to military sources, all these men have run away from Mushala and are now roaming about in a game park in North-Western Province.

Military sources report that the terrorist is now completely deprived of any grassroot support which he had been getting largely from his father-in-law who has since been picked up by the ZNDF after he foiled a shoot-out with Mushala three months ago.

Since Mushala returned from military training in Namibia four years ago, he has been engaged in a vain terrorist campaign to take over the Government by force.

Fourteen people, including two police officers, have died in encounters with Mushala and his gang.

ZNDF troops have since been dispatched to Kasempa where he had been active to neutralise his activities.

It is reported that as a result of Mushala's terrorist operations, agricultural production in the Chizera and Kasempa areas have been gravely undermined.

LUSAKA URBAN ELECTIONS SCHEDULED FOR 15 SEPTEMBER

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

LUSAKA Urban is set for elections today in the "side programme" prepared by the elections office early this month.

And at Evelyn Hone College, Party officials held a meeting in camera yesterday which was reportedly aimed at putting finishing touches to the election procedures.

Elections will take place in Roma, Makeni, Kabulonga, Chawama, Munkolo, Woodlands and Chainda. Section elections did not take place in these areas between July 21 and 30 throughout the country because of alleged poor Party organisation.

Announcing the side programme, director of elections, Mr Tobias Mbewe, gave all sections where elections did not take place a week in which to register voters for today's elections.

And last week, Party Secretary-General, Mr Mainza Chona, appealed to aspiring candidates to accept defeat or victory in the elections without pointing accusing figures at anyone.

The elections would be significant, he said, because they would create more section and branch committees.

He said after the elections the Party should recruit more members.

● Some aspiring candidates in the forthcoming branch and ward elections in Kitwe's Kwacha constituency are allegedly threatening to beat up their opponents, constituency secretary, Mr Joseph Chabooka, said yesterday.

He said intimidation was rife in the area and Party officials feared the elections might be disrupted by "some disgruntled elements who have resorted to violence in order to win."

He said some of those involved were former Party officials —Times Reporter Zana.

FORMATION OF ZAMBIANIZATION SUB-COMMITTEES ORDERED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] THE chairman of the Zambianisation Committee, Mr John Chafwa, has ordered the immediate formation of Zambianisation sub-committees at places of work to minimise friction between managements and workers over the programme.

He made the order during a heated meeting on Thursday with Broken Hill mine management, Mineworkers Union of Zambia (MUZ) and works council officials which was called to review the Zambianisation programme at the division of Nchanga Consolidated Copper Mines.

Launching the attack on the alleged slow pace of Zambianisation at the mine, MUZ branch acting chairman, Mr Vincent Ngulube claimed a number of Zambians had left the mine and another had already submitted his resignation because of frustration.

"I feel Zambian graduates have their power stripped otherwise they should not have left. At the moment a graduate is about to resign, he is not even given a cup of tea," he said.

Mr Ngulube was referring to Mr Jones Daka, a mechanical engineer from the University of Zambia who informed the committee in the presence of the mine acting general manager, Mr David Allen, that he had decided to quit after serving the division for only a year.

In reply, Mr Chafwa, who is Minister of State for Labour and Social Services, asked Mr Daka to reconsider his decision for the benefit of the mine and the nation.

"I encourage people to fight from within. I expect you to maintain your fighting spirit and after you have helped others that is when you may think of leaving," he said.

Later asked whether he would resign, Mr Daka said: "I will still continue serving the mine."

He said he was among four other graduates who joined the mine at the same time and that he was supposed to become a section engineer by now.

He earlier told Mr Chafwa that there was no job satisfaction and the management was allegedly not willing to receive him as part of the system.

It took the management team, including Mining Industry Services Unit (MIMSU) superintendent for Manpower Services, Dr Brian Saville, time to explain to the committee that Zambian graduates had a bright future in the industry despite their complaints.

Mr Chafwa said during his committee's tour of the industry on the Copperbelt and Kabwe, it had been discovered that places of work were supposed to have Zambianisation sub-committees to moniter the programme and if possible help solve problems on the spot.

"I hope MIMSU will make sure that this is done so that workers' representatives sort out Zambianisation problems or take up with management some matters to avoid friction," Mr Chafwa said.

He called on the management to make every effort to prepare Zambians for promotion with a view to taking over jobs being done by expatriates.

He castigated some workers who went about throwing their weight at the expense of production.

ZCTU WARNS PARTY AGAINST FORCING POLICIES ON PEOPLE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Zambia Congress of Trade Unions has warned the Party and its Government against imposing policies on the people.

ZCTU general secretary Mr Newstead Zimba, who was addressing the Kitwe Press Club on Thursday night, said some of the decisions the Party and its Government had taken were not in the interest of the masses.

Mr Zimba said leaders should listen to the people to avoid trouble and that some of the decisions had led to an increase in unemployment.

Mr Zimba said at the moment there were about two million people without jobs and warned that this number would increase especially if the Government went ahead with the decentralisation of local government administration.

He said union leaders had continued to be realistic and pragmatic in their approach to problems affecting workers.

"Our critical look at attitudes in our country is directed at those leaders who have turned their ranks or positions in the Party and Government as symbols of their own importance to the extent that if these positions had special cloth to identify them with special tags, they could have easily put them on to avoid people asking them names in public.

"If democracy was exercised for all positions in these institutions, leaders would have been removed because they are not fulfilling their obligations to the masses," he said.

Mr Zimba said the leadership has not looked at the effects the decisions they have taken would have on the number of workers to be declared redundant.

The Zambia Congress of Trade Unions (ZCTU) has urged the Government to create more job opportunities to enhance the security of all citizens.

The call is contained in resolutions passed by a five-day seminar of information and research officers of the congress which ended in Lusaka on Thursday.

The seminar urged the Government to allocate more funds to employment generating programmes in order to minimise the problem of unemployment in the country.

'TEMPESTUOUS RELATIONSHIP' OF COPPER WORKERS, EMPLOYERS EXAMINED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 14 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

SO for the moment there is a lull in the tempestuous relationship between the Mineworkers Union of Zambia and the Association of Copper Mining Employers (ACME) following the signing of an agreement between the two sides which has given miners a new wage increase.

This follows threats by the MUZ that the miners would go on strike if they did not receive a pay rise to cope with the soaring cost of living in the country.

There is no illusion that this development ushers in a new blissful era of cordial relations between these two strange bedfellows the union on the one side and the mining companies on the other.

Sparks are mostly likely to fly in future. An indication of things to come is the fact that the new agreement tentatively calls for a review in the job evaluation system used on the mines to grade jobs.

This is done for the mining companies by the Copper Industry Service Bureau (CISB) which, in the colonial era, was referred to as the chamber of mines.

The job evaluation programme and the Zambianisation scheme are two contentious issues which have yet to be solved by the mines and the Government.

Recently a top mining official admitted to Zambianisation committee chairman and Minister of State for Labour and Social Services Mr John Chafwa, that a number of educated Zambians were leaving the mines for employment in other companies.

The MUZ feels that Zambians have not been given a fair deal at all. Last week in Kitwe, deputy secretary-general for industrial relations, Mr Stephen Chewe said when commenting on the present job evaluation system:

"There is need to revamp the system. There are new elements which have to be considered."

At the moment there are two job evaluation systems which are in use on the mines. These are the "factor weighted system" and the 'HAY-MSL' for senior staff.

The former is for miners who are represented by the MUZ and the exercise is carried out by the CISB through its Personnel Research Unit (PRU) which employs job analysts. The MUZ apparently feels that some jobs are deliberately downgraded by CISB.

Defining job evaluation, Mr Chewe says it is a "process of analysing and systematically comparing the content of jobs against an agreed criterion in order to place them in an acceptable rank order."

He calls it the "systematic method of analysing the contents of jobs and determining their relative importance, its purpose being to establish a proper rate of pay for each job commensurate with the requirement of that job."

The MUZ official says that in other words job evaluation should be a plan or formula to determine the ranking of each job. He stresses that what is important is not to evaluate the holder but the job itself.

At the moment there is widespread discontent among miners and the union who think that CISB officials do not adhere to this criterion and jobs are evaluated on the basis of who is doing what.

The job evaluation exercise was introduced by the Brown Commission appointed by the Government in 1966.

Chaired by Mr Roland Brown, the commission followed strikes the previous year by miners demanding equal pay for equal work and other benefits enjoyed by expatriates.

A white paper published with the Brown Commission's report in 1966 said:

"It is important that every vestige of racial discrimination be eradicated from the mining industry. This must run the entire gamut of industrial relations — from the right to use facilities to the level of wages paid.

"It is the government's hope that the publication of the report of the Brown Commission and the subsequent negotiations on the Copperbelt will be a turning point in industrial relations in the country. The long accumulation of the economic inequities and the racial injustices which are the mining industries' inheritance must be broken."

The answer to the question whether this has been done is found in the recent strike threat. For many, the Brown Commission is "credited" with having given birth to most of the subsequent problems which have dogged the mining industry to this day.

In their submissions to the commission, the Zambian Trade Unions had argued for equal pay for equal work on the principle that the rate for the job "must be recognised by the creation of a single basic wage scale on which all employees, local and expatriate, are placed in appropriate positions determined on the basis of job evaluation."

"But there was a spirited argument against this by the mining companies whose representatives argued against the introduction of job evaluation since this would "degenerate into a process of bargaining on the part of the MUZ and thus destroy its scientific basis."

In the end, however, it would appear that in some ways the mining companies held sway, for although the Brown Commission agreed that there should be an evaluation of jobs to determine rates of pay, the report also agreed that some of the functions of certain jobs should be fragmented.

Inevitably this has led to the frustration of those Zambians who have taken over expatriates' jobs since such jobs show that some of their original responsibilities have been virtually downgraded.

Mr Chewe said this was common in the highly technical fields where the mining companies "seem not to have much faith in the Zambians who have the qualifications to ably perform such jobs."

What he concedes to have put the MUZ in a fix is that it has no say in the conditions of service for the senior staff managers. Their conditions of service are pegged to international rates of pay. This has created a misunderstanding between Zambian managers and the ordinary miners.

Although the MUZ is represented on the job evaluation panel for the general payroll staff, it is generally conceded that their participation is not effective enough since the union has the expertise to contribute. It follows therefore, that CISB analysts, who in the main are contract staff, have the final say in the rating of the jobs.

It is probably indicative of the MUZ's distrust of CISB that the recent agreement between the union and the copper mining employers noted: "Both parties have already agreed that a complete review of the industry job system should be undertaken and that an outside consulting firm should be engaged with representatives of both parties to achieve the desired objectives."

MUZ officials have conceded that the exercise would be costly, but are prepared to go ahead. On their part the mining industry through CISB are braced for battle. Last week they announced that two job evaluation experts would be brought at a cost of K36,000 each a year to advise them on the scheme.

On the outcome of the proposed new evaluation system will hinge the future of industrial relations in the mining sector, which incidentally is the single most important industry in Zambia.

Last year, for instance, total sales from copper were in excess of K800 million. The industry employs 54,000 Zambians and 3,000 expatriates whose annual payroll totals K180 million.

Because of its dominating influence in the Zambian economy, the mining industry has three special contributions: To provide jobs within the sector, to provide the Government with revenue to carry out development programmes, and also to generate employment elsewhere in the economy.

For this to continue unhindered conditions must prevail on the mines which will induce Zambians to stay not otherwise.

INDENI OIL REFINERY PROFIT REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE Indeni petroleum refinery in Ndola made a profit of K870,000 during the 1979/80 financial year, company chairman Mr Patrick Chisanga, has announced.

Mr Chisanga said in a statement in the company's report for the year under review that the firm made a K9.704 million turnover against K9.378 the previous year.

A dividend of K650,000 was declared and has since been paid out to shareholders while K220,000 has been transferred to loan redemption reserve.

Mr Chisanga, who is the Zimco executive director for transport and energy explained that the refinery processed 24,000 metric tonnes of crude oil during this period more than in 1978/79.

During the year ended March 31, 1980, the refinery processed 741,000 metric tonnes of crude oil as compared to 765,000 metric tonnes the previous year.

Mr Chisanga said this declining trend is satisfactory from the point of view of conservation of energy and on the other hand, it is an indicator of the slow economic recovery the country is experiencing.

He explained that contrary to previous years, the three per cent decrease was because of difference in stock and not decreased demand of the product.

However, he points out that while the increased price of motor spirit had brought down domestic consumption by nine per cent, demand for aviation kerosene recorded a marked increase of 29 per cent while diesel demand was practically the same.

He said supply through Tazara pipelines was regular but the percentage of crude decreased from 57 to 50 because of introduction of some Arabian heavy into the spiked crude.

"Total processing cost recorded only an increase of three point five per cent which is a remarkable achievement in cost control considering the local and world wide inflationary trend and during the year additional expenditure was incurred in the general maintenance of the refinery," Mr Chisanga said.

RELIGIOUS SCHOOL CONTROVERSY REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

A DENOMINATIONAL wrangle centring on who should become the religious inspector of schools has been raging between Protestants and Catholics since 1978.

This has resulted in the post remaining vacant because the Ministry of Education and Culture delegated selection of the right candidate to the Roman Catholic Episcopal Conference and the Christian Council of Zambia.

A spokesman for the Social and Culture Sub-Committee of the Central Committee spoke about the wrangle when he exonerated the ministry from the blame for the absense of an inspector of schools for religious education.

The spokesman was reacting to a letter published in the Times of Zambia on September 9 written by Mr W.C. Tembo, accusing chairman of the Social and Culture Sub-Committee, Mr Elijah Mudenda, of contradicting himself at the President's Citizenship College by saying any form of socialism introduced by the Party would not interfere with religion.

Contradicted

Mr Mudenda's actions, according to the letter, contradicted his words because since he took over as chairman, the ministry of Education and Culture, which falls under his sub-committee, had "totally" changed its policy on religion.

The letter, claimed had religious education for all pupils from Grade One to Form Five was no longer compulsory, and the post of inspector of schools for religious subject had been abolished.

But the committee spokesman denied that the post had been abolished. "The post is still there although it is still vacant," he said.

He explained that since 1978, the ministry had been waiting for the Episcopal Conference and the Christian Council of Zambia to nominate a person to fill the post.

Asked why the ministry could not employ an inspector of its own choice as was the case with other employees, the spokesman said this had been tried but the two church bodies protested saying such an inspector would be promoting one enomination.

On the question of not making religious education, compulsory the spokesman said doing so would be contrary to provisions of the freedom of worship.

"Mr Mudenda cannot allow a situation where religious education becomes compulsory for all pupils from Grade One to Form Five, because there would be no freedom of worship," he said.

"Infact, what Mr Mudenda said at the President's Citizenship College was that any form of socialism introduced by the Party would not interfere with religion.

"This should be understood to mean that, socialism of any brand should not interfere with peoples freedom to worship their God".

Meanwhile, the ministry's permanent secretary Mr Peter Siwo, said a suitable candidate agreeable to both parties would soon be appointed.

"I have not received anything official on the matter, though, but I understand that the two parties have resolved their differences over who should be inspector of schools for religion.

"As soon as I get something officially, a suitable candidate will be appointed as soon as possible," he said.

PREPARATIONS FOR CONSTRUCTION OF NDOLA-KITWA HIGHWAY REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE Zambia Electricity Supply Corporation has started removing pylons on the eight-kilometre stretch near Kitwe to make way for the construction of the K15 million Ndola-Kitwe dual carriageway.

A Zesco spokesman confirmed that work was in progress but declined to say when it would be completed.

The pylons have been at the centre of a controversy with Zesco demanding K202,000 as the cost of removing them from the stretch while Cogefar, the Italian firm constructing the road, said the project would be delayed if the pylons were not removed.

It took Copperbelt member of the Central Committee Mr Shadreck Soko's intervention last month before Zesco finally agreed to remove them to allow Cogefar move on the stretch before the rains start.

Yesterday the Zesco spokesman could not say if Cogefar had settled his company's demands for compensation.

Meanwhile, Livingstone Member of Parliament Mr Sebastian Kapalu has appealed to Zesco to simplify its accounting system so that customers have o problems in settling their bills.

Mr Kapalu was commenting on reports from Livingstone residents complaining that Zesco accounting system was so complicated that many were allegedly being overcharged.

He said the long daily queues at the Zesco office in the town centre seemed to confirm that there was something wrong in the accounting system of the corporation.

"I have come to believe that the majority of the people who are electricity consumers are being overcharged and must be paying a fortune to Zesco every month," Mr Kapalu said.

He cited an example where a customer received a bill of K83.79 as the amount due for payment for last month, but on production of previous receipts it was discovered that the larger part of the bill comprised arrears which had already been paid.

According to Mr Kapalu, Zesco accounts staff had to alter this figure until the customer paid K32.59 and "had he not shown proof of previous payments he would have ended up paying an additional K51.20 for nothing".

A spokesman at the Zesco district office said the accounting of electricity bills for the whole country was centralised and done by computer in Lusaka.

SMUGGLING OF ILLEGAL ALIENS REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE police and immigration officers in Kitwe have smashed a racket in which Senegalese nationals have their stay in Zambia extended by stamping their passports with forged date stamps.

A police spokesman confirmed yesterday that they were holding a man who is employed by the Government printers in Lusaka who allegedly made the date stamps and gave them to an agent in Kitwe's Twatasha township.

The racket was uncovered during the recent operation clean-up in which several aliens were picked up and their passports scrutinised to establish their authenticity.

The district immigration officer Mr Joseph Kapambwe said the gang had two forged Zambia immigration date stamps for permits at the Kasumbalesa and Mokambo border posts, and two similar date stamps from Zaire.

The date stamps are marked "exit and entry". According to the immigration officials the agent who has since appeared in court was charging K40 for the renewal of the aliens' travel documents.

A police spokesman said efforts to clean the town of illegal residents has been failing because after the aliens were rounded up, they were released when their passports were found to be in order.

A man who has been allegedly assisting aliens in this way was jailed by a Kitwe magistrate yesterday.

Baxter Nyirongo of Twatasha township was sentenced to 20 months imprisonment suspended for 16 months by resident magistrate Mrs Ruth Zulu.

Nyirongo, who pleaded guilty to all the five counts, was also fined K50 or three months imprisonment in default.

The court was told that Nyirongo had asked a man working for the Government Printers to make him a date stamp similar to the ones used by immigration officers at Kasumbalesa border post.

He admitted stamping passports of foreigners and extending their stay in the country at a cost of K40 each.

● Customs officers should be vigilant and double their efforts in combating smuggling which has rocked the country, Minister of State for Finance Mr Jameson Kalaluka said in Livingstone yesterday.

He said there was an increase in smuggling of currency and essential commodities by unscrupulous individuals and businessmen.

Speaking at the opening of the 14th annual collectors conference here, Mr Kalaluka said by preventing smuggling, the Department of Customs would help sustain the economy of the country and minimise shortages of goods.

On tax collection, the minister said every company, including parastatals, should pay tax to the Government. Failure to do so would result in heavy penalties. — Zana.

BRIEFS

BRITISH AGRICULTURAL AID--The British government is to give Zambia K20 million in agricultural aid. British High Commissioner to Zambia, Mr John Johnson, said this in Livingstone yesterday when he met Southern Province political secretary, Mr Axon Soko. Mr Johnson was in Livingstone to present sewing machines to the Maramba Catholic Church sponsored dressmaking project. He said British aid to Zambia was in the agriculture, health and education sectors and last year his country gave Zambia K54 million in aid. The K20 million aid was part of more British aid to the country for the integrated rural development projects in the Central, Southern and Northern provinces. Mr Johnson said Britain was willing to assist Zambia because it was satisfied with the way the country used its resources in development. With the improvement of the British economy his government would be ready to increase its credit facilities to other industries in Zambia such as mining which, he said, were doing well. Mr Soko told Mr Johnson that British aid to Zambia was needed to generate employment and overcome poverty and ignorance.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 12 Sep 80 p 1]

IRISH TEAM PLEDGES AID--An Irish company--Devmpco Limited--has pledged to offer personnel and long-term training to Zambians in a bid to accelerate agricultural development and related industries. Managing director, Mr Flann McGinley, made the pledge in Lusaka yesterday and said Zambia had the potential to develop her agricultural industry because it had fertile land and abundant water. Speaking in an interview, Mr McGinely, who is part of a five-man Irish export board which arrived in Zambia yesterday, said he was here to discuss with the Ministry of Agriculture and Water Development, Rural Development Corporation and Indeco, the possibilities for the development of agriculture, livestock and the processing of agricultural raw materials. "We feel we have some insight into the Zambian Government's policies for the development of agriculture in particular, and the rural areas in general. "We are here not merely to write studies but we can provide all the necessities for the implementation of agricultural programmes, including training technical personnel," he said. He noted that Zambia's agricultural development needed cash from the international community to help emergent commercial farmers. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Sep 80 p 1]

LINTCO NEEDS HELP--Choma governor Mr Crosbery Chibanga has appealed to Government departments and parastatal organisations to assist Lintco collect cotton from rural areas by providing transport. Mr Chiganga made the appeal when he opened a district development council meeting on Thursday, saying large quantities of cotton worth several thousands of Kwacha were still uncollected from rural areas. He said reports had reached him that Lintco did not have sufficient transport to haul the cotton for storage along the line-of-rail. Cotton farmers would be discouraged if their produce was destroyed when they were being asked to grow more food and other cash crops like cotton, he said. Mr Chiganga said Government departments and parastatal organisations should provide transport to help Lintco solve the problem and save the cotton from destruction. State organisations should demonstrate a spirit of cooperation at times like this as a means of defeating problems, said Mr Chibanga. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 2]

ENERGY REPORT--Zambia can save energy on the mines by changing to autogenous processes using the heat wave of ore concentrates in copper smelting, a World Bank report on energy in the developing countries has said. The report, published by the bank and released in Lusaka notes that developing countries with relatively high levels of energy consumption such as Zambia, were major producers of the energy-intensive industrial products such as copper. Zambia could save five to ten percent of energy on copper in the 1980s through simple changes and improvements in production processes such as the recovery of by-products or the installation of waste heat boilers, and insulation. These energy savings could be achieved within two or three years through improved management and personnel training in maintenance. Some of the measures to save energy in Third World countries required little or no investment, an example of which is the removal of government price regulations which in many countries prevent the economic pricing of energy products, the report notes. The greatest scope for curbing the growth of energy demand in Zambia was in the industrial sector as out of the total commercial energy consumption, about 35 percent was in this area, says the report. TIMBER IMPORTS TO END--Zambia may become self-sufficient in construction timber if research being conducted by the Forest Product Division in Kitwe succeeds, it was reported yesterday. In a paper presented yesterday to a Zambia Forestry Association seminar at Mwekera Forest College, a forestry expert, Mr Allan Mann said Zambia was experiencing a critical shortage of home grown construction timber and as a result the company spent millions of Kwacha in foreign exchange. Although the country imported timber from neighboring countries, some of it was unsuitable for construction and this was why it was important for the country to develop her own timber, he said. According to the paper, it would not have been necessary to import timber if eucalyptus trees were allowed to grow for more than 52 years. The money spent on importing timber would have instead been invested in appropriate saw milling machinery, he said. Mr Mann said lack of sawmill equipment was hampering progress in research. Orders for such machinery, placed two years ago, had not been sanctioned by the Forestry Department. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 15 Sep 80 p 7]

JAILING OF ALIENS--About 20 aliens detained at Kitwe's Kamfinsa prison for alleged illegal trading in emeralds are being refused medical treatment for venereal diseases as punishment, officer-in-charge of immigration in Kitwe, Mr Joseph Kapambwe, has disclosed. Mr Kapambwe said over the weekend that the aliens were picked up from Golden Peacock night club last Wednesday, because they entered the country illegally and would be taken to court and deported after serving their sentences. He said he hoped the sick aliens would never come back to Zambia "for their mischief" after going through this kind of treatment. Mr Kapambwe admitted that his department was failing to control the influx of aliens into Zambia because of the vast bushy border between Zaire and Zambia. He said there were 80 more aliens still awaiting trials for entering the country illegally. In Lusaka, armed police on Saturday rounded up hundreds of illegal traders in their continued operation clean-up. The police rounded up any one they found "loitering" during the day and those who had no identity cards. The culprits were marched in single file with their hands raised above their heads to Freedom House where they were transported in police trucks and private mini buses to the Central police station. EXCLUSION FROM WATA--Zambia has been left out of an agreement of the World Association of Travel Agencies (WATA) of which she is a member because of her exchange control difficulties. WATA governor for East and Central Africa Mr Beejay Sharma said in Lusaka yesterday that the Geneva-based organisation recently clinched a deal with the Hertz Company for the use of their vouchers for the payment of tourists' bills through travel agencies. According to the agreement, when tourists booked for a destination from their home country, payment was made only after they had returned. The travel agency in Zambia, for instance, could remit the tourist's bill to his local travel agent in his country. "If we entered into an agreement, Zambia would be remitting bills for services incurred by tourists while in the country which is not possible now because of our strict measures. GAS STATIONS RUN DRY--Petrol stations have run out of fuel in Livingstone but there is hope fresh supplies would be received within few days. The petrol drought hit Livingstone motorists yesterday when the only filling station with fuel had its tanks emptied. A Motor Holdings spokesman confirmed a critical shortage of fuel has hit the town. But he allayed fears among motorists when he said 4,000 litres of petrol from Lusaka were expected soon. He explained that the shortage had partly been caused by the suspension of credit facilities by suppliers since the beginning of August.--Zana [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 13 Sep 80 p 2]

EEC'S DOCTORS OFFER--The Ministry of Health has invited the European Economic Community (EEC) for discussions on volunteer doctors who want to serve in five health centres under construction in different parts of the country. The ministry's acting permanent secretary, Dr Winford Lungu, said this in Lusaka yesterday when he was commenting on reports that volunteer doctors offered by the EEC to man the health centres were rejected by his ministry. Last week, EEC technical adviser, Mr Jorgen Sonderberg, said the ministry blocked the arrival of the doctors who were ready to serve in health centres being built at Kasenangwa, Mongu, Mufulira, Chalata and Sipatunyana. Minister of State for Health, Mr John Mwondela, said last week the minstry's policy did not allow doctors to be stationed at health centres. "It is not that the ministry refuses to have doctors at health centres purposely, but doctors need more facilities like X-ray equipment, laboratories and operating theatres which are not found in the centres," Dr Lungu said yesterday. DBZ FOUNDATION STONE--Prime Minister Mr Daniel Lisulo is expected to lay a foundation stone at the Development Bank of Zambia (DBZ) building being constructed opposite the Lusaka city library on September 18. EFFORTS TO ATTRACT INVESTORS DESCRIBED

Jiddah SAUDI BUSINESS in English 15 Aug 80 pp 14, 15

[Text]

THE NEWLY BORN state of Zimbabwe is joining the ranks of the many developing countries looking to the Arabian peninsula for trade and development support.

Two representatives from the private sector Zimbabwe Promotion Council were in the Kingdom for two days late last month at the end of a brief tour around the Gulf states. Its chairman, C.G. Tracy, together with its senior vice chairman, Dr. Dexter Chavanduka, were promoting an international conference on the economic resources of Zimbabwe to be held in Salisbury on September 1-5.

In Riyadh they met several officials, including one from the Saudi Fund for Development. In Jeddah, they visited the chamber of commerce, National Commercial Bank and several leading businessmen in the search for Saudi delegates to the conference.

The conference, Tracy said, is gearing for 245 officials and businessmen from around the world including 45 each from Britain, South Africa and the United States. Two representatives from the Soviet Union are expected to be invited. But Zimbabwe's new Prime Minister Robert Mugabe has specifically requested that delegates from the Arab world should be encouraged to come and Zimbabwe's foreign ministry is expected soon to contact its Saudi counterpart.

Organizers are hoping a Nairobi meeting of Arab chambers of commerce just before the conference could help encourage Arab attendance.

Clearly Africa's newest nation, which the U.N. Security Council last month unanimously recommended should become its 154th member country, has a long development haul ahead both generally and specifically with the Arab world with which political and trade links have been minimal over the years of international isolation and bush war.

Diplomatic representation is negligible and although a cadre of black Zimbabwe diplomats have been under training in Salisbury to field the country's interests abroad, the program has been stalled since it was discovered that all had been recruited from only one tribe for political reasons.

At the moment the country is anxious to open itself up to foreign trade and sorely needed investment. The conference is intended as a key vehicle to present Zimbabwe to the world, said Tracy, a leading white businessmen with over thirty company chairmanships who claims full confidence in the new, elected government.

Tracy who claims to be apolitical and to hold and have held friendships with all Zimbabwe's (and Rhodesia's) Prime Ministers including Mugabe and Ian Smith, is phlegmatic about his country's current problems. And his enthusiasm for its resources and potential is shared by Dr. Chavanduka, a black veterinary scientist with the Ministry of Agriculture.

Despite the often ineffectual international boycott which the Kingdom has joined in lifting and years of guerrilla strife, Dr. Chavanduka stresses his country has emerged with a sound economic infrastructure for the future. Development plans too have been drawn though now dependent on foreign investment and aid. Throughout the period, for example, Tracy said, Zimbabwe had fought its way into a substantial share of the international cotton market despite heavy competition from traditional producers like Egypt. Agriculture, both thought, would be an area of strong potential trade with the Kingdom.

But the country's mineral resources are certainly its greatest future hope. The mining industry, according to the Economist, was last year responsible for only 8 per cent of GDP and 6 per cent of employment but half the $1 billion exports. Six of the country's ten main exports are minerals in various stages of processing — gold, asbestos, iron and steel products, ferro-alloys, nickle and copper in that order. Its special chrome alloys, Tracy and Chavanduka said, had been used for U.S. aerospace projects after specially approved sanctions breaches.

Gold exports are expected to double this year to $110 million as are Zimbabwe's total exports by a third, despite the world recession. New collieries are opening and an array of the world's leading mining companies are sitting on interesting properties or expanding mines. But the country's railway system, according to the Economist, is insufficient for bulk ore transport, and the new government has yet to clarify its policy on ownership of the industry now largely controlled from South Africa.

Manufacturing accounts for about 45 per cent of foreign exchange earnings which economic observers say reflects white determination after the illegal unilateral declaration of independence from Britain in 1965 to create import substitutes. But two years of drought have plagued the country's 5,000 white farmers and Zimbabwe is for the first time in many years this year expected to import corn, the staple food of the country's seven million blacks.

Living standards are expected to rise this year with GDP growth of 4 per cent rising to 6 per cent next year, and inflation is expected to fall from the 1979 figure of 12.5 per cent.

But while export earnings are expected to increase to about $1,345 billion this year — largely because of the end of payments to sanctions busting middlemen — imports are expected to rise 50 per cent to $900 million largely because of oil price rises.

Decades of supremacy by over 200,000 whites have left them dominating key managerial and skilled positions and should emigration of around 1,000 a month this year lead to a mass exodus Zimbabwe would suffer the same economic crises as those of Angola and Mozambique in 1975. But Mozambiquan President Samora Machel on the first state visit to Salisbury last week was believed to be advising the pragmatic Mugabe against rash action.

Tracy, clearly one white with much to lose, appeared confident of no such crisis, but equally he downplayed the recent premature resignation of General Peter Walls as head of Zimbabwe's high command. Walls' marshalling of the new army being forged from the two guerrilla armies of Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo and that of the former Smith regime had been a bulwark of confidence for the white minority. According to reports from Salisbury, Walls resigned partly because of White hostility towards him but mainly because the integration is going slowly.

Last week, angry Africans batterred and kicked a bronze statue in Salisbury of Rhodesia's founder Cecil Rhodes as it was taken down. But last week too, Zimbabwe won its first Olympic gold medal.

for women's hockey, having been drafted into the games at the last minute because of the failure of boycotting countries to appear.

Politically, Robert Mugabe has a clear electoral mandate to face disgruntled antagonism from members of Joshua Nkomo's party. So far he has maintained a clear, Western, pragmatic direction even to the extent of maintaining ties with racist South Africa, isolated Rhodesia's traditional ally.

But estimates on foreign investment needed for future growth. Up to $1 billion to finance post-war rural reconstruction alone, particularly to underwrite Mugabe's promise to redistribute land. So far, foreign aid offers have been disappointingly low. Businessmen have held back to assess the new government's stability. But next month's conference — about which more details are available from theCommercialCounsellor at the British embassy in Jeddah, David Gore-Booth — is expected at least to focus on economic opportunities in Zimbabwe and ideally generate real interest.

RELATIONSHIPS OF SUB-SAHARAN AFRICAN SOCIETIES, ISLAM EXAMINED

Paris LE MOIS EN AFRIQUE in French Apr-May 80 pp 47-64

[Article by Guy Nicolas: "African Societies, Arab World and Islamic Culture"]

[Text] The present study is the introductory lecture for the series of lectures presented on the subject concerned in February-March 1979 by the Center for Studies on Relations between the Arab World and Africa (INALCO).

The domain of the interactions between Islamic culture, the Arab world and sub-Saharan Africa holds an increasingly decisive position in the contemporary world, and more particularly, for the future of Africa. But it has not so far received as much attention as other questions. Moreover, it is increasingly difficult to keep track of the flow of information relating to so vast and complex a movement. The time is past when a single person could hope to master the existing documentation. The precipitation of events, the flow of data, the development of research, the multiplication of publications and their increasing diffusion impose the absolute necessity of promoting the circulation of information, encouraging the cooperation of specialists and organizing coherent research. It is important to determine the strong points of our knowledge and the gaps to be filled in and to stimulate the interest of young researchers. On the other hand, overall analysis of the question under consideration--too often treated in the form of a juxtaposition of partial work, without any organic links among it--should be encouraged.

In the third place, most of the available studies concerning the problem at hand date from the period that preceded the independence of the modern African states and therefore do not concern the present developments in this field. But these developments are rapid and considerable: Afro-Arab relations, sub-Saharan Islam and the Moslem question have taken new turns. New frameworks have appeared. Furthermore, a great deal of research and published works are being developed today in the Arab and African universities and universities in other parts of the world, and some of this calls the conclusions of previous authors into question. It is important to take these trends into consideration and analyze them.

We have given this study the title "African Societies, Arab World and Islamic Culture." It seemed necessary to us to distinguish the three levels of sociocultural reality that it evokes. It is a question of analyzing the processes of complex interaction among areas that do happen to mix together but that also dissociate and function at different levels. Very often, the Moslem universe is reduced by observers to its Arab "home" and a fringe of it. Such a point of view makes for neglect of certain manifestations of Islamic reality that do not relate to the Arab universe, and thus misunderstanding of a part of the richness and diversity of the Moslem cultures as a whole. In particular, Islam gets treated as an aspect of Arab culture as such, so that the expansion of Islam comes to be considered a process of Arabization pure and simple. On the other hand, the specific local characteristics of many non-Arab societies that have adopted Islam are considered somewhat as effects of an incomplete grafting of Arab culture onto stocks that are fundamentally foreign to it. This point of view leads to considering that the groups concern may never be able to conform to the pure Islamic model because of the fact of their origin, unless they make a total conversion to Arabness.

Such a perspective is sometimes applied more particularly to the Islamized societies south of the Sahara. The disparity between the local popular practices and the Arab model is then perceived as a sort of deterioration of Islamic purity, as if there were authentic Moslem peoples on the one hand, and on the other, second-rank Moslem peoples corresponding to the periphery of the Arab world, and more particularly, its southern or "Negro" edges. Such points of view underlie prejudices, strategies, contempts and ways of envisaging the relations among Moslems, and more or less lively reactions from those who thus find themselves relegated to the fringes. This is why they need to be analyzed with the greatest objectivity and the greatest clarity. In particular, we must study the way in which African societies that are rooted in a long and complex history and whose orientations are often far-removed from those of the other Moslem societies respond to the Islamic model as such, as well as to the presence of their Arab partners and coreligionists.

Historical Problems

The first aspect of the question of the relations among African societies, Arab world and Islamic culture relates to the plane of history. Indeed, contrary to other sub-Saharan societies which because of the absence of written documents on their past have been classified as "societies without history," the Moslem societies of this region have been the subject of written descriptions, often ancient ones. It is perhaps in the domain of history that sub-Saharan Islam is best known, although a large part of the local writings have not yet given up their secrets. However, the sources on which this history has been built are sometimes challenged today, from the point of view both of their objectivity and of the value of the observations or documents available to their authors or the scope of their descriptions. In addition, the gap that has so far been maintained between historians and collectors of oral or ethnographic traditions has not facilitated the efforts at reconstruction of the past of the societies concerned. The concepts or models used by the first historians are likewise disputed or judged to be marked by ethnocentric, racial or ideological prejudices. Various contemporary researchers also demonstrate a concept of history that puts the emphasis on military exploits or the positions of the aristocracy, to the detriment of other more fundamental aspects of economic, social and cultural life.

The distorting character of historical reconstructions based on foreign narratives or those of a particular social category--that is, the literate, whose observations could well be influenced by their own group ideologies or values--has also been stressed. Certain historians have also been reproached for having devalued precolonial Islam, by depreciating its relations with the rest of the Moslem world and its most brillian manifestations. The authors of these criticisms stress the ancientness of the relations between the Moslem societies of the two sides of the Sahara and of the Red Sea, their permancence through the centuries, and the fact that certain literate Africans of the past attained a high degree of mastery of the two cultures, Arab and African, at the same time. The authors of the beginning of this century appear to have exaggerated the isolation and specificity of sub-Saharan Islam and its heterodox aspects.

As regards the fact that certain literate persons in the past possessed both cultures, it could prove that the encounter of the Arab and African cultures does not necessarily result in syncretic compromises, but that it can produce harmonious relationships, based on based on possession of two cultures, in the same way that is the portion of many contemporary Africans as regards Western culture. This fact, which needs to be analyzed, opens up some interesting perspectives with regard to the destinies of Islam south of the Sahara.

As regards the studies, the approach to the "Moslem question" in this region has taken a sinuous course. At the beginning of European penetration, the conquerors ran up against large hostile Moslem groups or movements that raised the standard of "holy war" against them. During the period of implantation of the European colonial regime, the administrators stood in fear of the outbreak of insurrection movements of Moslem inspiration. In this context, analyses of the sub-Saharan Moslem phenomenon, done mostly by European administrators, multiplied. But as local Islam gradually lost most of its political dimensions and the Moslem cadres were integrated into the colonial apparatus, the studies becames rarer, except as regarded the more distant past. Most of the researchers then turned toward study of the non-Moslem cultures. In the era of national independence, sub-Saharan Islam was no longer in the forefront of immediate concern. It was considered mainly from the angle of religion. The new African elites, a large part of whom came out of the mission schools or the public schools, turned toward outlooks according to which Islam, an imported religion, was to play only a minor role in the development of modern Africa.

Since then, various events have again drawn the attention of the specialists and of innumerable commentators. Studies of importance and of very unequal value have multiplied. It is important to apply a more rigorous method of analysis to the processes in question, so as to get out of the realm of stereotypes or prejudices and arrive at more precise, more objective and more comprehensive knowledge of the facts under consideration.

Islam and Ethnicity

Another dimension of sub-Sahara Islam of which analysis should be developed is its ethnic roots. In the first place, indeed, the expansion of Islam south of the Sahara has often followed the course of ethnic affiliation. Reciprocally, the ethnic divisions have frequently been expressed by religious affiliations, with the groups neighboring the often hegemonistic Islamized societies refusing to adopt the new religion from reaction against the conquering and assimilating posture of these societies, or because the religion of these foreigners, linked to their own ethnic character, was involved. Because of this situation, the religious map of certain regions of Africa--especially in the Sudan zone--often coincided, up to a recent date, with that of the ethnic frontiers. Moreover, among the ethnic groups that have gone over to Islam, there are some who identify more closely with it. These particular groups consider their own practices as an ideal model, despite their specific aspects related to the influence of their ancestral customs. These claims are based on historical events, aspecially the ancientness of the Islamization of the population in question in relation to that of its neighbors, participation in a past Moslem empire, or the more or less decisive role played by the society in question in propagation of the Islamic model, within the framework of a "holy war" movement in particular. Likewise, it has happened that different ethnic groups have opposed one another on the basis of memberships in different brotherhoods.

The members of the societies in question identify their ethnic membership with a more rigorous practice of Islam and consider themselves, or are considered by others, as more authentic Moslems. This privileged status has sometimes fallen to the Arabs. But other autochthonous groups lay claim to it and challenge the superiority of the Prophet's race. Among these groups there figure in particular the Sarakole, the Tukulor, the Malinke, the Dyula, the Wolof (since recently), the Hausa, the Somalis, the Afro-Shirazi, the Nyamwezi, the Yao. In this case, the ethnic particularisms are reinforced by awareness of a superiority in the matter of religion, which takes over from declining traditions. This phenomenon has a certain importance among the diaspora abroad, especially as regards the relations of African and Arab emigres, but also the organization of the emigre colonies and their divisions. These partitions in function of ethnic framework can impede the establishment of a unified and cohesive Moslem community. They impair the application of Islamic universalism and work against the constitution of an Islamic nation.

In the second place, the ethnic roots of the religious phenomenon often resulted, at the time of European colonization and on the occasion of decolonization, in situations of ethnic and regional disequilibrium that thwarted the efforts by the leaders of these states to set up national entities around them. In certain countries, indeed, the borders between ethnic groups coincided with those of societies with old antagonisms or zones of unequal development, on the one hand, and on the other, with between groups holding a monopoly of power and dominated groups. These situations, sometimes originally created and maintained by the various colonizers, were reinforced by the fact of development of the Christian missionaries' action in the un-Islamized zones. In particular, whereas the Moslems turned in on their traditions and closed themselves off against Western schooling, the mission schools trained a new elite open to the modern world. By this fact, the Christianized--or at least un-Islamized--people have been able to monopolize power, with the Moslems finding themselves elbowed out of the state because of their lack of Western training.

The measures taken by the new leadership elites against the structure of the Moslem societies considered conservative or "feudal" or against the Moslem cadres have then often been perceived by the Islamized populations as attacks against their values and themselves. This has often resulted in mobilization of the Moslems and often violent conflicts that have in fact owed less to the differences in religious orientations than to ancient ethnic or regional antagonisms than to economic or political situations of a completely different kind.

Nevertheless, one should not exaggerate the scope of the ethnic roots of sub-Saharan Islam. First of all, we are far from having precise knowledge of the realities to which the concept of "ethnic group" corresponds, as well as those of people, culture, society or nationality. These realities are more elusive and complex than has been believed by observers anxious to find on African soil frameworks identical to those of their societies of origin. May ethnographers appear to have exaggerated the self-containment and coherence of ethnic groups. They have not seen that many of these groups shared a common sociocultural foundation more important, sometimes, than their disparities and forming vast regional wholes, such as the Sudanese bloc, the eastern bloc, the forest bloc, etc. In addition, a large number of the ethnic groups have never had political unity. Most of them are heterogeneous. Finally, many have been divided in the past into rival, often pluriethnic, political formations.

By breaking the political frameworks that could impede their installing themselves and by establishing the local political dynamic, the various colonizers put in jeopardy a fundamental dimension of previous African social life. In this brand-new situation, the ethnic framework took on a dimension and importance that it often had never had up to then--all the more so in that the colonial administrations tried to build their governing framework partly on the basis of it.

To view things from another angle, adherence to Islam has always presented a universalist outlook whose effect was to break down the ethnic barriers. The great Moslem political groups of the past, and more particularly the processes of "holy war" that the Africa of the Sudan experienced, have favored the mixing of populations of different ethnic origin and partly substituted the religious criterion for that of ethnic traditions. In addition, a continuous process of Islamization has constantly been exerted in originally non-Moslem groups, since the beginning of European penetration. This process tends to break down the old ethnic frontiers referred to above, from the point of view of religious affiliation. This process is constantly being amplified, notably within the framework of the great contemporary migration processes. In other regions, the concurrent penetration of Islam and Christianity has favored the partitioning of the same ethnic groups into distinct religious parties. Finally, in our day, the ethnic phenomenon--the national-leaning manifestations of which disturb the local leaders, who are quick to consider such manifestations as so many centrifugal "tribal" forces, especially when they are exhibited by grups other than those on which they base their support--is tending to lose its importance. Things stand this way especially because of the fact of the evolution of the younger generations, the policies of "national construction," the suspicion of which it is the object, the intervention of new ideologies or the effect of the new socioeconomic and political frameworks, as well as the increasing mobility of the populations.

The situations are far from being fixed, however, and in certain circumstances--especially when expression of political differences is impossible on other levels--the ethnic framework can assert unexpected political reactions, within the framework of which various particularisms play the role of mobilizing symbols. It happens also that devotion to ethnic particularism, deprived of its traditional bases, takes refuge in certain practices, which are thus promoted to the role of symbols of collective identity. Here, religious affiliation can play a surrogate role, to the extent to which religious references are less suspect than ethnic references as such, where there exists a coherent and influential religious organizational framework and where Islam appears as a model both traditional and modern at the same time. Here again, analysis of these processes cannot be considered over and done with.

Confraternal and Sectarian Frameworks

Another essential sociological framework of sub-Saharan Islam is constituted by the different "ways" or brotherhoods of Sufi inspiration. These great mystic orders have contributed powerfully to the expansion of this vision of the world in this region. They have molded the local beliefs and practices and have provided the Islamized populations with an organizational framework that is often very dense. It is possible that they found propitious ground south of the Sahara, that their mystical dimension, or at least certain aspects of their doctrines, harmonizes with the local sensitivity and initiatory tradition. Their role in the spreading of Islam could be partly explained in this way. However, an exhaustive treatment of this question can be done only within the framework of consideration of all the manifestations of popular Sufism in the Moslem world in its totality, making it possible to distinguish what is truly specific to African reality from what is not.

Furthermore, various local deviations from the Sufi mystical ideal have been stressed. In fact, the behavior of many adepts of these "ways" is very far-removed from the quest of the saints of Islam who aimed at a fusion with God. One cannot, however, systematize these deviations without examination and deny the existence of a pure mystical dimension for which the brotherhoods are the chosen medium, even if this dimension is taken on only by a minority. This minority has been able to exist only because of the existence of a favorable milieu. Besides, the cohesion of the brotherhoods has often been exaggerated. Very often, whereas a few masters live and know their doctrines, most of those who follow them are ignorant of nearly all of them and rely on the former to connect them to the Creator. This surrender is perceived as the principal implication of their adherence. Because of this fact, the brotherhoods can control a sizable part of the local Moslem populations without this control's necessarily corresponding to an an extension of mysticism as such; thus, one can belong to a birth brotherhood, by the fact that the "marabout" to whom one entrusts oneself belongs to it or because one "way" or another is reputed to be more efficient in this world and in the other.

The local branches of different Moslem brotherhoods have on occasion engaged in furious competition. This has sometimes taken the form of fratricidal struggles between adepts of Islam. They pit the ethnic groups against one another, they help break up the political groupings and families and divide the Moslem collectivities into factions whose allegiance goes beyond the regional or continental framework. They have thus favored the existence of separations into distinct blocs, based on networks of clientage between masters and disciples, natives and foreigners. It seems, however, that data collected in certain regions where the brotherhoods have particular characteristics not always encountered elsewhere have been wrongly extended to the whole of the Moslem populations south of the Sahara. Thus it is that the brotherhood phenomenon has sometimes been somewhat imprudently equated with its Senegalese manifestations, linked to purely local specificities. Likewise, it would be erroneous to extend to the whole of East Africa--where the brotherhoods seem more numerous, more divided, more closed-in on themselves--observations collected in the Sudanese zone, where orders such as the Qadiriyya and the Tijaniyya have more cohesiveness, and vice-versa.

The same observations can hold true for the sects of Shiite or Ahmadi inspiration imported from India or Pakistan, mainly, by "Asiatic" immigrants within the territories of the Commonwealth. However, these sects are for the most part organized and administered by foreign missionaries and have specific structures, different from those of the Sufi "ways," which are profoundly integrated into the African milieu and are largely independent of their outside home-bases.

However, study of the brotherhood and sectarian frameworks of Africa south of the Sahara has still not been developed very much, outside of certain regions--such as Senegal, already mentioned--or certain of these frameworks. Or rather, the analyses done do not establish connections between the brotherhood or sectarian phenomenon and its local economic, social or political underpinnings. The changes of orientation that an order can manifest and brotherhood conversions are areas about which little is known. Likewise, there is ignorance of the scope of the international relations among members of the same order.

Islam and the State

Another dimension--a decisive one--of the relations among Islamic culture, the Arab world and African societies has developed since the period of birth of the new African states. Since that time, these relationships have existed partly within the new political frameworks in question. Because of this fact, the "Moslem question" has aspects today that it did not have until then. And the work done before independence is often of little help to kus today for analysis of the present situations. In the first place, it is impossible to consider the question raised without referring it to the "national construction" policies of the local states or if one ignores the modern political aspects of the Moslem problem. The see-saw has tipped in the opposite direction in the field that we are considering.

Centrifugal, secessionist, controversial effects, expressed in the development of local political conflicts, are frequently attributed to Islam. When such conflicts involve adepts of different cults, no matter what the basic causes may be, there is always a commentator who evokes a resumption of "holy war," or at least a "war of religion." Such commentaries, however, need to be examined with the strictest rigor, and the analyses that support them need to be emptied of the confusions that burden them. This is a considerable task for those who take it on themselves to account for the Moslem phenomenon in this region. Furthermore, all the sub-Saharan states are developing their relations with different Arab countries today. Reciprocally, various Arab states are intervening in local affairs more and more frequently and profoundly. Such interventions have multiplied, as we know, since the "oil war"--a period when most of the African governments, threatened by the economic crisis and finding themselves partly deprived of their Western support, the West being also at grips with the crisis, appealed to the Arab producers in the name of Third World solidarity. The latter responded to these requests in a more or less massive fashion, and thus found themselves with a foothold in a region that had been of relatively little interest to them until then, except within the framework of the struggle being carried on against the influence of Israel in many states of the Sahara, including some states with Moslem majorities. This latest offensive, whose stakes in the international milieus were considerable, has generally been crowned with success.

The Arab activities are in different areas: they involve economic aid, bilateral or through umbrella organizations; creation of joint Afro-Arab organisms; development of the Arab diplomatic presence; extensive cultural action; political and sometimes military interventions. In this context, the Arab financial backers are using their new positions to favor the expansion of Islam and the reform of local practices in the direction of closer association between them and the Arab model. They are helping the local Moslem collectivities. They are offering mosques that enhance their positions, educational establishments, and are sending teachers and educators. They are also training new African Moslem cadres in their universities and are encouraging the action of Moslem notables, as well as of the new reformist elites, in certain cases.

Islamic Reformism

There have already existed, since the time of European colonization, movements for reform of African Islam, militating in favor of diffusion of the Arab language, purification of the teaching of Islamic theology or law, and the establishment of modern educational institutions, and against the influence of the traditional Moslem cadres, considered corrupt, ignorant, and compromised with the colonizers. However, the movements were at the time generally limited to certain milieus very much in the minority. Their financial means were small, as was their freedom of action. Their outside support was weak, and drew upon them suspicions of an administration anxious to wipe out the influence of Arab nationalism south of the Sahara. Thus their influence was small. Since the "oil war," the support granted by different Arab countries to the local reformist milieus has been increasing. Today, thousands of Arab cooperation personnel are providing them with effective support. Thousands of new cadres are being trained in the Arab universities. A whole new infrastructure, offered by the oil countries, is made available to them. The reformers are also benefiting from the support of the Arab states that are sponsoring them, and the leaders of their countries have to take account of this support, which is connected with other forms of cooperation. In addition, the new Moslem elites are benefiting from the prestige of the Arab countries and are getting a new hearing from a part of the young people who are disillusioned by Westernization or the evolution of the local regimes, or are excluded from power. In the eyes of these younger generations, Islam no longer appears--as it often did in the era preceding independence--as a conservative tradition that was wasting away or outmoded, or an instrument in the hands of foreign powers. It has become a model of modernity, offering an acceptable middle way between a customary system no longer answering contemporary needs and an impossible or rejected Westernization.

However, this reformist current is running up against strong resistance from the popular Moslem milieus, and especially from the traditional religious cadres, whose influence and prestige have remained very great within them, generally speaking. These notables, challenged by their adversaries, are reacting to their attacks by a rejection that limits the interferences between the two movements for the expansion of Islam, the traditional and the modern. Furthermore, these worthies are supported by various "moderate" Arab states or leaders who are counting on their position and consider it more strategic to use their intermediary position to advance the cause of Islam in accordance with their views. In another quarter, a part of the Westernized Moslem elites south of the Sahara are adhering to the pan-African or "black," even "nationalist" currents, which are causing an "insular" reaction of retreat in the face of the pan-Islamic or pan-Arab current. The proponents of this second modern current consider themselves both orthodox Moslems and authentic Africans. They challenge the Arab leadership, in whom they see a manifestation of foreign and "white" political and cultural "imperialism." This position leads them in particular to dispute the Arab or local stories which in their view accords an exaggerated position to the extra-African or "Hamitic" influences lying at the origin of local Islam or of certain of its manifestations, constituting an alienating attack against African identity. This reaction is nourished by that of a part of the modern African elites, Moslem or not, who are very sensitive to what is considered the expansionist tendency of certain Arab countries or parties, as well as to the condescending attitudes of many Moslems of the outside vis-a-vis their coreligionists of Black Africa. It encounters an analogous sensitivity on the part of students or emigre workers in contact with Arab milieus within which they denounce a certain attitude of contempt toward them, connected with the fact that they are "blacks," which in certain Arab countries is equated with being a slave or a member of an inferior caste.

These attitudes are to be analyzed with their economic, political, social and cultural context taken into account. There is a vast field of study here, the approach to which is particularly delicate, because of the fact of the political and psychological character of the problem; but its importance cannot be denied from the point of view of the practice and position of the sub-Saharan Moslems.

It will be recalled, though, that the Arab countries are not the only Moslem countries that do proselytizing activity in favor of Islam in this region. Other states, especially India and Pakistan, have played an important role in the expansion of Islam and its reform, either as states or through the intermediary of their nationals. This has been the case notably in the African countries formerly colonized by the British Empire. We have already referred to the role of the various Shiite and Ahmadi sects among the young African elites of East Africa, in Nigeria, Ghana, Sierra Leone. The influence of these foreigners, who are often reticent as regards any Arab hegemonic pretensions in matters of Islam, is strengthening the "insular" dispositions already mentioned in the direction of emphasis on the linguistic particularisms or the specificity of local practices. The events presently taking place in Iran and Pakistan are arousing lively interest among the new Moslem elites, especially in Sudan, Nigeria, Tanzania. Within this framework there is being developed a solidarity of the Moslem periphery that is strengthening a certain falling-back on the local identities.

The fact should be mentioned, though, that Arab-African cooperation or cooperation between eastern and sub-Saharan Moslem countries is not a one-way matter. In addition to the support given to the Arab countries by most of the African states within the international bodies, certain of them, or the OAU, are taking action within the Arab world more and more frequently. Thus, for example, Sudan has been participating up to this time in the Arab intervention force in Lebanon and belongs to the Arab League, as do Somalia and Djibouti. Likewise, President Amin Dada had an attitude favorable to the Palestinian cause, and several African countries are participating in the settlement of the Western Sahara question. But one cannot isolate the field of the Moslem world's internal relations or relations between Arab and African countries from international relations as a whole--in particular, from the relations between Western culture and African cultures, from the impact of the great modern ideologies and from the interventions of various world powers in the African continent, as well as in the Moslem world. Nor can the study of sub-Saharan Islam be isolated either, as might have been possible in a different situation.

Arabic Language and African Languages

We have just made mention of a number of fields to which a certain amount of attention has been devoted by reasearchers. But there are other sectors into which they have ventured very little, even though they constitute an important part of the reality of the relations among African societies, the Arab world and Islamic culture. Let us cite first of all the field of linguistic relations, and more particularly, the African languages' borrowings from Arabic, the evolution of languages of a syncretic character, and the confrontation of the Arabic languages and the indigenous languages.

This particular field, which shows very profound cultural interrelations, is undergoing great changes today, because of the policy of diffusion of the Arabic language being conducted by the Arab states and the reformist milieus already referred to and the reactions that this policy is triggering among the populations concerned. In effect, the diffusion of Islam in a large part of the African continent is not being accompanied by diffusion of the language of the Koran. Even the great movements of Islamic reform or of "holy war" in the past did not impose this language, whereas they did sometimes contribute to the expansion of other African languages, such as Fulani, Mandingo, Hausa or Swahili. The major part of the Moslem texts of Africa south of the Sahara are written with Arabic characters but in local languages. This situation constitutes an important cultural event, which furthermore is not unique to Africa and the approach to which lies through the approach to Islamic culture as a whole. But while the linguistic borrowings take place only at certain levels, the same has not been the case with Arabic script, as well as with Arab-Islamic literature. These latter have been integrated into the local traditions. The borrowings constitute an important factor of cultural mutation. On the one hand, in effect, most of the IslamizedAfrican societies have elaborated a non-Arab Moslem literature. This situation has taken the form notably of the development of a class of bilingual literate people, in a position as intermediaries between their societies and the rest of the Islamic world. As we have seen, certain of these literate people have for centuries possessed a double culture, Arab and African.

On the other hand, the transfer into the African languages and cultures of social, moral and cultural models carried by Arabic literature and taught to generations of children for centuries has introduced numerous changes into the local mores. This input, which remains to be evaluated, should not be underestimated. The attachment of the sub-Saharan Moslems to their ancestral languages poses a crucial problem in the matter of cultural and religious interaction. Most Moslem theologians consider, in effect, that the language in which the Koran was revealed has a sacred character and should be intimately linked to the diffusion of Islam. On this level, Arabization should go hand in hand with Islamization. And the African reformists are militating for the teaching of the Arabic language. A sizable part of Arab assistance is connected with this area. Adoption of the Arabic language is perceived as a first step toward a more authentic Islam and therefore toward integration of that religion's local adepts into the Islamic community. This posture assigns a decisive position to the Arabizing teachers, as against the notables considered "ignorant."

However, the broad masses of the sub-Saharan Moslems pit against this policy of linguistic conversion an indefectible attachment to their own ethnic languages, to which they persist in connecting their religion. This reaction has been especially marked in Somalia, where the leaders have resisted Saudi Arabia's explicit pressures to get them to adopt Arabic as the official language in place of Somali, even though their country belongs to the Arab League. This reaction is also encountered in southern Mauritania, in Chad, in Tanzania, and especially in Zanzibar, where Swahili was deliberately substituted for Arabic as the official language at the time of independence. This type of collective reaction, which reinforces the ethnic or "African" particularisms, as well as the position of the traditional religious notables, impedes the process of uniformization of religious practices, from the point of view of more total conversion to the Arab model. In some instances it helps to reinforce the local "national constructions," which are threatened by the emergence of an "Islamic nation" or whose promoters base their support on the traditional religious cadres and the young nationaist elites.

The Juridical Impact of Islam

Another impact--perhaps a more decisive one--of Islamic culture south of the Sahara concerns the juridical domain. On the one hand, the influence of the Moslem jurists has expanded into all the Islamized populations, in different degrees, and not without overturning many customs, especially those that were connected with the matrilinear system. On the other hand, the Moslems tend to demand application of the "shari'a," or Islamic law, and to reject the laws of judicial institutions of Western inspiration, on which the constitutions of most of the African states are based. On the former level, the adoption of the norms decreed by the great Sunni jurists has been accompanied by some accomodation with the ancestral traditions. Here too, the Moslem reformists run up against some tenacious resistance. On the second level, a sort of spontaneous division has often occurred within the African states that have a large proportion of Moslems: according to these tacit agreements, the state reserves certain juridical areas to itself, but surrenders to the Moslem judges a sector of law that thus escapes its jurisdiction and remains administered by the Moslem community, which in a way is thus constituted, at this level, as a state within a state, indeed a "counter-government." Entire sections of the law relating to persons and to goods are thus taken out of the ordinary law and constitute reserved areas that escape its control.

In most cases, the leaders close their eyes to the existence of these ghettoes of a particular type. In other cases, constitutional provisions reulate the relations of these two jurisdictions, authorizing their coexistence. In certain countries, though, strive to impose their law as the official law and affect to subject the non-Moslems to it. At the very least, the latter fear having to be subject to laws based on criteria to which they do not subscribe, and they consider this tendency a manifestation of unacceptable hegemonism. Elsewhere, the Moslem minorities reject the official law and demand for themselves the application of Islamic law only. This demand is rejected by the upholders of a national unity based on the existence of a single law. These juridical conflicts often have ethnic or political roots whose interference obscures discussion. Such conflicts have played an important role in certain countries, notably in Ethiopia, Uganda, Sudan, and recently Nigeria. They are complicated by the dissension among the supporters of different juridical schools trying to impose their own norms on their coreligionists, even though there is regional partitioning among the four principal Sunni juridical schools south of the Sahara.

With this problem of the influence of Moslem law is connected the question of the Arab or Islamic model of the state and of many institutions considered to be of Mediterranean or Western origin. According to certain authors, the diffusion of these structures is to be credited to Islam. This thesis is strongly contested by other researchers, who stress the existence of structures of the same type before Islam and dispute the idea of an outside influence fertilizing the African ground, saying that it only expresses the imperialist ideology of those authors. This question is not only of interest from the point of view of understanding of past history. The political systems worked out by certain modern Arab states inspires a part of the sub-Saharan Moslem elites for whom these models are better-suited to the local realities than are those of Western or other inspiration. Therefore, these debates are not purely academic ones. Analysis of them should make possible a better understanding of various contemporary processes, including the conversion of African leaders, certain local conflicts, and the impact on the Moslem masses as a whole, beyond the frontiers, of the demands of the Moslems of certain countries.

Another area in which the influence of the Arab and Islamic cultures on the African cultures seems to have been important and which nevertheless has been studied little is that of technologies and arts. On the level of technologies, Islamization has been accompanied by the diffusion of such practices as a new military art, a different architecture, a particular type of clothing. However, it is difficult to discern the share of Islam in these contributions, as distinguished from that of the Mediterranean or Eastern cultures. In addition, certain of these cultures could in fact be of indigenous origin. Such, at least, is a thesis that is frequently maintained today and that cannot be rejected without examination. Another technique connected with the expansion of Islam is that of the market. It is generally the Moslems who have developed this institution south of the Sahara. In several regions, trade has been to date a monopoly of the adepts of Islam and is recognized as such by the "pagan" populations. In our day, the merchant is still frequently a Moslem, and development of the market goes hand in hand with that of the Islamic religion, which it favors.

As regards art, the iconoclastic effect of Islam and its negative impact on "Negro art" has been stressed. Wherever the Islamic religion is established, the masks, the representations of supernatural powers and "Negro" symbolization have disappeared. On the other hand, Islam's contributions in art, architecture, dress, ornamentation, weaponry, literature and calligraphy have not always been duly appreciated. These are areas in which the confrontation of the two cultures, Arab and African, has produced profound changes of outlook. But study of these changes has scarcely been developed to date.

Confrontations of Cultures

More than any of the partial areas that we have mentioned, though, the fact that strikes anyone who devotes himself to analysis of Arab-African relations and to the expansion of the Islamic model is the overall phenomenon constituted by the confrontation of two visions of the world. This phenomenon can be viewed from the angle of a confrontation between opposed or at least divergent outlooks on the destiny of man as well as from the point of view of the upheavals resulting from propagation of the Islamic system in the daily life of the populations who have subscribed to it. For it is impossible to isolate the religious aspect as such of a world view such as that of Islam or of the African tradition from their economic, social or political implications. Here there necessarily arises a question that is an essential one from the point of view of the approach to the problems considered--that is, the question of "Negritude."

In the era of African independence, various authors, both European and African, stressed the "Negro" or "black" character of sub-Saharan Islam. This outlook corresponded to an orientation that was dominant at that crucial moment in the history of Africa, within both the African and the "white" (European, Arab or "Asiatic") societies or elites. It seems, however, that it was not subjected to objective analysis defining the scope and limits of the phenomenon evoked. In particular, it is based on an apparently disputable reduction of the different manifestations of sub-Saharan Islam to a single model, founded on the emphasizing of some local manifestations extrapolated to the whole. This reductive scheme is often opposed by an ideal model of "white" Moslem practice, to which the practices of the other populations of the Moslem world are likewise reduced somewhat schematically. This scheme needs to be studied more closely, taking into account the differences of behavior that can be noted within the overall groups thus contrasted. Analysis of the "Negro" foundations of sub-Saharan Islam should be undertaken within the framework of an overall study of popular Islam in the world, in Indonesia and in Iran, in the Soviet Union, in the Maghreb and in Arabia as well as in "black" lands. It is only upon completion of such a study that it will be possible to evaluate the degree of specificity of the local usages.

In another regard, it has been possible to consider Islam as an "anti-Negritude." From this point of view, the contrast between the behavior of the Islamized populations and of those corresponding to the ideal "Negro" model has been stressed: where Islam is established, rhythm, dance, the masks, bodily or affective spontaneity tend to be replaced by another type of behavior marked by moderation, self-control, discipline of body, gesture, mind. In contrast to this observation, the hypothesis has been suggested that the brotherhood practices of Sufi inspiration have precisely made it possible to accomodate the Arab or white Islamic ideal with the "Negro" tendencies. This view needs to be analyzed, here also, within the framework of a general study of the whole of Sufi practices in the Moslem world and of their foundations, before it is systematically related to any African biological or cultural base.

Forming a background to the orientations of the Moslem populations of the entire world there is, finally, the question of the eventual emergence of an Islamic community transcending the local ethnic, regional, cultural or political affiliations. This prospect--rejected by some, dreamed of by others, proclaimed by the most determined--holds the spotlight today. It is not out of the question that it is helping to mold a part of our universe in the coming decades, even in some regions where it seemed out of the question up to now. The example of Iran, the repercussions of which seem to be important to Africa south of the Sahara as well as in the Arab world, is there to caution the researcher to prudence in evaluation of the motivations that guide contemporary societies or that might guide them tomorrow. What we want to point out here is the necessity of not discarding from our analyses data that may have seemed outmoded or belonging to the ideological domain of another era. In particular, it is essential to determine, if possible, the measure of latent mobilizing force that Islam still maintains, beyond the factors that make for division of the Moslems and independently of the factors of mobilization, of a different order, with which it interferes.

The sub-Saharan Moslems presently find themselves between two contradictory attractions, one of which turns them away from their neighbors and promptly integrates them with world Islam as a whole, while the other keeps them in an "insular" posture. In the extreme, the former would tend to make them more Moslems than Africans, and the latter, more Africans than Moslems. In reality, the situations are never so clear-cut--all the more so in that other attractions interfere. In addition, the divisions of the Moslem world--especially its Arab fraction--and their impact on the African reality should be taken into account. The different competing currents among which these states are divided--currents related to world divisions--contribute to the division of the sub-Saharan Moslems. On a less political plane, though, these rivalries help, by their very interplay, to reinforce the impact of the Islamic model, by rallying conservatives and progressives, universalists and nationalists, partisans of a total Islamization of mores and of limitation of the role of Islam to the religious sphere only, and by making strengthened means of Islamization available to all these currents.

We are therefore witnessing today new developments of centuries-old processes of interaction that have already molded a part of African reality and transformed the horizon of many populations south of the Sahara to a considerable extent. One of the most important effects of these processes is perhaps that it has helped to relieve these populations from the confrontation with the West that has been imposed on them since the beginning of European penetration.

GAMBIA, MAURITANIA SIGN FRIENDSHIP, COOPERATION TREATY

AB210820 Banjul THE GAMBIA NEWS BULLETIN in English 30 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] The Gambia and Mauritania have signed a treaty of friendship and cooperation and issued a joint communique at the end of recent visit to the Gambia of Mauritania's head of state and government, Lt Col Khouna Ould Haydala.

In the nine-point treaty, the two countries have agreed to cooperate especially in the economic, scientific, cultural and technical fields.

The two countries reiterated their determination to contribute to the promotion of world peace and to uphold the principles of peaceful solutions to disputes between African states.

The two parties have by the treaty decided to create a joint ministerial committee to be responsible for the implementation of the present agreement and any other agreement of protocols which may be concluded in accordance with this treaty as well as to elaborate and submit, for the approval of the two governments, proposals aimed at strengthening friendship and cooperation between the two countries.

The agreement, concluded for an unlimited period, may be terminated by either of the parties upon giving six months' notice.

The contracting parties also reiterated their determination to contribute to the promotion of world peace and to uphold the principles of peaceful solutions to disputes between West African states.

According to the joint communique, President Jawara and Lt Col Haydala reaffirmed their determination to reinforce and further develop the friendship, solidarity and relations of good neighbourliness and cooperation between the two countries.

The two heads of state reaffirmed the unequivocal adherence of their countries to the principles, and practice of positive non-alignment and decided to coordinate their efforts towards the total realisation of the objectives of the movement of non-aligned countries.

Expressing his concern over the Western Sahara conflict, President Jawara supports the "courageous decision" taken by the Islamic Republic of Mauritania to withdraw from this fratricidal conflict.

Regarding Southern Africa, the two heads of state hailed the independence of Zimbabwe as the direct outcome of a long and bitter liberation struggle waged by the heroic people of Zimbabwe. They renewed their determination to continue to support the legitimate struggle of liberation movements in Namibia and South Africa to achieve self-determination and independence.

BRIEFS

CAPE VERDE-SAO TOME COOPERATION--The main purpose of the visit made for one week to the island of Santiago by a technical mission from the Ministry of Agriculture of the Democratic Republic of S. Tome was to get a close look at the methods used in our country in banana cultivation and in banana processing and packaging for export. The arrival of the technicians from S. Tome in Cape Verde, to attend seminars, training courses, and advanced courses for example in the fields of irrigation engineering and phytopathology, was viewed with pleasure by both sides during the conversations. This is the second S. Tome mission in the field of agriculture to visit Cape Verde. [Excerpts] [Praia VOZ DI POVO in Portuguese 9 Aug 80 p 12] 5058

FAPLA, SOUTH AFRICAN, UNITA WAR ACTIVITIES DETAILED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 17, 24, 27 Aug 80

[Article by J. Branquinho: "Where the Fire Has Been Lit--Undeclared War in Angola"]

[17 Aug 80, p 4]

> [Text] It was 23 July and the morning was almost over when we at last left Lubango and advanced on the road that would take us to N'Giva, capital of the Angolan Province of Kunene. Ahead of us we had almost 400 kilometers of excellent black-top road--colonialism left Angola a network of good roads linking all provincial capitals in a country quite a bit bigger than Mozambique. Ahead of us also we had one of the preferred targets of the "carcamanos" [lackeys] (term generally used in Angola in referring to the South African soldiers) and, in certain sections, men from the groups of UNITA [National Union for the Total Independence of Angola]. This is practically the only land communications link with Kunene, Angola's southernmost province where--according to a battle song of the FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola]--"the fire has been lit."

The day before they had told us in Lubango that the situation was more or less normal. But normalcy in vast areas in the southern part of Angola means daily overflights by South African "Mirage" and "Impala" aircraft and frequent air attacks against vehicles and buildings. That evening, Security Minister Kundi Paihama had just arrived from a visit to Kunene and told us that South African aircraft had on that same day flown over an area near where he was and that 2 days earlier a "Scania-Vabis" truck, from the construction and housing ministry and a military vehicle had been destroyed on the Lubango--N'Giva road.

This road is of enormous strategic and economic importance and can arbitrarily be divided into two major segments. In the first one, for a distance of 195 kilometers between Lubango and Cahama, racist aircraft have not yet carried out any attacks although a few months ago "Mirage" aircraft from Namibia bombed the outskirts of the city of Lubango, Angola, fourth-largest, destroying the "Huila Lumber Plant" and killing scores of workers who were buried under the rubble.

Further to the south, in the remaining 200 kilometers from Cahama to N'Giva --and in the 40 kilometers from N'Giva to the border--we can see a whole string of vehicles burned by "rockets" or destroyed by machine guns, along with houses, medical aid stations, and schools reduced to rubble by the bombs.

Threat from UNITA between Xangongo and N'Giva

There is a possibility of an ambush by UNITA groups operating in the area particularly in the last segment, before reaching N'Giva, or departing from Xangongo, in addition to the threat from South African aircraft; those groups are exploiting the proximity of the border and the vast expanse and very low population density of the area.

In spite of that and according to what we were told by FAPLA officers in the area, there have been no operations by the "Kwachas" (name applied to the UNITA men, taken from the slogan of that puppet group "Kwacha Africa, Kwacha Unita"--Africa Awaken! UNITA Awaken!) for quite some time in that segment of the road, although problems arise sometimes in the "quimbos" (small villages) in the interior. When we entered Mongua during our return trip, a FAPLA officer, whom we wanted to interview, had left in pursuit of a group of "kwachas" who had rustled cattle from the local population a few kilometers away.

The Xangongo--N'Giva segment, above all in the last scores of kilometers starting from Mongua, is the only road leading to the capital of Cunene where there is an albeit remote threat of an UNITA ambush, as we were told, not only by military leaders but also by truck drivers and other individuals who frequently take that road. This was also the area in which the South African force, which invaded the southern part of Angola in June, moved.

Outside that zone, there are reports as to UNITA activities on the 40 kilometers of black-top highway between N'Giva and Santa Clara, at the border, particularly in the area of Namacunde. Starting at the end of June, when the invasion ended, the "kwachas" laid two ambushes against vehicles, one of them in the zone of Namacunde, killing some workers, and the other one, further to the north, on the road to Xangongo, against a truck of the ODP (People's Defense Organization); there were no casualties.

According to the commander of the FAPLA brigade in N'Giva, the activities consisted in laying mines in the forest trails leading from the capital of Cunene to the east and west, more or less parallel to the border, to the communities of Neone, Evale, and Mupa.

Main Threat from Air

But the main threat really comes from the air; during the 6 days we were in the southern part of Angola, we learned of six cases of air space violations and two cases of strafing of vehicles in Kunene.

On the 26th, when we were in Omupanda, less than 20 kilometers north of the border, two "Mirage" aircraft, recognizable by their delta wings, flew at a high altitude toward the interior of the territory and returned less than half an hour later the same way.

As we were told by Lieutenant Colonel Foguetao, commander of the 5th Military Region of Angola, there were 476 Angolan air space violations during the first 6 months of the year in the provinces covered by the 5th Region, that is, Cunene, Huila, Kuando-Kubango, and Mocamedes, in other words, more than two per day. There were also 27 bombing raids and seven strafing of vehicles by aircraft, all on the Lubango--N'Giva road.

There were four operations during which paratroopers were dropped, plus two long-range artillery bombardments and two major attacks involving aircraft and ground forces, including the invasion in June.

In the attacks on vehicles, the most dangerous aircraft are not the well-known "Mirage" aircraft but above all the South African-made "Impala" aircraft. Vitor Rocha, an Angolan militant who accompanied us on our trip to Cunene, told us: "The aircraft usually fly at tree-top level to avoid detection by radar and people in the cars on the roads can spot them only when they are very close. When they strafe or fire 'rockets' ahead, they usually fail on their first run. This is why they come back again and take up position behind the cars [armored cars, tanks?]. The enormous speed of the "Mirage" aircraft means that it takes them longer to come back for another run and if the occupants of the car are alerted, they can have time to get out and run, for a long distance, because they normally burn the car and strafe the forest 500 or 600 meters all around. But if an 'Impala' comes over--a less advanced but more maneuverable aircraft--it may be practically impossible to escape."

Signs of War Everywhere

As we advanced on the road to N'Give, the signs of war became increasingly evident everywhere. Soon after leaving Lubango, we can see the holes in the asphalt made by the mines which the South Africans left during their retreat in 1975; then there are the traffic lights and signs which are pock-marked with bullet holes; and then there is the old man who rides a bicycle with a shotgun on his back and the youngster, almost a Pioneer, who takes the cattle to pasture with a weapon slung across his shoulders.

Starting from Cahama, the destruction is even more visible. A few kilometers to the west, in Ediva, we can see houses which have been completely destroyed and huge craters, made by 1,000-kilogram bombs dropped by "Canberra" bombers.

Further to the south, we come to the inn of Humbe which was attacked by rockets from a South African "Mirage"; 12 civilians, guests, and two daughters of the establishment's manager, died there. At Mongua the community commissioner's office, the hospital, the school, and the ODP installations are almost completely destroyed. Trucks and cars regularly are found burned and pushed off the shoulders of the road.

Record of an Invasion

This escalation of aggression did not just start in any old way with the June invasion. For more than a year, the number of air space violations, strafings, and bombing raids has been multiplied. Quite a few months before the invasion, South African aircraft, as we said earlier, bombed the outskirts of Lubango and an air-transported force ambushed several civilian vehicles and blew up bridges in Leba, located several scores of kilometers from the capital of Huila, in the direction toward the coast.

The large-scale operation undertaken by the South Africans on 7 June marked the high point of this escalation of aggression and the threat became quite visible not only through the skirmish and sporadic bombing raids but also through total war.

On that day, large South African units, with air support, penetrated into Kunene between [kilometer] markers 22 and 25 and advanced to the north through the forest trails in the region, heading toward N'Giva. But there was no declared offensive against the city where large FAPLA units were stationed. The South African troops first tried to get around N'Giva, advancing to the north along the surrounding trails and, in succession, taking Mulemba, Neone, Mupa, Mongua, Chivembe, and Evale; in the first of these communities they established their CP. During this advance, the invading forces kept leveling the "quimbos" which they found and killed the families who lived in them (so far it has not been possible exactly to determine the total number of civilian dead during that invasion due to the vast area covered; it is calculated that the figure comes to several hundreds). As they advanced, they left UNITA elements in the territory who had accompanied them.

N'Giva almost Surrounded

After the end of this phase, the South African troops completely surrounded N'Giva and were north of the city, on the road leading to Lubango. At that point, on 29 June, a South African column, coming from Evale, and another one coming from the south, from the direction of the capital of Cunene, advanced toward Mongua, 80 kilometers in the country's interior, which the FAPLA however had entered. The ensuing battle resulted in a major victory for the Angolan fighting men (we will cover it later in greater detail in one of the following articles) and marked the end of the invasion: the South Africans regrouped their forces a few kilometers away, protected by very heavy air support; they evacuated their dead and wounded with helicopters and left the territory of Angola.

After the invasion, life returned to vigilant normalcy in Cunene. The people always expect a new attack but the incidents which have taken place since then in the area do not add up to the same intensity as the operation in June and reconstruction continues. The mobilization and commitment of the FAPLA and the population are visible to the visitor. "We can say that here, in Kunene, the people are all with the MPLA," we were told by Provincial Commissioner Ary da Costa. But one FAPLA officer admitted that the "invasion by the lackeys undermined the political situation to a certain point and that intensive work is necessary to normalize it."

Objectives of Aggression

The June invasion certainly is nothing unusual in the light of the development of the domestic situation in Angola and the international context with a view to independence for Namibia. On the one hand, the attack was obviously aimed at destabilizing the political situation and sabotaging economic development; the destruction of bridges and the infrastructure, the persistent attempt to cut traffic on the Lubango--N'Giva road, the only land link to Kunene, are evident proof of this.

Diplomatic observers in Luanda on the other hand tie the invasion in with the political-military offensive unleashed in recent months by the MPLA-Labor Party against UNITA in the country's central provinces, that is, Benguela, Huambo, Bie, and Moxico, going from the coast toward the interior. This offensive, according to official sources, caused the destruction of more than 40 "kwachas" bases and foreign newspapermen, who visited the central part of Angola, confirmed that a very large number of peasants, who had been in the forests in the region, surrendered to the authorities.

With the operational capacity UNITA limited in the center--the area where this group up to a certain point managed to get some kind of hold among the population due to an openly tribalist policy--the offensive might also have been aimed, according to those same observers, at creating conditions for greater effectiveness of UNITA in the south, where it has the benevolent protection of South African aircraft, tanks, and guns.

Finally, the South African operation came during a specific phase of negotiations promoted by the UN with a view to independence for Namibia; these negotiations called for the establishment of a demilitarized zone along the border between Namibia and Angola. Pretoria has already stated that it would like to see UNITA seated at the negotiating table. Angolan Security Minister Kundi Paihama expressed the assumption that the South Africans, through their invasion, wanted to "install UNITA in the province, attack the provincial capital N'Giva, and thus permit the proclamation, by UNITA, of the Black Socialist Republic of Angola."

Perhaps Pretoria's intentions did not go that far. But the entire effort to destablize and isolate Cunene and to turn it into a "stronghold" of Savimbi's puppets is clearly visible.

"Here We Are Brave, Comrade"

But like the Americans in Vietnam, the Rhodesians in Mozambique, the "lackeys" in Angola are running into the determination of a nation. When we left Mongua on 26 July, almost at nightfall, to return to Lubango, a young FAPLA soldier stepped out of his trench, approached our jeep, and asked which one of us was a Mozambican. We identified ourselves. He saluted us with his weapon and said: "Tell them in Mozambique that we are brave here, comrade."

[24 Aug 80, p 4]

> [Text] Almost 2 months have passed since the battle of Mongua which was fought on 29 June between the FAPLA and the South African forces which had invaded the southern part of Angola. Its importance however remains and continues to be quite timely. Like the defeat of the Rhodesians in Mavonde, in Mozambique, and like the failure of South African intervention in Angola itself in 1975, the battle of Mongua will seriously damage the myth of the military invincibility of the racist regimes (or ex-regimes) in that part of Africa. Using a perhaps smaller force, the South Africans in 1975 advanced into Angola more or less the way they wanted to and were stopped only at the gates of Luanda; in June 1980, the FAPLA stopped them 80 kilometers from the border. In 1975, there was a large percentage of Cuban elite soldiers participating in the fighting, along with the intervention of the feared Soviet "BM-21" multiple rocket launcher; the "BM-21" were not in use at Mongua and neither were the Cuban (by the way, we did not see any Cuban soldiers in Kunene). We heard several FAPLA officers say that the "battle of Mongua demonstrated that, in terms of infantry, we have no reason to envy the South Africans; the only problem is aviation." The natural euphoria of victory must not turn into an attitude of overconfidence or underestimation of an extremely dangerous enemy; it is therefore necessary to recognize the importance of that military operation. This is the background for the following chapter, prepared on the basis of surveys and interviews with FAPLA officers and soldiers as well as civilians in Lubango, Cahama, Xangongo, Mongua and N'Giva, whom we wish to thank at this point for the help they gave us.

Early in the afternoon, the situation was calm but tense in Mongua. It was 29 June--more than 20 days after South African forces, estimated at thousands of men and hundreds of armored cars, entered the southern part of Angola with heavy air and artillery support.

These forces spent several days in Mongua. They came from Kuamato, to the southwest, in the direction toward the border, along the trails leading to the sand desert surrounding the capital of the province of Kunene, N'Giva. They continued on to the community of Evale, to the east.

This is where the invading forces penetrated most deeply into the territory of Kunene; it is 80 kilometers, as the crow flies, to the border, a little more by road. It was also here, on that afternoon, that the decisive battle, which would mark the end of the invasion, would be fought.

What Is Mongua?

Located about 50 kilometers north of N'Giva, Mongua--like most of the communities in Kunene--is a small cluster of half a dozen houses whose importance resides more in its location on the Lubango--N'Giva road than its role as a population or even commercial center.

It would perhaps be more correct to say that Mongua was a cluster of half a dozen houses. During the fighting on 29 June, practically all houses were hit by South African bombs and most of them--the medical aid station, the school, the community commissioner's office, and the ODP center--were totally or partly destroyed.

The South African forces covered hundreds of kilometers in the interior of Angola, starting on the 7th, moving along trails linking the communities of Kuamato, Neone, Mupa, Mongua, and Evale. They reached a point 23 kilometers north of N'Giva, the provincial capital, although they did not launch a frontal attack against the city.

Shortly before 0300, two South African columns approached from Mongua. One of them, the larger one, came from the east, from Evale, and the other one came from the south, along the N'Giva road.

A Thousand Men and More than a Hundred Armored Vehicles

Altogether, these forces added up to one brigade of motorized infantry plus attached units, in other words, more than 1,000 men, 82 [illegible in original] "AML-90," "AML-60," "Ferret," "Sarracen," and "Alladin" armored cars, with artillery and surface-to-surface missiles.

The FAPLA had entered Mongua a short time earlier. The trenches had yet to be dug and the preparation of defensive positions had not been completed. The numerical disproportion between the forces facing each other--we were told later on by the commander of the 1st Military Region of Angola, Lieutenant Colonel "Foguetao"--was 3:1 in favor of the South Africans.

Warned of the enemy's approach, the FAPLA got ready: one company took up a frontal position, arranging its men in an arc in order to receive the full force of the South African attack. Another two companies occupied trenches slightly to the rear, to the right and left of the first company.

The Angolan troops were also motorized infantry, with some armored vehicles and trucks, equipped with highly accurate "B-10" AT missiles.

The battle began at 1445. Confident in their numerical superiority--although theoretically, a disproportion of 1:3 makes it possible to resist in defense positions--the South African forces moved against the first trenches of the Angolan soldiers.

"It was difficult to count them," the deputy commander of the FAPLA operating in Mongua told us later, "the fire was heavy and there were only 500 meters between us and them. But we managed to hold."

The FAPLA company deployed frontally managed to resist effectively. One after the other, the South African armored vehicles were destroyed by the "B-10" and by the "RMG-7" rockets. A FAPLA truck was hit and set on fire. Infantry casualties amounted to scores on either side.

Relief Column Held up by Aircraft

A FAPLA relief column in the meantime was approaching Mongua, coming from the north.

Its advance however was interrupted by South African aircraft which intercepted the column several kilometers to the north and prevented it from advancing toward the scene of the fighting until it was all over. "If this column had managed to arrive in time," a senior FAPLA officer said, "things would have been quite different."

But the column did not arrive in time and the fighting continued. Failing to break through the FAPLA defenses, the South African groups called for air support which came in the form a two squadrons of "Mirage" aircraft.

The aircraft tried to drop bombs for about half an hour but the AA fire was too heavy; many ground-to-air missiles and AA guns made it entirely too risky for the aircraft to come in low enough to bomb effectively. After some time, the two squadrons were forceed to withdraw.

FAPLA Counteroffensive

"At that point we launched our counteroffensive," we were told by Lieutenant Colonel Foguetao, who, from a CP about 30 kilometers from Mongua, kept track of the fighting. The advance of the "lackeys" had been stopped and they were gradually withdrawing. The comrades in the company that had been holding the line came out of their trenches in pursuit of the enemy and the two companies on either side also advanced and attacked the enemy on the flanks."

"They had not expected that," he continued, "and they ran in panic. We were crossing terrain with the bodies of South Africans and with destroyed armored vehicles."

"Mirage" Aircraft Leave--"Buccaneer" Aircraft Come In

The situation barely changed with the arrival of the "Buccaneer" aircraft. These are strategic aircraft which can bomb effectively from an altitude of 4,000-6,000 meters, beyond the range of AA guns and missiles.

That is what they did at Mongua, dropping scores of bombs which almost completely destroyed the community, setting one of the FAPLA armored vehicles on fire, and forcing the Angolan fighting men to return to the protection of the trenches--not without suffering some dead.

The protection offered by the bombing raid enabled the South Africans to pick up their dead in the field, to recover armored vehicles which had been hit (the tracks left by them in the field are clearly visible in the films made by an Angolan television team which had gone to Mongua shortly after the fighting), and to withdraw. They regrouped their forces about 8 kilometers away and from that point various helicopters made four round-trips to Namibia, transporting the dead and wounded (at this point, on the following day, the FAPLA found blood-soaked wound dressings and other first-aid material). The remaining troops headed for the zone of Kuamato and from there they continued on to the border. The battle of Mongua was over at the end of the afternoon and that also marked the end of the invasion of Angola.

After-Action Report

"There were no dead or injured among the civilian population. The people had been warned of the approach of the 'carcamanos' and had withdrawn to safer areas," we were told by Lieutenant Colonel Foguetao.

"But property damage," he added, "was enormous. Almost all houses in the community had been hit by bombs and many were destroyed. We had dead and wounded among the FAPLA and one armored car and one truck were burned. It is difficult for us to say what the casualties and equipment losses were on the South African side because, as a result of protection provided by the "Buccaneer" aircraft, they were able to withdraw those who were in the field and to recover the armored vehicles. But we do know that many armored vehicles were hit and that their infantry casualties must have at least been as heavy as ours."

From an overall viewpoint, the situation certainly turned out favorable. The "lackeys" spent 22 days in the southern part of Angola but they did not get past Mongua. The biggest military force mobilized by the biggest and best-equipped armed forces on the African continent, since World War II--according to their own officials--was defeated in the only frontal battle on Angolan territory (as for the rest, there were essentially minor skirmishes) which is undoubtedly significant.

[27 Aug 80, p 4]

[Text] In the old days, the Portuguese colonialists were accustomed to calling this part the end of the world. They sent nothing here, they built nothing; they were only looking for cattle. Kunene was not even a district almost throughout the entire colonial era; it was a township in what at that time was the district and today is the province of Huila. This is what we were told by Ma Ary da Costa, commissioner (governor) of Kunene, Angola's southernmost province, also the province most heavily hit by the South African war of aggression. But Ary da Costa did not only talk to us about war the day after our arrival in the provincial capital. The early morning hours were taken up by a political-military training session for the workers and a visit to N'Giva where the provincial commissioner, with visible pride, showed us what is being built: the sports arena, the development for homeless individuals, etc. After that, in a room of the commissioner's building, he talked to us about "his" Kunene, a province which has practically no economic infrastructure facilities, a province with enormous communications problems, daily threatened by the South African attacks, a province which, in spite of everything, records some of the highest development indexes in all of Angola.

Kunene is a strip of land with an essentially rectangular shape, comparable in size to the province of Tete. Bordered in the west by Mocamedes Atlantico, in the north by Huila, and in the east by Kuando Kubango, it has a border running for several hundred kilometers with occupied Namibia, in the south.

Like almost all Angolan provinces, Kunene is only sparsely populated. The province consists almost completely of vast expanses of sandy land, with a vegetation that is not very dense, where scattered "quimbos" (small villages inhabited by a small number of families) are populated mostly by the Kuanhamas, a tribe of shepherds and warriors who engage almost exclusively in cattle raising.

The capital, N'Giva (formerly Pereira d'Eca), is a small town with about 5,000 inhabitants; by virtue of their cleanliness, its streets contrast with those in other Angolan cities; it has minimum infrastructure facilities, such as a hospital, schools, government agencies, a recently opened athletic field, a motion picture theater which is being rebuilt, etc.

Problem of "Homeless People"

The social situation in the town was up to a certain point disturbed by the influx of several hundred so-called "displaced persons"--these are peasants who, due to the war, were forced to leave their home territories and seek safety in the city. Although there are not very many of them, their number is sufficient to cause some problems of a social nature--such as supply, etc.--if we consider the dimensions of N'Giva. They have been put up in several scores of straw huts, hastily built to house them; but construction has already been started on a development featuring better homes, consisting of wattle and daub and adobe.

Xangongo (formerly Rocadas) is the province's second-largest urban center; it is located 100 kilometers north of N'Giva and controls the enormous bridge over the Kunene River, the biggest one in Angola.

Biggest Difficulties in Communications

Kunene is cut from north to south by the black-top highway running from Lubango, across the provincial border in the area of Cahama, continuing for 200 kilometers to N'Giva and another 40 kilometers to Namibia. This is the only regular access road leading to Kunene; there are no railroad connections and, for obvious safety reasons, flights by Angolan airlines to N'Giva have not been regular.

More or less parallel to the border, there are also some dirt roads and forest trails linking the townships and communities in the province's interior, where traffic is generally dangerous due to South African aircraft and, in some sections, groups of UNITA.

Forgotten Territory

The "forgetfulness" to which Portuguese colonialism doomed Kunene--a forgetfulness which, according to some militants in N'Giva, sometimes tends to emerge again in some sectors--left a heritage of a situation of extreme economic underdevelopment and [illegible words in original] dependence in relation to the province [illegible words], on all levels.

In terms of industry, for example, Kunene has only a small lumber processing plant in N'Giva and only one brick factory in Xangongo. The province's main resource and perhaps the only significant one is beef cattle whose products are consumed locally and distributed to other Angolan provinces (meat, milk, and butter are components of the basic diet of the Kuanhamas along with a cereal of the "mapira" type, called "massombo").

Almost All Sectors Hit by War

Almost all economic and social sectors of Kunene have to a greater or lesser degree been affected by the wartime situation which the province is experiencing--and this is one of the conclusions that stands out in the extensive interview given by Maj Ary da Costa.

"The racists are trying to turn this part of our land into a no-man's land, a scorched earth. This is why they are bombing the schools, the villages, the fields, and the cattle. They do this to intimidate and threaten the peoples because they unconditionally support our comrades in Namibia. They want to turn this into no-man's land so as to get the people to leave the southern strip and go further into the interior of the territory, creating a buffer zone along the border in order to prevent the moves of the SWAPO."

The Kunene provincial commissioner continued to talk about the situation in some sectors which were particularly hit by South African attacks. "Right now we are having big problems in housing. This is quite understandable because they scorched-earth policy along the border has forced many persons to leave their homes. We have many such people here in the provincial capital and also in the township. For the time being they are not very well settled and we had to do the best we could; but we are building slightly better houses with wattle and daub and mud. We are trying to solve the problem with local materials, using only the resources available in our province."

No Stones for Construction in Kunene

There is a good reason for this remark by Ary da Costa: in practically all of Kunene, there is no suitable stone for construction; it has to be obtained in the zone of Cahana, 200 kilometers north of N'Giva.

Overall, the provincial commissioner noted the existence of "serious housing shortages which we are trying to resolve." The construction industry in turn is facing a tremendous work overload caused by the need for rebuilding installations hit by South African attacks. "But they responded to the challenge," says Ary da Costa, "and they even built some schools and bridges. I must also note the reconstruction of the bridge over the Kunene River which is extremely important to the supply and the entire life of the province; it had been destroyed by the 'lackeys' in 1975."

Next, Ary da Costa talked to us about supplying the population. The provincial domestic trade sector, he says, has been able to do its job in spite of the difficulties on the national level. But two types of problems came up just the same: transportation for the distribution of products (this is also tied in with the military situation) and a problem which he defined as being of a cultural character. "The population of this province essentially lives from meat and that creates certain difficulties. We have made every effort to diversify the diet of the people and to get them accustomed to consuming other products and we have had some success here."

In the South of the Southern Part of Angola

"We are in the southern part of the south of Angola, where we have no railroads, no port, and where goods either come in by aircraft or by truck.

The racists bomb and destroy vehicles and this calls for a rather complicated setup to protect the trucks. Last month alone we had to record the loss of 7 vehicles in our provincial motor pool, and that will give you an idea of the dimensions of the problem," he added, also touching on the question of supplies.

"On the level of transportation, we are still considerably short of the target. We have a serious shortage of spare parts on the provincial level and to get supplies, we must go about 400 kilometers by highway, which presupposes a tremdous wear and tear on the equipment. This is why the lifetime of our vehicles is substantially reduced. Regarding communications likewise, right now telephone links between the provincial capital and the rest of the country are interrupted, but we are trying to normalize the situation."

The provincial commissioner then briefly touched on the situation in other sectors such as public health (there are seven doctors in the province, four civil service doctors and three private doctors), education and the literacy drive, and sports. On this latter point, Ary da Costa told us about the multipurpose sports facility which will be opened within a few days as part of the ceremonies commemorating the date of 1 August the anniversary of the proclamation of the FAPLA. "This is one of the best, nationwide, with international dimensions. We are also improving the soccer field and the tracks, the hammer-throw, and javelin facilities, etc.," he said.

Water--Another Problem

"We have some problems in getting water. As you know, the province has only one permanent water course, the Junene River. The colonialists did nothing to solve the people's problems in this respect. We are making every effort to open up 'xipacas' [watering holes] to provide water for the cattle and we are also doing some drilling to provide the population with drinking water. But drinking water for the people implies certain support facilities which the province does not have and we are having some difficulties here. These difficulties have been partly resolved and right now we have drinking water in all townships and even in all communities."

"In spite of this wartime situation, we want to provide a minimum of amenities for our people. This is one concern of the central government and the provincial government; we do not want to abandon those population groups," continued Maj Ary da Costa.

The provincial commissioner finally analyzed the situation in terms of the people's political mobilization and the operations of UNITA in the province (at this point, Savimbi was in the midst of a propaganda campaign in Europe, asserting that he controlled vast areas of Kunene).

"Our people is 100 percent behind the activities of the party and the government; the people of Kunene are with the MPLA. We can say generally that the spirit of the people is very good; the population is ready to participate in the tasks that have been outlined and also to report actions of banditry. You have seen that every member of our people here, on foot, on bicycle, on horseback, or in trucks, is armed to defend himself. Everybody is armed because our people categorically reject the puppets of UNITA and the other counterrevolutionaries who want to entice the population," he said.

UNITA Is Nowhere

"Savimbi," Ary da Costa said, "is using the circumstances created by his own bosses, the South African racists, for his own propaganda. A month ago, in this latest invasion, they occupied certain parts of the province, such as the communities of Xieto, Evale, Neone, and Kuamato. That was utilized--according to the intention of South Africa--to infiltrate groups of bandits and to permit some organization on their part. But UNITA really does not have sufficient strength to do what it says it wants to do. You have been here in N'Giva, you have been in Cahama, in Xangongo, in Mongua, and you were able to see for yourselves: they are few in number and they operate in certain specific spots in the province. They carry out bandit raids; they steal from the people and they rape them, they force them to go with them into the forest. UNITA is nothing here. It has absolutely no expression."

Racists Do Not Want to Learn History's Lesson

Our interview had begun almost an hour before and the officials and functionaries at the provincial commissioner's office had for some time been reminding Ary da Costa that other tasks were awaiting him. He excused himself because he had to leave. But before that, he stated in conclusion: "The racists do not want to learn the lessons of history. The history of Angola, the history of other peoples all over the world. And we have to be patient, we have to teach them. Our people will not withdraw its support for SWAPO and the people of Namibia because of strafings and bombings and ambushes. This is a question of time: the fire will spread there and Namibia will be independent."

POTENTIAL OF EXISTING, NEW OIL DISCOVERIES SURVEYED

Paris EUROPE OUTREMER in French Apr 80 p 24

[Text] Oil is a basic factor in an economic study of Angola. In 1978 it accounted for 85 percent of the exports and 60 percent of the state resources. Production comes to some 8 million tons of crude oil per year. The figure for 1977 was 8.643 million tons, that for 1978 was 8.198 million tons, and that for 1979 is expected to total 9 million tons, representing an increase of about 10 percent over the preceding year. The Angolan minister of petroleum announced a major increase in production in the years to come as of the end of 1979. Angola should benefit from heavy investments during this period, not only in the realm of research but also in refining and petrochemistry.

Three Main Basins

Offshore of Cabinda, the production of new fields (Takula, Kambala, Liviute) will be added to that of Malongo. In 1983 the total will surpass 150,000 barrels per day. Only a third of the maritime reserves have been explored, and secondary recovery projects using gas injection are planned.

In addition, research on land has revealed a great potential, and numerous countries are interested. The Angolan National Oil Company (SONANGOL) is preparing to begin work.

In the Congo basin, the "bloc 2" maritime deposit being exploited by Texaco is expected to produce 30,000 barrels per day in 1980 and 50,000 barrels per day in 1981. Thanks to the Cuntala, Etele and Essungo fields, production could triple or quadruple in 3 or 4 years. The gas reserves at Lua and Etele are estimated at nearly 200 billion cubic meters.

The Congo basin also has a great potential on land, and, thanks to the secondary recovery work (gas and water injection at Quinguila and water injection at Pangala), the 37,000-barrel-per-day production figure is expected to reach 80,000 in 1980.

The Cuenza basin, the oldest and best-known, produces 10,000 barrels per day. The work projected is designed to maintain this production for 3 or 4 years more.

An Important Discovery

These were the expectations when, in February 1980, the SONANGOL announced the discovery of the largest Angolan deposit, 45 kilometers of the Cabinda coast and about 60 meters in depth, in a concession held by the SONANGOL (51 percent) and the American Gulf Oil company (49 percent). Its exploitation may begin 3 years from now with production in excess of 50,000 barrels per day.

The Angolan minister of petroleum has thus stated that the total production, which will come to 160,000 barrels per day this year, could reach 200,000 barrels per day within 3 years, and that the new deposits as well as the use of the injection procedure could make it possible to double production.

The Angolan Total Oil Company (Total Cap), an affiliate of the CFP [French Petroleum Company], which already has a 17.5-percent share of "bloc 2," where production began early this year, obtained a license in May, according to a production-sharing contract with SONANGOL and Total Cap, covering "bloc 6," approximately 4,800 square kilometers lying offshore from Luanda.

PIRES: FUNDAMENTALS OF FOREIGN POLICY ARE IMMUTABLE

Praia VOZ DE POVO in Portuguese 9 Aug 80 p 5

[Remarks by Pedro Pires: "Cape Verde Foreign Policy Unalterable"]

[Excerpts] On the commemoration of the 5th anniversary of national independence, Brigade Commander and Prime Minister Pedro Pires held a press conference on 4 July for domestic and foreign mass media.

We must note the number of questions asked by journalists--questions which were promptly considered by the chairman of the CNCV [Cape Verde National Committee?].

Responding to a question from a foreign newsman, Pedro Pires told us:

"Cape Verde's foreign policy is unalterable in terms of its basic foundations and its fundamental thrust. This means that these are principles which we consider sacred and which we do not change. It is clear of course that, if new conditions arise, these new conditions will be properly handled, in other words, we will respond to new phenomena or new problems, but the basic principles are unalterable. There are not and there cannot be any changes here. We are a nonalined country, we are against the existence of foreign bases in our countries, we are for peace, we are for detente, we are for the autonomy of peoples, we are for national independence, we are for progress, we defend the principle of solidarity between peoples, especially the principle of solidarity between African peoples, the principle of solidarity with oppressed peoples. This is why there cannot be any change here. Our policy is the policy of the PAIGC [African Independence Party of Guinea-Bissau] and is spelled out in our party charter. It suffices to read the charter in order to see that these fundamental principles are here to stay. We did absolutely not invent anything and we are absolutely not going to change anything. These have been the principles of the party since its founding. Over the next five years, over the next ten years, there may be some changes in style, let us say, because we have already indicated that any basic changes are impossible. Greater dynamism? I believe so! We are a poor country, a dependent country, which needs technical and financial assistance from other countries, a country which needs the solidarity of other peoples; we are small and we must have a sufficiently dynamic foreign policy. To provide greater dynamism, we need greater resources. As we get greater resources, our foreign policy will take on more dynamism but the principles will be the same, the principles are fundamental."

Zimbabwe Can Be an Interesting Experience

"That brings up an interesting question. Will it indeed be possible in Africa to create a democratic multiracial society? Will Zimbabwe have a broader experience? Could Zimbabwe become an example for South Africa, a real way out of the system of 'apartheid?' This is how we are looking at the situation. We carefully follow events in Zimbabwe. We think that the situation has started rather well and the prospects are interesting. Theoretically this is possible, but that brings up the problem of whether it will be possible in fact. There will certainly be many difficulties; this will be an extremely complex process because it is necessary to keep various interests in mind, such as the interests of the various communities, of the various population groups, and at the same time, it is possible that there may be much pressure from impatient sources and those who do not like to lose their privileges. Zimbabwe is an extremely interesting experience which we would love to see turning out successfully.

"It is clear that this is a long-range situation estimate, made from the outside. We do not have any data on the country; this is a rather long-range view, apart from that process which we would like to see completed."

BRIEFS

FOREIGN MINISTER TO BRAZIL--Foreign Affairs Minister and President of the People's National Assembly Comrade Abilio Duarte is scheduled to visit the Federated Republic of Brazil for the first time in an official capacity in the middle of October, according to VOZ DI POVO, along with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in Praia. The visit by the chief diplomat of Cape Verde is being made in response to an invitation from the Brazilian foreign affairs minister and he will be given special attention among political circles in the capital's country. Excellent relations of friendship and cooperation have been maintained from the very first moment between Cape Verde and Brazil; by the way, there are also great affinities between these two countries regarding language, culture, history, and ethnic background. TRADE UNION DELEGATION RETURNS--The Cape Verde labor union organization, which was on official visit to China, returned to the country. The delegation was made up of comrades Afonso Gomes, secretary-general, UNTCV-CS [National Union of Workers of Cape Verde--Central Labor Union Headquarters], and Antonio Sergio Portugues as well as Antonio Filomeno, all of whom are members of the executive secretariat of the National Union of Workers of Cape Verde--Central Labor Union Headquarters. This visit was made in response to an invitation from the Chinese Federation of Labor Unions whose delegation visited Cape Verde between 22 July and 5 August of this year. Talking about cooperation between our organization and China, Comrade Afonso Gomes said that there was an extensive exchange of cultural delegations during his visit, along with assistance for our labor union organization in the matter of sports. During its visit, our labor union delegation visited historical places and some provinces, especially Shanghai and Ranxung [Zhanshung?]. OUSMAN GAM DISCUSSES PROSPECTS FOR SOLUTION TO CONFLICT

Brazzaville LA SEMAINE AFRICAINE in French 21-27 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Albert S. Mianzoukouta: "A Conversation With the FAN [Northern Armed Forces] Mission"]

> [Text] Since the start of the battle of Ndjamena in March 1980, and especially since all administrative services have ceased to function in the Chadian capital, the information coming from this part of Africa is always questionable. It cannot be otherwise: Chadian information services have also been completely disorganized by the war.
> In a conflict where the most diverse interests overlap, most of the sources of information become envenomed very quickly, making it necessary for newsmen to be cautious... Tired of hearing only the other truth, the FAN of Mr Hissein Habre have sent news missions to certain African governments. On Friday, 8 August 1980, we were visited by a mission led by Mr Ousman Gam, commissioner of information, and included Messrs Abderaman Hamdam and Korom Ahmer, FAN secretary and committee member respectively. We were granted a long interview by this mission, and we are printing the main part of the interview below.

The Ndjamena conflict has lasted 5 months. For 5 months all parties seem to have rejected the idea of having a dialog, and the will and wishes of all Chadian factions are being expressed through the use of arms. An unfortunate paradox: the sound of guns has filled the city of peace. It is in Kousseri, a small town in neighboring Cameroon, that the sons of Chad find a certain amount of peace. Some of the 11 groups in conflict with each other only believe in salvation through arms, others demand a Chadian federation, and it seems that no one wants to take the initiative towards a negotiated solution. Is this the end of the Chadian nation?

Mr Ousman Gam assures us that the FAN do not consider a true dialog between the belligerent parties to be an impossible occurrence. "Many of the factions in the conflict still claim to draw on the ideas of the FROLINAT; this would be a basis for understanding. It is true that the FROLINAT has been broken up, but no one seems to have given up its program. Let our brothers express themselves by this means. Even if they envision a society unlike ours, let them say it." Yet, that is where the shoe pinches in the Chadian conflict: no one has decided to silence the guns and to join in negotiations. Mr Ousman Gam reminds us that for the FAN "the solution to the Chadian problem will be a political one." "The problem for our brothers in the coalition is that they cannot draw back now," states the commissioner of information from Mr Hissein Habre's faction. "They have stated that the solution to our problem will be a military one, and they cannot reverse themselves. However, we in the FAN, would have a frank dialog if this were possible. What we do not want is for Chad to explode. Already at this moment a part of our territory is occupied by Libya.* France is encouraging a certain secession in the South. To all this, we say no!"

However, for a long time the FAN have been accused of violating the Lagos accords, which are considered by the international community to be the only ones that can bring peace to Chad again. To this, Mr Ousman Gam replied that the FAN respect the OAU and the Lagos Agreements. "It is true that they are binding on the 11 signatory parties. However, what is not adequately stressed is that it is also binding on the signatory countries. Yet Libya (a signatory country) continues to train and arm certain groups. That is a violation! France, which colonized Chad for a long time, never found suitable solutions. Now she proposes a certain federalism; this is unacceptable."

The fact is that France is not alone in thinking that federalism is the only system capable of resolving the Chadian problem. Many observers, some of whom are Chadian, agree. The FAN reject this solution. In the long run federalism will mean the existence of two states: the Moslem north and the Christian and animist south. Those who would be most pleased, according to Mr Ousman Gam, would be France and Libya. The one, Christian, would have contacts with the south, and the other, Moslem, would try to get along with the north. Therefore, interference by others would always be there.

From where then would come a solution to the Chadian problem? Many think that only the OAU could get the Chadian brothers to be more agreeable and understanding. For the moment, the mission of the Inter-African Neutral Force has failed, but behind the scenes at the OAU there is more talk about setting up another neutral force, or, perhaps, to appeal for help from the UN peacekeeping troops. The FAN, wary because of an earlier experience last March, demand that the mission of this neutral force be clearly defined from the start. Mr Ousman Gam explained that at the time the Ndjamena war started in March 1980 their proposal that neutral Congolese troops (the only ones who answered the OAU appeal) form a buffer zone between the belligerent parties was rejected by the OAU. This could certainly have prevented the holocaust that followed. The FAN do not want another experience of this kind.

Mr Gam assures us that with regard to territory the FAN would control the whole city of Ndjamena and would be strongly supported by the population. Life is coming back to Ndjamena, though there are still problems with the supply of products for basic needs. The people who took refuge in Kousseri are returning to their homes. The city is coming back to life.

One cannot complain about the diplomatic situation either. Asked about the aid the FAN would get from Egypt and the Sudan, Mr Ousman Gam denied that they had any relations whatever with these countries or with Libya, from whom, however, it is said that they received help: "these are ploys," added Mr Gam. As for Libya, the commissioner of information of the FAN stated that all 11 Chadian factions (including the FAN) had received aid from that country at the time of the great FROLINAT. Mr Gam also denied that the present conflict in Chad is caused by religious differences or that it will lead to the big conflict that will have to erupt between the north and the south: "We do not make such calculations," said Mr Gam. "When we say that we will negotiate, we have no ulterior motives."

As for information on whether Mr Hissein Habre was wounded and is presently being treated in Toulouse, the commissioner of information of the FAN and his compatriots burst out laughing and said that several weeks earlier it was Mr Ousman Gam who was said to have been killed in an ambush in Chad...

ARMORED BULLDOZERS USED IN WAR

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 22 Aug 80 p 16

[Text] Ndjamena--Since 21 March, in Ndjamena, the use of bulldozers armored with reinforced concrete has lent a new twist to battles between Hissein Habre's Armed Forces of the North (FAN) and the Chadian president's forces, Goukouni Oueddei.

In fact, since the People's Armed Forces (FAP) of Mr Goukouni used this vehicle for the first time on 9 July against the "Camp of 13 April," which was held by the FAN, offensives have become less frequent, but much bloodier and infinitely more resolute.

On 9 July, confident in their bulldozer, built in 72 days in the Public Works Department garages across from a former French military base, Mr Goukouni's troops attacked by the hundreds against the "Camp of 13 April" in the center of the city. After some unusually violent engagements, the FAP had to withdraw, abandoning about 100 bodies on the field. The bulldozer was trapped in the camp.

On 1 August, Mr Goukouni's forces, supported this time by two other armored bulldozers, launched a general offensive which ended in failure, the death of several dozen combatants and the abandoning of one of the vehicles in the Klemat quarter near the gendarmerie, while the other vehicle escaped after having sustained some damage.

However, although the bulldozers made by Goukouni's partisans had little luck in the field, the ones belonging to Hissein Habre's men, which are only an improved copy of the FAP models, have been especially effective.

Escorted by several dozen fighting men armed with bazookas and automatic weapons, this new type of tank called "Mardai Gimmi-Hassan," and made, according to reliable sources, in 34 days at Sabangali (the district where the chief of the FAN lives), operated for 6 hours last Saturday without a hitch, during the FAN offensive.

Nevertheless, the vehicle must still undergo some changes before being returned to service. Among other things, a ventilation system will have to be installed to reduce the heat released into the cab after several volleys have been fired, which almost suffocated its occupants.

SURVEY OF POLITICAL, ECONOMIC CONDITIONS ONE YEAR AFTER COUP

Paris LE MONDE in French 20 Aug 80 p 7

[Article by Pierre Biarnes: "Reconstruction of the Economy Depends Mainly on Aid from Madrid"]

[Text] Malabo--It has been a year since the army overthrew the dictatorial regime of Francisco Macias Nguema on 3 August 1979. Nguema was executed by firing squad on 23 September. Now the Spanish are returning to the country in force at the request of the new head of state, Lt Col Teodoro Obiang Nguema Bosogo. The country is divided into two parts: one part is on the mainland; its main city is Bata. The other part is an island, on which the capital of the country, Malabo--formerly Santa Isabel, is located. The Spanish population in both parts of the country fell from more than 10,000 before independence was declared in 1968 to less than 150 on the eve of the coup d'etat; now it has risen to nearly 3,000, of which some 400 are civilian consultants assigned to all ministries. These consultants are generally accompanied by their families. Some 2-3 thousand more Spaniards are expected to come as the economy recovers. Equatorial Guinea has less than 300,000 citizens, nearly 1/4 of whom are still living in exile in neighboring Gabon and Cameroon, and about 10,000, many of whom are managers and skilled workers, are in Spain, where they fled from the dictatorship.

The newcomers' moving into Bata and especially Malabo has caused some delicate problems, because the cities are quite délapidated. Except for villas occupied by a few diplomatic missions, practically all the old European houses have been abandoned. Makeshift solutions have had to be found. The first people to arrive were housed on a cruise ship, the "Ciudad de Pamplona," then aboard the "Bilbao," which is permanently anchored in the port of the capital as a floating hotel. Then three towns of prefabricated housing were thrown up, two in Malabo and one in Bata. Electricity was installed. Food is still imported from Spain, for the most part, but truck farming, small-boat fishing (forbidden under Macias, so opponents could not escape) and small cattle raising are again beginning to supply the markets, and small businesses are started to reopen. The people are benefiting from the gradual restoration of order and from food and health aid from Spain, the EEC, and various UN agencies.

Civil Servants Again Paid

For the first time in 5 years, a budget has been adopted, and civil servants, who had not been paid in a long time, are again regularly receiving their pay, now that they have been counted and given official status. The army and police had become a conglomeration of armed bands living mainly by extortion; they have been reorganized and reequipped with aid from Madrid. Schools are reopening their doors, and hospitals, which had been almost completely abandoned, are again beginning to function. Repairs of roads and city streets have been started. With material and 20 technicians from Spain, radio and television have begun to broadcast again, and EBANO and POTO-POTO, the two small daily papers published before independence, are coming out, the former in Malabo and the latter in Bata. Spanish advisors are busy getting the banking system going again, along with the post office, telecommunications, transportation, etc.

The recovery of cocoa and wood production is the main double objective of the economic policy set by the new leaders and their Spanish advisors.

Before independence, Equatorial Guinea produced, in good years and bad, 40,000 tons of the best cocoa in the world, on the island of Fernando Po. Production had fallen to 5,000 tons, but it is hoped that it will be brought back up to 9,000 tons this year. The former owners have come back to look around, and the authorities have promised to give them back their lands if they invest the money necessary to put them back into shape. But they are hesitant, mainly because the major problem of labor is still unresolved. Workers used to be imported from the Calabar region of Nigeria because the Bubis, the native population of the island, are not very numerous (only about 15,000 people), and they have no farming traditions. However, the Nigerians remember that their citizens were victims of Macias' terror, and they are reticent. In forestry, however, the Fangs of Rio Muni, who are much more numerous than their Bioco compatriots, are quite willing to work in the large, mechanized lumber companies. Thus, the authorities expect that okoume exports will equal in 2 or 3 years at most the 300,000 tons exported at the end of the 1960's.

Also, efforts are being made to recondition the less important plantations of coffee and oil palms, and there is serious hope of inding oil before long, since deposits have been discovered in recent years on the neighboring coasts of Cameroon and Gabon.

The restoration of order and economic recovery should make it possible for the Equatorial Guinean "ekwele" to rejoin the "peseta zone." The ekwele was devalued 100 percent in June, and new paper money is being printed in Madrid. (Since devaluation, 1 ekwele = 0.5 peseta. However, 3 bikweles (the plural of ekwele) are needed to buy 1 peseta.) These measures are already laying the groundwork for recovery, as is the sizeable financial aid that the former colonial power is sending, along with it technical assistance: $44 million in various kinds of credit so far on very advantageous terms, and about $10 million in gifts, which come to a bit more than Fr 220 million.

No Lock-In

On 3 August, the first anniversary of the "golpe de libertad" ["liberty coup"], as the country's new leaders call their takeover, a high thanksgiving mass was held in the Santa Iglesia church (which had been closed under Macias, along with all other Catholic meeting places) on the former Plaza de Espana, near the former governors' palace.

Lt Col Obiang gave a report on the "Supreme Military Council's" first year in power. He spoke on the eve of the anniversary of the coup, at the Marfil theater, the very place where the falled dictator was tried. Several times Lt Col Obiang spoke ringing praises of Spain, which was "the first to respond massively" to the appeal of the Guinean authorities. He also emotionally evoked his deep attachment to "hispanidad" [Spain]. But he also stressed Equatorial Guinea's desire not to let itself be locked into a relationship with the former colonial power, and its firm desire not to be cut off any longer from the rest of Africa, and its desire to develop its cooperation with the greatest possible number of partners. He cited, among others, China, France, the United States, and the EEC.

The Spanish are the first to admit their country's lack of experience in international cooperation and to admit that actions taken jointly with other Western countries will limit their political risks. In this spirit, for example, they seem to have favored recently the idea of an association between ELF [Gasoline and Lubricants Company of France] and Hispanoil to explore for oil along the Rio Muni coasts. Similarly, after several incidents, they have given EEC officials firm assurances, Equatorial Guinea being an associated state, so that Guinea can implement without hindrance a Fr 40-million emergency program that Spain has drawn up for its former colony in the areas of electrical power (total restoration of the Malabo network, which is now out of service), public health, agriculture, fishing, and public works, and a Fr 60-million program as the 5th from the EDF [European Development Fund].

However, instructions from Madrid are not always followed to the letter in Malabo, where some of the citizens take advantage of their positions as monopolists. Educated Equatorial Guineans who had gone into exile under Macias are hesitant to return, despite the repeated appeals of the officials of the new regime, who have emptied the prisons but refuse to authorize political activity. Also, corruption is rife in all sectors because of low salaries. (The minimum Equatorial Guinean salary is set at only 1,700 bikweles, or about Fr 140 a month at the official rate.)

France was the only Western country to keep an ambassador in Equatorial Guinea in the last years of the dictatorship and has so far made little response to the advances of the new leaders. Fewer than 20 French citizens, including diplomats, are living on a permanent but very precarious basis in the country. The financial aid from France that has been announced so far amounts to 110 million thin centimes, most of which is to be used for repairing Malabo's main dock. A mission head for aid and cooperation was recently appointed, and President Obiang has accepted an invitation to visit Paris in November. It was extended by Mr Martin Kirsch, Elysee advisor for African affairs, who was present at the ceremonies of 3 August.

At the beginning of the year, the heavily one-sided fishing agreements that the Soviets had imposed on Macias without any compensation at all were revoked. Some 50 Soviets are still on the island, and only the Chinese are a serious counterweight to the Spanish presence. They are very much appreciated, as they are everywhere else in Africa, for their efficiency and discretion. Their 200-300 technical assistants are said to have made a no-interest, indefinite-term "loan" of $40 million and to have done some large road-building, hydroelectric, and telecommunications projects. The rebuilt Malabo telephone exchange was dedicated last 3 August by the Chinese postal vice-minister, Mrs Luo Shusen.

Finally, Morocco provided Lt Col Obiang with a hundred men for his personal bodyguard just after his coup d'etat (some cynics say it was a few hours before the coup). These guards had been "lent" to Gabon. This rather special cooperating personnel are conspicuously dressed and seemed ready to pull their guns at any moment during the 3 August ceremonies as they did a strange dance around the head of state and penetrated as far as the choir of the cathedral at the moment of the elevation of the host. In exchange for this assistance, Equatorial Guinea rescinded the gratitude it had expressed to the West Saharan Democratic Arab Republic.

BONGO WORRIED BY CONSEQUENCES OF OIL PRICE INCREASES

AB181809 Paris AFP in French 1525 GMT 18 Sep 80

[Text] Libreville, 18 Sep (AFP)--President Omar Bongo of Gabon stated on Thursday that the large increases in the price of oil imposed by OPEC could have very serious consequences throughout the world.

I am worried because these increases in the price of oil could provoke unforseeable incidents. We must use our oil for the good of all, not as a weapon that is always being brandished, the Gabonese president, whose country is a member of OPEC, explained.

I shall not hesitate to speak my mind on this issue during the forthcoming summit in Baghdad. We have no right to make other countries suffer or to suffocate the whole world, he asserted in front of a group of French journalists.

However Mr Bongo stressed that the United States is responsible for the recent upswing in the price of oil because of the fall in the dollar's exchange rate, which in turn obliged the OPEC countries to revise their rates.

On the other hand, the Gabonese president expressed his support for the indexing of oil prices if the formula is carefully worked out.

According to him, some OPEC member countries must adopt a more polite approach toward humanity in their speech and attitude and must think more and more of human welfare.

In addition, he expressed his readiness to help other African countries which have no oil--particularly within the scope of OPEC institutions--but explained that since his country also has development problems, he would not always dispose of oil reserves.

We must not be deceived by our oil. Who will help us if we have no more of it? he asked.

Gabon produces about 9 million tons of oil per year and is ranked among the smallest producing countries within OPEC. Her production has been decreasing for 2 years in spite of recent discoveries.

NEW OIL FINDS PROMISE INCREASED YIELD

Paris EUROPE OUTREMER in French Apr 80 pp 22-23

[Excerpt] We have seen that production is expected to decline until 1981, but the improvement of recovery techniques makes possible better exploitation of the deposits, and above all the recent discoveries should make it possible to stabilize production.

Positive results, varying in importance, have in fact been obtained by ELF [Gasoline and Lubricants Company of France] Gabon during last year and the beginning of this one, first of all at sea, at the Ayol Marine drilling site on the Assouka permit, held by Wed Gabon (70 percent) and ELF Gabon (30 percent), near the Grondin field (an initial flow of 172 cubic meters per day was obtained). Production is expected to begin during the first half of 1981. The M'Boumba deposit, to the north, is another minor discovery, this time on land. The second exploratory drilling at the beginning of this year revealed the existence of a number of strata which went unnoted during the earlier drilling, and a development program, limited initially to several wells, was scheduled for the second half of 1980. These results, if confirmed, would make it possible to consider a region half on land and half at sea, in which deposits too small to be put into production separately were discovered in the past, from a new viewpoint.

But it is in the southern part of Gabon, near the boundary with the Congo, along the Mayumba, that the results seem most promising. Deposits have been discovered on the M'Bya and Tchibala permits, and the portions of these deposits held by Gulf have been bought back in full by ELF Gabon. A first stage of development for the M'Bya deposit was scheduled and production has just begun. In addition, an important program this year will focus on the drilling of exploratory wells at the M'Bya and Tchibala deposits. These projects taken together are designed to evaluate, beginning at the end of 1980, the potential reserves and production capacity of a region which is rich in oil but which has difficult exploitation conditions, and as yet insufficient study. It will also make it possible to estimate the investment effort which would have to be made in future years for the development of this entire zone, which would then constitute a new oil province in Gabon. It should be noted further that at the beginning of this year, ELF Gabon obtained a maritime exploration permit for the southern part of Gabon, near the deposits already discovered, and a second off the coast of Libreville. Finally, the reserves discovered in Baliste Marine and Anguille Sud-Est have in fact been put into production in recent months.

Non-French foreign companies are also active in oil prospecting. In April 1980, 6 such companies signed an exploration agreement involving a maritime permit covering nearly 6,000 square kilometers. They are Acorn Petroleum Gabon (an affiliate of the Nigerian Lawson group), Neste Oy (Finland), OMV (Austria), Hudray Oil (Canada), Northern Oil and Gas (Canada), and the Burma Oil Exploration company, which will be the operator.

The creation of the Gabonese National Oil Company (PETROGAB) in 1979 will enable the Gabonese state to participate more actively in oil operations. This should be reflected in the development of new forms of cooperation which will benefit both Gabon and the production companies.

In conclusion, it should be recalled that in 1975 an investment fund was created through the Diversified Investments Deposit (PID), fed by oil income, making it possible thus to contribute in an original and significant fashion to the economic development of the country. The oil companies participate in the formation of this fund by paying yearly up to 10 percent of their tax-exempt turnover: the present rate is about 6 percent. These funds are mainly invested outside the oil sector. At the end of 1979, 15 projects were financed within the framework of the PID, in which the oil companies hold substantial shares. The project of greatest interest to Gabon currently is that of the Gabonese Cellulose Company (SOGACEL). The launching of the work may take place this year, with a more limited capacity than that originally planned.

NKRUMAISTS CONGRATULATE TOURE ON FAILED ASSASSINATION ATTEMPT

Conakry HOROYA in French 28 Aug 80 pp 1,2

[Item titled "Message from Accra to the Head of State"]

[Excerpts] Excellency,

We, the former members of the entourage of your lamented comrade-in-arms and Osagyefo friend, Dr Kwame N'Krumah, may his soul rest in peace, are writing you to sincerely congratulate you upon your miraculous escape from the cowardly attempt perpetrated against your person.

We cannot feel any less perturbed by this affair than our brothers in the Republic of Guinea. We are one and the same people, among whom we had the gracious opportunity to live, to take up arms and to celebrate victories over a period of 6 years under your inspiring leadership.

As revolutionaries, we are hardly surprised by this recent attempt against your life, for, we have witnessed several recurrences of such dastardly incidents, including the imperialist invasion of Guinea on 22 November 1970.

Nevertheless, we wish to summarize herein our views of this recent attempt against your life, as foreign observers and as a group that has had the honor of residing in your country and of taking up arms against world reactionary elements under the most difficult of circumstances.

In the first place, we do not consider this attempt as something new, but rather as a new phase in the maneuverings being deployed by imperialism with the aim of liquidating your person, following all the humiliating defeats that imperialism has suffered in its effort to restore a neocolonialist regime in the Republic of Guinea.

In our opinion, the attack against your person was an attempt to halt the growing awakening of the African peoples, especially those sharing their borders with the Republic of Guinea.

For, under your leadership, the Republic of Guinea has, beyond any doubt whatever, become the bastion of the African republic; and the forces of imperialism, aided by domestic dissidents, and after having failed in their attempt to recolonize our peoples, seek as a necessity but to liquidate your physical presence, which they consider a "threat" to their neocolonialist objectives.

Lastly and above all, international imperialism and its agents have discovered, unfortunately, that the people of Guinea have succeeded, after long decades, in breaking out of the economic blockade that had been organized against them. And the fundamental element in this economic success has been the economic stability that has permitted of a growing awareness by the people.

Consequently, the imperialists are stopping at nothing in their endeavor to plunge Guinea once again into political chaos by physically eliminating you.

Your Excellency Mr President, we the former members of the entourage of your lamented Osagyefo brother, Dr Kwame N'Krumah, wish, in conclusion, to assure your august person, the Democratic Party of Guinea, and all the people of the Republic of Guinea of our unswerving loyalty, our steadfast backing and our inflexible intent to be at your side the instant you may call upon us.

We remain your comrades-in-arms.

Signed:

A. Mensah, Andrews Kofi Bah, Kofi Aneko and Yakubu Dalinkai

WOMEN CENTERS RECEIVE NORTH KOREAN EMBROIDERY TRAINING

Conakry HOROYA in French 17-18 Aug 80 p 2

[Article by Amirou Barry]

[Excerpts] Comrade Andree Toure, wife of the head of state, presided, on Saturday morning 16 August at the Cameroun CRPF [Regional Women Promotional Center], the opening of a nationwide specialized training course being given to some 60 women from our 36 Women Promotional Centers installed throughout the national territory.

Among the notables accompanying the wife of the head of state were comrade Jeanne Martin Cisse, member of the BPN [National Political Bureau] and minister of social affairs, members of the URFG [Revolutionary Union of Guinean Women], and other women officials at different echelons of the state political party.

As part of the broadening of militant cooperation ties between the Democratic People's Republic of Korea and our country, this training course, which will last 1 year, will undoubtedly contribute to the occupational qualification and promotion of Guinean women.

As regards the course itself, it is designed to help our women learn machine as well as hand embroidery techniques. Three Korean specialists will dispense the training in these techniques, which our state party plans to popularize through our Women Promotional Centers.

It is pointed out that this course is viewed as one of the many concrete results of Guinean-Korean cooperation, which was further strengthened during the visit made by our head of state, his wife, and a large delegation to the Democratic People's Republic of Korea last October. We will report further on this topic at a later date.

BRIEFS

SAUDI ARABIAN ROAD CONSTRUCTION LOAN--Today 1 July 1980 in Riyadh, a loan agreement was signed between the Saudi Arabian Development Fund and the People's Revolutionary Republic of Guinea. According to this agreement, the Fund grants a loan of 100 million Saudi riyals, equivalent to around $30,121,000, to contribute to the financing of the Gueckedou-N'Zerekore road project. This project calls for the construction of a 303-kilometer road between the cities of Gueckedou and N'Zerekore. The road will cross the Guinea woodlands zone, thus facilitating the development of the zone and permitting access to the iron ore deposits in Mt Nimba and Mt Simandou. It is pointed out that this road will link N'Zerekore to the capital, Conakry. The overall completion cost of this project is estimated at $81 million. Its completion is scheduled for November 1982. The signature of this agreement is an eloquent translation of the fruitful cooperation that exists between the two friendly nations. This report is being sent from Riyadh, Kingdom of Saudi Arabia, on 1 July 1980. [Excerpts] [Conakry HOROYA in French 24-25 Jul 80 p 3] 9238

ECONOMIC AGREEMENT WITH PRC--An important protocol was signed yesterday, Wednesday evening, on which economic and technical agreements are to be based, between our country and the PRC [People's Republic of China]. The signing took place in the conference room of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and of International Cooperation. Comrade Saikou Barry, minister of banks and insurance, initialed the documents for Guinea. He was accompanied by comrades Seydouba Yattara, Bangaly Dabo and Kemoko Gbemou, respectively principal private secretary, head of the Policy Division, and head of the Agreements Section, all of the Foreign Affairs Department. His Excellency the Ambassador of China, also accompanied by his closest advisers, signed for his government. It is pointed out that these agreements, a product of the sino-Guinean relations entered into at the dawn of our independence, involve a credit, at no interest and with no attached conditions, totaling 50 million people's yuans over the period 1 July 1980 to 30 June 1985. This credit is to cover the major portion of the necesary expenditures accruing to projects covered by previous credits under the economic and technical cooperation agreements signed in Peking and Conakry by the two governments in 1966. FIRM CITED AS EXAMPLE OF AID TO NATIONAL ECONOMY

Nairobi TAIFA LEO in Swahili 11 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial: "This Is Development"]

[Text] The economic development of a country like Kenya usually depends on various industrial enterprises. Enterprises like these are expected, often, to discover how they will be profitable and to make the country prosperous by also providing more work places for the citizens to help them to improve their standards of living.

But it is surprising that some of those with considerable capital do not appreciate a situation like this. For some people with capital their need usually is personal profit without considering the economy of the country, where instead of seeking means of expanding their business, or establishing new industries, for the benefit of the community, they want only to seek markets for foreign goods.

But also here in the country there are some very few examples of companies like the House of Manji group which appreciates Kenya's economic development.

This company was established during the second world war when its founder, Madatally Manji, purchased for himself a small bakery in Ngara District, Nairobi. At this time some Italian prisoners were in the country, but they lacked the kind of food they were used to. Thus, Madatally took this opportunity to produce this food. Later, he expanded his business and after the war he went to Europe to study how to operate a bakery.

This enabled him to establish an independent in the country and later he joined with other traders and opened the Whitehouse Bakery which was on the road now called Haile Selassie Avenue. By 1949 this bakery was baking 25,000 loaves of bread every day.

During the time of the dangerous situation [presumably Mau Mau revolt], which was propagated by imperialists in the country, when some merchants gave up hope and closed their enterprises, Madatally established the House of Manji whose success was a good example of industrial development in the country. Apart from baking loaves of bread this company is also producing biscuits and this has been its task since this time.

Now this company has strengthened itself greatly and is using its profit for further development and for expanding its enterprises. Also it has tried to improve agriculture to obtain more wheat, which is being used in loaves of bread and biscuits. This company has helped also to improve the work of producing equipment which is used to load its goods. This is the spirit of economic development which is required in the country. Other companies must try to the extent possible to imitate this good example, because it has the objective of producing stability in the national economy. Now this industry is hiring many citizens and also providing for thousands of citizens their means of subsistence as a result of its work.

But the merchants who do not understand this matter deserve to be criticized for interrupting the development of our economy.

We say bravo to the House of Manji, which the day before yesterday celebrated their 25th year of helping to strengthen Kenya economically.

TRAORE INTERVIEWED ON FORTHCOMING PARTY CONGRESS

AB192100 Bamako Domestic Service in French 1500 GMT 19 Sep 80

[Text] Preparations are under way for the extraordinary party congress. It will be recalled that in his Circular No 256, the secretary general requested that all the branches submit to the central executive bureau their proposals for the amendment of the statutes and internal regulations of the electoral code and the constitution by 15 September, the deadline. Four days after the expiration of the deadline, the secretary general of the UDPM [Malian People's Democratic Union], General Moussa Traore, gave an interview to the National Press:

[Begin recording] [Question by unidentified journalist] Mr secretary general, the Malian People's Democratic Union is over 1 year old now. In your opinion, what are the major problems that the party has been confronted with up to this point?

[Answer] I have already pointed out that the UDPM is a young party; it is less than 2 years old. The party, the vehicle for the mobilization of our people, their intellectual capacities and their energies for national reconstruction, after devoting itself to bringing our country back to a normal constitutional life, found itself, as is always the case in the evolution of all political organizations, confronted with some evils that called for caution on our part, namely, the sceptism of some people, the (?assent) of others and the indifference of those who did not believe in it, not to mention the hostility of the enemies of our party. Having become more than a reality, the UDPM, the budding meltingpot and the life forces of the nation, was bound to be the target of criticism. Some of this criticism was constructive, but some, unfortunately, was not well intentioned. It was negative because it only put forward slogans and cliches that did not square with any reality or any truth.

The main difficulty with which the UDPM has been confronted is undeniably the crisis of confidence resulting from what I will call a loss of hope in the future stemming from the bitterness and disappointment left in the trail of the practices of the former regime. To these scars left by the former regime must be added 10 years of political inactivity, which made the work of mobilization difficult. All these realities led to the decision which you well know, namely, that of holding an extraordinary congress for the purpose of initiating all the necessary corrections that will permit effective mobilization of all the militants and give new impetus to the party. The extraordinary congress will be the occasion for our people to make the UDPM an incomparable tool of development.

[Question] Mr secretary general, will the resolutions which the extraordinary congress may adopt be able to initiate changes in the constitution of Mali and her (future)?

[Answer] All the resolutions adopted by the congress will have executive force. It is certain that the constitution will be revised if the implementation of the resolutions calls for that. This revision will be in conformity with the pertinent provisions of the constitution.

[Question] Mr secretary general, will the amendments to the organic texts of the party which will be adopted by the extraordinary congress bring about important changes in its structures?

[Answer] In the first place your question is a bit [word indistinct] and ambiguous. What do you mean by strctures? Does that mean a change of structure in relation to administrative structures or changes in the authorities? If there must be changes at any level at all, they will not be de facto but rather de jure, in accordance with the prescribed statutory provisions. Moreover, the various circulars addressed to the committees of the subbranches and branches on holding regular general meetings and conferences in order to discuss democratically possible amendments to the statutes and internal regulations of the constitution and the electoral code are quite explicit. The circulars point out the need to search for adequate solutions to the problems that confront the party in accordance with the terms of references given to the central executive bureau by the national council during its ordinary session of 8-12 April 1980. The circulars in question stress the actions to be undertaken to fill in the identified gaps in order to give the statutes and internal regulations of the party more stability and therefore more effectiveness. There is, therefore, no exemption; everything is subject to change. [End recording]

MMM HAS REJECTED STALINISM

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 28 Jul 80 pp 5-6

[Interview with Paul Berenger, MMM Reader--date and place not given]

> [Text] What is the direction in which the MMM is evolving? This question, as has been seen, is assuredly one which has aroused considerable interest. A change in tactics or in depth? Opinions vary. Furthermore the question will come up again in a few weeks, this time at a meeting of the party's regional delegates.
> What has changed? What has not? To find out more, the MAURICIEN chose to interview Mr Paul Berenger once again, first about his own ideological choices, those of his party, and about other aspects of the policy of a possible MMM government. For two hours on Thursday Mr Berenger received our chief editor, Lindsay Riviere, and Alain Gordon-Gentil. Here are the main points of this talk, which we are publishing in two sections.

[Question] Paul Berenger, quite a bit of confusion surrounds the current debate with respect to the orientation of the MMM. This confusion stems, in a large measure, from the fact that the MMM wants to be, on the one hand, the meeting place of often very different ideological tendencies, and, on the other hand, a political current different from what is found elsewhere, and therefore not subject to easy categorizations. We will come back to this in detail, but what interests us at the outset of this conversation is your personal evolution which we believe is a determining factor in the general evolution of the MMM. It has been said of you, even in our own columns, that you are an orthodox Marxist-Leninist. We think that you have, from the beginning, been a leftist in the very exact sense of the term. And besides, you defended leftism in 1975, after having stated that Mauritius "will be the first country where leftism will find itself in power" legally. So, are you an orthodox Marxist-Leninist, a neo-Marxist which realities cause to evolve, a leftist who is losing his illusions, or just simply an opportunist?

[Answer] I will remind you, first of all, that as the leader of the MMM I have not been the general secretary all the while since 1969. I feel that I am the one who is in the least favorable position to talk about myself, about my evolution. I leave to others the job of evaluating my personal evolution since 1968-1969. What I can say is that in my personal life there is one thing that I consider absolutely basic: an incessant quest for lucidity. This requirement for lucidity carried as far as possible, just as much where international politics are concerned as where political theories are concerned or where my personal life itself is concerned, guides me in everything that I do. At the same time I force myself to take a good dose of humor regarding life in general, in spite of all that is tragic and unbearable about it. And in particular I make an effort to be myself, to discover all aspects of myself. That enables me to understand how, despite the fact that I believe deeply in some things, I keep a distance with respect to those things, which is explainable through the lucidity that I am talking about and that I demand of myself.

I said so at the conference the other day, and since you ask me to talk about myself--which I do not like to do--I will tell you that we are, I am, a child of May 1968 and the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Soviet tanks. I feel that that makes it possible to place me. May 1968, I specify, added to that invasion of Czechslovakia, that was the birth point of a new socialism in life, in creativity, in spontaneity, in laughter, in joy, but also, as I was saying a while ago, in lucidity, above all in face of the Eastern bloc.

Lucidity in face of the American role in Viet Nam and elsewhere had preceded by some months, if not by some years, that lucidity which the invasion of Czechoslovakia imposed on all of us young socialists in May 1968. I was in Paris in May 1968, and that certainly and deeply left its mark on me. I remind you that one of the first political demonstrations of an international nature in Mauritius was organized by my friends and me in May 1968, when, near the Rose-Hill statium, we, youngsters that we were, waved placards of two kinds: one denouncing the aggression of the Americans in Viet Nam and demanding their withdrawal, and the other denouncing the invasion of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union.

[Question] How did you take the Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia? As a betrayal?

[Answer] No, not only as a betrayal. But as the coronation of betrayal. There is a fundamental difference. I will say that we did not discover anything, we of May 1968, about the nature of the Soviet regime. There were others before us. I can quote a list of men who died for having understood the USSR before we did. Men who spent time in prison, who died and who were deported well before the children of 1968, and who therefore had discovered the truth about the USSR. That is why I will say that it was rather the coronation of betrayal.

[Question] May 1968, that is the big leftist holiday!

[Answer] That is where I am not especially fond of labels. That is what upset Herve Masson at the time when I came on with a heavy dose of leftist provocation (as I very often do in my statements) to get certain people all riled up, beginning with the Soviets. If you call being leftist all the socialists who turn away from the Eastern model, and who want (especially since May 1968) throughout the world, in the third world, in France, in Spain, in Italy and elsewhere, to invent a new way towards socialism, that way which we call "self-managing socialism," then yes, I am a leftist! But if you mean by "leftist" somebody who is always skidding off base, always dreaming, then no, definitely not!

[Question] Leftism is above all characterized by emphasis on spontaneity, decentralization.

[Answer] That is where I am a leftist!

[Question] And what remains of all that after eleven years?

[Answer] Everything, but also everything remains to be done. And, wanted or not, it is getting done throughout the world. Socialism of this type is developing, is taking root, is preparing the future.

[Question] How do you live as in 68?

[Answer] Not, in any case, within the framework of a party. But rather in the outburst of life which takes everything in its wake, including the parties that were in deep in the current of 1968. The SP was on the sideline and it got carried away by this current, and today it still is, more than ever. Moreover, that, while on the subject, is the importance of May 1968 for France, for the socialist parties. As for me, I went through May 1968 like the consecration of everything that I had discovered throughout the months, the years which had preceded, and which therefore had produced an awareness, especially regarding the peoples of the East.

[Question] How does a leftist look at the Marxist-Leninists of the Soviet Union?

[Answer] You are using the Marxist-Leninist label in a way that could get you into serious trouble with the Soviets because the Soviets swear by orthodox Marxism, whereas traditionally they reserve the term, Marxist-Leninist, for the ex-Maoists. Figure out where you stand in the middle of all that now that China has moved ahead by several steps, after a big swing in you know what direction. The distinction has to be made between those who still cling to "orthodox socialism" as it still lives, or rather as it is surviving in the East, and those who want to go by a "self-managing socialism" with all sorts of shades of meaning, which is what I myself go by. This distinction is basic, not only in terms of approach and of ideology, of ideological thought, but also in terms of political practice. It is this attitude regarding Soviet Marxism, Soviet "communism," that is currently raising a lot of problems for the left in France, in Spain, in Portugal, in the entire world.

[Question] At the Hall movie theater on Sunday you were talking about a "break" with that kind of Marxism.

[Answer] I was indeed provoking several times! I had quoted Rocard. I quote him to you again from a page in a small book that is worth reading: "What is Social Democracy?" with a number of socialist French authors. Rocard writes that "when we talk about socialism, about a double bypassing of Stalinism and social democracy, it is probably necessary for us to avoid confusion. In face of Stalinism, of the totalitarian fact, it is not possible to reason in terms of bypassing, but rather of breaking completely. Our divergence with social democracy, whatever it may be, cannot have the same meaning as the one which makes us object to Stalinism." We took up that difference again to show clearly that for us, the MMM, it is a matter of our leaning on what already exists to perfect democracy, therefore to get beyond social democracy, the more or less wobbly parliamentary democracy which exists but all the same contains the seeds, the elements of democracy, whereas, as Rocard says, in face of the totalitarian bloc of the East, it is no longer possible to talk about bypassing, the talk has to be about breaking completely. I do not need to remind you that at this very time when the Olympic games are going on, I am more interested in the workers who are struggling in Russia than I am in the intellectuals, even though I do not want to diminish their role in any way. But while the Olympic games are taking place, workers attempting to form unions independent of Soviet power are getting deported, as are feminists, intellectuals, etc. I therefore approve the distinction that Rocard makes between the Stalinist totalitarian bloc that must be bypassed, simply leaving it behind, and social democracy which must be bypassed, making it more democratic and perfecting it.

[Question] You yourself were in Moscow three or four years ago. How did that confirm or change your ideas?

[Answer] In no way. Basically in no way! When you go to Moscow, you do not see much of anything except what the officials are willing to let you see. It is quite possible that the language problem and other reasons have something to do with it when you are an official guest. I have been to Moscow twice. One time there was a lot of snow; so I saw much snow on the corners of the streets. Another time you could see many people on the corners of the streets, and in the streets I did not see many smiles.

The deep-down, fundamental cracks in the Soviet system cannot be seen with the naked eye.

[Question] In 68 you experienced what you call revolutionary romanticism, that is a definite interest in different new experiences, a definite interest in the cultural revolution, in China, in different socialist experiences. Today, 11 years later, how do you look at these different experiences?

[Answer] I do not believe that I ever was, at any time, one of those people who placed all their hopes on Cuba or on the China of that period, and the main current, the majority of May 68, did not swear by such models. To be sure, hope being so necessary to the human animal, many people hoped that hope was continuing to live somewhere and to get nourishment from itself and its accomplishments. But in any case May 68 was not above all a reference to a foreign experience. May 68 was the explosion of life; it was life developing in liberty, in creativity.

We got our inspiration, none the less, not only from May 68, but also, and deeply, from the rise of the third world, from decolonization, etc. So after having spoken about these beginnings, what I should like to add is that during the 10 or 11 years that have followed, as for me, I have forced myself to follow closely in political terms all of the experiences that have developed in other countries, the problems, the successes, with the same lucidity that I was talking about earlier. Thus while it may be that many hopes have been deferred, hope certainly is not dead. The self-managing socialist experience, from my point of view, is functioning everywhere in the world. Whether it is in the Third World, in Western countries, wherever it is, that force of the people at the base shows up everywhere. Therefore I do not think that many failures, many deferred hopes must bring on a disillusionment, a pessimism which I reject.

[Question] In LE MAURICIEN we have put forward a certain number of explanations of your personal evolvement, particularly that starting in 1973 you seem, after a "rethinking," to be correcting all of the general strategy of the MMM, adopting a fixed electoral line which, furthermore, follows a certain democratization of public life after 74, 75, 76. In short, the conditions of a certain traditional democratic game.

[Answer] Very true. Absolutely true! I will not contradict that at all, but I want to take advantage of the opportunity to provide a clarification. It is true that there has been a basic change between the MMM of 68-69 and the one of today. The change must have come about, as far as I can remember, around 1970. In the 68-69 period, where we were concerned, the whole gang was totally rotten. It was necessary to destroy the whole gang and start again from zero. I mean the neocolonial and dictatorial society. I will not forget that at that time we had just gone through some communal scuffles, through the putting off of the general elections, the betrayal coalition. Our personal convictions then were based on direct democracy, which we call self-management. Our convictions were confirmed by Mauritian reality, where neocolonialism reigned, where communal division was tearing the country apart, where democracy was deeply violated with the putting off of elections and the betrayal coalition. But from the outset, I point out to you the clarification that I wanted to make: from the outset, when we brought fully back into question that parliamentary pseudodemocracy that we were talking about (and which at that time was really a parliamentary pseudodemocracy), we were bringing it fully back into question with all the enthusiasm of the young leftists that we were, but we were not bringing the whole shebang into question to submit ourselves to the East. Not at all! On the contrary, from the time of our first writings, we were bringing everything into question with reference to self-management, to direct democracy, which at that time was immediately to assume an ideal form in Mauritius. I remind you of an example in our first document: democracy was really supposed to be a pyramid of democratic life. That is village and city councils electing an assembly representative who in turn would elect another executive, with the whole thing being revokable at any time, etc. The mistake was going at top speed in the direction of democracy. Anyhow that scared certain people, and that I can well understand! Finally there was the country's evolution towards the elections of December 76. Whatever anybody says in the end about Ramgoolam--and you know how critical I am regarding Ramgoolam--the country could have and unfortunately still can take an entirely different direction, can take the direction of a real dictatorship. Let at least that be said to the credit of Ramgoolam, who stirred the country up towards the general elections of December 76! Since then in Mauritius a real parliamentary democracy has existed, with its defects, with its limitations, but all the same it exists: which could have not been the case!

[Question] After three years of parliamentarism, do you feel that the present parliamentary framework allows the socialist action that you envisage?

[Answer] I am obliged to come back with all the force of which I am capable to an absolutely total commitment on our part. That is to say, to go all the way to the general elections in a fully legal way, to rise to power only through legal channels; once in power strictly to respect legality and the constitution (naturally with leeway to amend it by virtue of the written clauses already in the constitution, etc); therefore, to govern in a strictly legal framework, in respect for liberties, in pluralism, and to respect even more fundamentally the possibility of rotation in power.

That is to say, we commit ourselves absolutely formally to coming back in front of the population five years later and saying: "Here is what we promised to do; here is what we have succeeded in doing, taking into account the majority from which we benefitted, and here is what we are proposing to you to do during the next five years; it is up to you to choose." This commitment is absolutely total, and thus it is in this sense that we respect the existing parliamentary institution, on the off chance of having to make some adjustments to make it more democratic.

[Question] Today if you had the possibility of spending a day with one or several politicians of international status to discuss socialism and the world's future, which one or which ones would you choose?

[Answer] I already regularly have the opportunity, and I shall again have the opportunity, to have discussions with country leaders whom I consider to be of very, very high stature, like Ratsiraka or Rene. I consider myself today as a personal friend of Ratsiraka's, and naturally we talk over the current situation of the world, the world's survival, the world's future, etc. Apart from that I never miss an opportunity to meet all politicians, wherever they come from.

To talk about the world, we Maritians, who are of the third world, to talk about the major problems and finally the world's survival, to talk about the North-South dialogue and conflict, about the future of the third world, about international chaos, about South Africa, about the Middle East, about the militarization of the Indian Ocean, it is much more stimulating, interesting, enriching to have discussions with Ratsiraka, Rene, Ms Gandhi, with President Nyerere and what have you! That is why I recently let it be understood that the MMM has decided fundamentally in favor of a Mauritian way towards socialism, which will get its inspirations from the successes as well as from the mistakes of other countries, including those of the third world.

ADDITIONAL DISCUSSION OF CHANGES IN MMM POLITICAL IDEOLOGY

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 8 Aug 80 pp 5-6

[Text] In a long interview granted to LE MAURICIEN the secretary general of the MMM plunges into a new attempt to explain the positions that he has taken, and does so between an ideological convention and an assembly of the regional delegates of the party on the same topic. The remarks made during this interview, alas! only add to the impression of general confusion which the MMM produces, and do not convince anybody.

For ten years the MMM has mobilized debate and occupied ideological grounds, insuring the indoctrination of its basic militants in cells in the manner of a traditional communist party, steeping them in class struggle ideas and in the proletariat's vanguard role.

Today the secretary general of the MMM makes one think of a high priest breaking his idols and their altars. What makes Mr Berenger burn today what he worshiped yesterday? Essentially two things.

The MMM filled its tank on the extreme left while leading the MMMSP; the other small groups, such as MCPS, automatically aline themselves according to the positions taken by the big brother party.

The party functions admirably on the Stalinian principle of democratic centralism. The MMM is again a unanimous party. (Oh, Bizlall! Oh, Virah Sawmy!) The general secretary's theses take the place of thought; the general secretary pompously proclaims: "I am the thought of the left."

The result of all this is that the MMM's "hinterland," its hunting ground, is henceforth located on its right and includes the non-Marxist left, left center and all of the progress democrats.

Holding forth with a speech that does not correspond to its political thought, the MMM is living through an identity crisis; hence incoherence and contradictions.

It is a good thing to clarify the MMM's stance, starting with basic principles.

I. Marxism

Perhaps not everybody is a Marxist encyclopedia. But everybody knows that Marxism presents itself first of all as a concept of the world and a doctrine aimed at transforming the world.

R. P. Calvez in "Karl Marx's Thought" describes it as "a complete system of man, nature and history."

Marxism comprises a philosophy which is dialectical materialism, a theory of history which is historical materialism, an economic theory and a policy.

Of course, neither Marx nor Ingels described Marxism in four distinct phases: philosophy, history, economics and politics, and this partitioning is artificial.

Thus the Marxist theory of economics cannot be studied without letting loose the conclusions which interest the proletariate: that is to say economics flow into politics.

It is this economic-political dimension which quite obviously comes under this debate.

It is this reference to Marxist economics which the general secretary of the MMM withdraws in his concern about being reassuring at all costs.

What does the MMM choose to put us on the wrong track? The label, leftist!

II. Leftism

Mr Berenger's interlocutors declare to him right off, starting with their first question: "We believe that you have been, since the beginning, 'leftist' in the very precise sense of the word." A loaded question par excellence, for there is nothing more imprecise than leftism.

Leftism includes the Maoists just as much as it does the Trotskyists, the Leninists, the anarchists, the independents, and many other noncatalogued sensitivites.

The general secretary of the MMM ascribes a leftist image to himself by affirming that he is "a child of May 1968. One of the main slogans of May 1968 was: "It is forbidden to forbid." However seductive this phrase may seem, in the dimensions which it attempt to give to the idea of Liberty, there is no way to avoid discovering an anarchist ferment in it. For such a philosophy runs down all principles of social organization and living in society.

It brings into question authority within the family, discipline at school, hierarchy at work, and religious prohibitings and taboos.

The arguments of alienation through family, school, work and religion of those who want to cancel out everything are well known.

It can be said of May 1968 that it was nothing but an "epiphenomenon," as Georges Pompidou wrote ("The Gordian Knot") or, as Maurice Clavel put it, that it was a "cultural earthquake." Leftism includes as much as anybody could want in the way of sensitivity, spiritual states, ways of life, exacerbated libidos, anomy; everything except an economic framework. Now, that is exactly the essence of the debate for a country in the process of development. Economics for the leftist is contained in the May 1968 slogan: "Property is theft."

It is unknown whether the general secretary of the MMM is being cynical or provoking when he affirms that he is in favor "of a new socialism in life, in creativity, in spontaneity, in laughter, in joy," when the recent events of August 1979, among others, are recalled. Bergson must have overlooked some of the mechanisms of laughter and joy.

III. The Impossible Synthesis

The MMM advocates self-managing socialism as a "model of socialism in the process of developing, in the process of taking root, in the process of preparing the future," claiming to bring about in that way a synthesis between socialism of Marxist inspiration and self-managing of libertarian or leftist inspiration.

Now, that is the MMM's dangerous illusion.

Let us quote Mr Pierre Livet and Mr Andre Oraison in their study on the MMM which appeared in the "Almanac of the Countries of the Indian Ocean" (p 91).

Talk about Utopia. Mauritius is still an underdeveloped country concerning which it can be affirmed that it has no room for "libertarian socialism," mastery of which the West has not even succeeded in insuring, inasmuch as the Chilean experience tends, on the contrary, to prove that synthesis is difficult--or indeed impossible--between pure Marxism and humanist socialism.

It can likewise be said that the act of setting up rigorous procedures of semidirect democracy and preaching total self-managing can only lead to dangerous overflowings through the base. And it might be added that the "human dimension" of Mauritius undoubtedly is not altogether unrelated to the blossoming out of a certain amount of Rousseau-like daydreaming."

The MMM's "self-managing socialism" is not a dialectical synthesis, but simply an antithetical formula, simply a contrast of opposites which do not make each other fertile.

On the practical level, the only known examples of attempts to achieve a socialism approaching the MMM's arguments, the Ujamaas' Tanzania and Algeria, and the leaders of these countries are having second thoughts about their illusions.

And so, the affirmation of the general secretary of the MMM, "The socialist self-managing experiment, to my way of thinking, is functioning throughout the world," is not only erroneous; it reveals the ingenuousness and irresponsibility of the statements of a political figure due, in some people's eyes, to rise to power.

IV. Being or Appearing

From this fundamental difficulty of "reconciling the irreconcilable" come all of the incoherences of the MMM's political thought. The spoken words do not correspond to reality any longer. There is complete imbalance between remarks and facts.

Thus, with respect to the very identity of the MMM, Mr Livet and Mr Oraison write: (p 57) "As Herve Masson wrote, one of the ideologists of the movement, the MMM is more a front than a party. In it can be found Marxist-Leninists, orthodox Leninists, libertarian Marxists, just plain libertarians and others whose ideology remains unclear."

Lindsay Riviere speaks of a "melting pot" which "strikes a balance in the reflection of the various components of the party, the traditional ideological references (Marxism, third-worldism, ecologists, leftists)."
The general secretary approves: "The MMM is, in fact, a front. It always was, and it still is."

But what is the cement that holds this mosaic together?

Let us quote Mr Livet and Mr Oraison in their study of the MMM (P 58): "It is obvious that a single and unique cement solidly links all of these tendencies: class struggle. For the MMM that is a constant which is beyond questioning and which constitutes the very foundation of its policy.

There is nothing more fundamentally Marxist than class struggle." The general secretary of the MMM goes further: (LE MAURICIEN 29 Jul 1980): "What keeps us united in the MMM is above all our party's constitution. Chapter I of our constitution contains all of the essential references, that is our sources of ideological inspirtation, the model of the society that we want to build."

On this subject, let us refer to the comments of Mr Livet and Mr Oraison (p 52): "On the level of general principles, the Mauritian Militant Movement advocates a total break with capitalism; it has no intention whatever of being content to manage it."

And further on (p 53):

"In economy matters, the MMM foresees the setting up of an effective planning service enabling the state to keep its hands on the levers of the economy" and also (p 53): "Nationalizations represent another of the major objectives of the MMM, fitting quite well into the global framework of class struggle."

Break with capitalism, collective appropriation of means of production, class struggle, these are fundamentally and essentially Marxist themes. Why does the MMM refuse to acknowledge its Marxist inspiration? We have had an opportunity to bring to light the tactical reason behind this measure. When today, through the mouth of its general secretary, the MMM upholds talk (reformist) which does not correspond to its nature (Marxist), the conclusion to be reached is an identity crisis or a disguise.

For us there is not the slightest doubt that nature comes out on top and the talk is circumstantial. By wanting to appear to be something that it is not, the MMM is behaving like a political transvestite.

Incoherences and Contradictions

Out of this identity crisis of the MMM, this voluntary refusal to assume its own nature, flows a series of incoherences and contradictions.

1. Political Economy

Through a bewildering acrobatic feat the MMM went from a "break with capitalism" linked to a "search for a new socialism" to a "break with Stalinism" and "a perfecting of social democracy," the latter being the basic attainment.

We quote the general secretary of the MMM (LE MAURICIEN of Monday 28 July 1980): "In face of Stalinism, of the totalitarian fact, it is not possible to reason in terms of bypassing, but rather of breaking completely."

"Our divergence with social democracy, whatever it may be, cannot have the same meaning as the one which makes us object to Stalinism."

And further on:

"...social democracy which must be bypassed, making it more democratic and perfecting it."

When it is known that social democracy's ambition is to reform capitalism, you can see just how far you are from the "break with capitalism" which is a part of the MMM's manifesto itself, and to which the MMM says it is still attached.

It is also important to note that the general secretary of the MMM wants to put in a good word for Jean Ellenstein's argument to the effect that Stalinism (the totalitarian fact) is a historical perversion of Marxism, whereas for Bernard-Henri Levy ("Barbary with a Human Face") or Andre Glucksmann ("The Cook and the Maneater, the Master Thinkers") Marxism carries within itself totalitarian poison.

2. Nationalization-Conversion to State Control

The general secretary of the MMM states that MMM nationalizations "will not be nationalizations-conversions to state control" to the extent that the management of current business will be left up to the employees. It is hard to see how the state, holding the capital and controlling by means of rigid planning production, investments and self-management, can bring about a certain flexibility. And there is no need to specify that all that does not evolve as market economy.

3. Attitude Regarding Soviet Imperialism

As Proof of his "lucidity" regarding the Soviet regime, the general secretary of the MMM mentions the demonstration organized in 1968 against the invasion of Czechoslovakia. But in 1980 the MMM was curiously absent from the demonstration in front of the Soviet embassy against intervention in Afghanistan. And further still today, while Afghan resistance is being bombarded continually and Afghan villages are being wiped off of the map by the Soviet offensive, the MMM keeps quiet even as it devotes all its efforts to arguing against the means of defense which the West is setting up in the Indian Ocean.

4. Economic Management

The MMM is changing its economic options upon discovering in 1980--hold tight!--the techniques of administration, budgetary mechanisms, financial control, management methods accounting analysis, and naively admits its wonderment. On reflecting that all that constitutes the daily intake of the merest student of economics, one truly wonders how much weight can be given to the competence of the MMM's leaders and to the seriousness of their analysis.

That is what is known as training on the spot...and late in the day!

The Archipelago

We shall not do the general secretary of the MMM the injustice of believing that--as Monsieur Jourdain did with prose--he practices Marxism-Leninsim without knowing it.

The play that is being performed right in front of our eyes is not "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme"; it is "Tartuffe."

An objective analysis of the argument maintained today by the general secretary of the MMM fully demonstrates that there is a flagrant contradiction between the MMM's innermost thoughts and its rhetoric.

In case of an ultimate rise to power by the MMM, considering the lack of seriousness in its analyses, its incoherences and its contradictions, and the fragility of its economic theses, nothing in the country's situation will change--particularly the economic situation.

Indeed, everything is certainly bought to get worse when the parade of nationalization-state control measures starts to be applied.

There will then be, quite naturally, a bringing back into question by the population, of the MMM's competence and its ability to manage. Which will be interpreted by our master thinkers as "reactionary maneuvers," "rightist plots," or "attempts at destabilization."

And the result will be the well-known procession of controls, restrictions, constraints and coercion with the mobilization of the base and getting or not getting the aid of foreign troops.

Then our island will have become an Archipelago.

ISSUE OF RODRIGUES SECESSION DISCUSSED

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 22 Aug 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] Is it necessary to dismember the Mauritian national territory further, after the Chagos Islands and Tromelin?

Yes, says the PMSD [Mauritian Social Democratic Party], if the MMM wins power in Mauritius in the next general elections. "If the people of Rodrigues vote against the MMM and the PMSD elects its two deputies, I would urge secession," the leader of this party, Gaetan Duval, said in effect yesterday in an interview granted to LE MAURICIEN. He went on to say that in his view the MMM is a "communist" party and the people of Rodrigues should not be forced to live under a "communist" regime "if they do not want it." This statement made by Mr Duval yesterday provoked profound indignation in the ranks of the political parties and the government. "Any incitement to Rodrigues to secede, any encouragement of the dismembering of Mauritian territory, any attack on the territorial integrity of the nation under any circumstances and under any political regime whatsoever would be an act of high treason pure and simple," the Labor Party, the MMM and the PSM responded.

We were unable to reach the leader of the Organization of the Rodrigues People (OPR), Serge Clair, by telephone, but it is known that this party does not urge the secession of Rodrigues, but only greater autonomy on the administrative level, with the island remaining within the Mauritian state. The OPR has expressed willingness to work with any government which might win power in Mauritius.

The PMSD is thus the sole party which foresees a possible dismembering of the Mauritian territorial heritage to allow Rodrigues to secede. Even its partner in the coalition, the Labor Party, does not perceive such a possibility if the MMM wins power in Mauritius.

Minister of Education Khersing Jagatsingh, who is secretary general of the Labor Party, told LE MAURICIEN this morning that he was profoundly indignant on reading Mr Duval's statement yesterday.

"This is a very serious business. It is a question of an anti-national statement on the part of Mr Duval. Personally, I think that there is also here a negation of the parliamentary system and of democracy. I must emphasize that even if the MMM wins power in the coming general elections, I will remain in Mauritius to continue to aid the advance of my country as best I can. I condemn any statement reflecting childishness and lack of political vision. One must not be a coward and seek to flee, for many people have placed their hope in us."

Mr Jagatsingh added forcefully:

"Any incitement to secession, to the dismembering of our territorial heritage, would represent an act of treason which we could not and would not allow. Such irresponsibility is intolerable."

Paul Berenger, secretary general of the MMM, for his part, commented as follows:

"We in the MMM regard this as an extremely serious matter. So serious that we are holding an emergency press conference today to denounce what we believe to be an incitement to the dismembering of the country. For us, to urge secession is the equivalent of an act of high treason. We will today face the individuals affiliated with the PMSD, i.e. Ramgoolam, Boolell, Guimbeau and the others, with their responsibilities. We will also appeal to all the patriots in this country to frustrate any suggestion that a part of our territory secede."

The number-three man in the government, Sir Satcam Boolell, who was also questioned by LE MAURICIEN this morning, was reluctant to comment on Mr Duval's statement straight off. He believes however that the statement is of a very serious nature, but that Rodrigues will not secede. Sir Satcam preferred "not to take seriously" this statement by Mr Gaetan Duval.

In the ranks of the PSM, very keen indignation was also provoked by Mr Duval's "little comment." Mr Kishore Deerpalsingh, speaking on behalf of the party, told LE MAURICIEN this morning that Rodrigues "is an integral part of the national territory on the same basis as any other region in the country, such as Curepipe, Rose-Hill or Vieux Grand Port.

"Thus if we follow the ridiculous reasoning of the PSD leader, we could say that if Curepipe or any other region in the country voted for PMSD deputies in the coming elections, that region should secede from the Mauritian state," Mr Deerpalsingh commented. "In our view in the PSM, any incitement to a part of the national territory to secede would be the equivalent of an act of high treason. The PMSD is a part of the government and as such should not have been the author of any such statement. The PMSD should on the contrary wage a battle to safeguard the territorial integrity of the country under all circumstances. We hope that the Labor Party, the partner of the PMSD in the coalition, will react energetically to the statements by Mr Duval and will oust the PMSD from the coalition government."

The PSM, Mr Deerpalsingh explained, thinks that "if the Labor Party does not react as it should to the position taken by the PMSD, this would constitute tacit approval of Mr Duval's position.

"What the PSM proposes for Rodrigues," Mr Deerpalsingh went on to say, "is an island council which would have district council status in order to allow the people of Rodrigues to exercise the authority, in full independence, necessary for the administration of their island within the framework of the Mauritian state. Secession is not a solution to the Rodrigues problem."

PMSD leader Gaetan Duval flew to Rodrigues this morning, where he will remain until Sunday. This visit is of a "private" nature, according to those in the entourage of the PMSD leader.

PSM LEADER CHALLENGES PRIME MINISTER

Port Louis THE NATION in French 11 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Mr Harish Boodhoo, the leader of the PSM, challenged the prime minister again yesterday morning. Responding to Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam, who had said during a press conference that he was prepared to make Diego Garcia an electoral platform issue in his district, Mr Boodhoo said that if partial elections were reestablished, he was prepared to challenge the prime minister for his seat. The electorate would then have an opportunity to express its view on the secession of Diego Garcia.

Mr Boodhoo emphasized the contradictory statements made by the various spokesmen of the government on this question, arguing that these contradictions illustrate the attitude of the regime.

It was at a regional congress of the PSM in Triolet that Mr Boodhoo took advantage of the opportunity to announce that he had sent petitions to the governor general and the head of the civil service pertaining to the political involvement of a civil servant.

FIVE CITIES TO HOLD MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS

Port Louis THE NATION in French 9 Aug 80 p 1

[Text] Municipal elections will be held next November in the five cities of the country, to-wit Port Louis, Beau-Bassin/Rose-Hill, Quatre Bornes, Vacoas/Phoenix and Curepipe. This decision was adopted yesterday by the Council of Ministers to put an end to the administrative instability in certain towns since the administrative commissions were appointed last December. The date for the municipal elections will be established later by the electoral commissioner, by decree of the minister of local government.

The last municipal elections in Mauritius were held in April 1977, and they should have been held again last December. However, for financial reasons, the government decided to postpone them, in particular since the country was harshly affected by hurricanes and floods. Meanwhile, the administrative commissions were set up, but the results achieved in municipal administration were not positive.

We should note that the last municipal elections came after the general elections in 1976. But the elections this coming November will be held 13 months prior to the December 1981 popular consultation, barring unforeseen developments.

READER COMPLAINS ABOUT SERVICES INEFFICIENCY AFTER INDEPENDENCE

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 p 50

[Article by Joaquim Luis Madeira, Mexixine, Zambezia: "Some Basic Observations"]

[Excerpts] In the District of Namacura, Province of Zambezia, there is a political subdivision called Mexixine or Vila Candida, halfway between the district seat and the administrative town of Macuse (Muibo Road) to which it is linked.

Inhabited by several thousand souls, Mexixine during colonial times experienced some of the most revolting expressions of colonialist exploitation, paralleled by the total absence of any benefits.

On the other hand, during colonial times, Mexixine never had a government school, it only had two missionaries; the only hospital (or, rather, first-aid station) was run by the two missionaries who, to tell the truth, got a lot out of it. Supplies were provided by the four private merchants who made every effort to supply their own homes where we had to go to do our purchasing, without any haggling or alternatives; that is where we obtained the daily necessities which we purchased with the miserable few escudos earned in the mines of South Africa which is where we were forced to go because of unemployment; or we had to swap our copra which many times was undervalued.

Today, after the triumph of the armed liberation struggle, in which many of our young people had joined, we are in the 5th year of our independence.

Now what do we find in Mexixine?

In terms of health care, we have gone back to zero. After nationalization, nobody bothered to continue the health care we had been getting. As a result, the most insignificant diseases eventually lead to death.

The well construction drive which the missionaries promoted strongly, lapsed into absolute silence. The initiative involving popular contributions to the construction of a hospital was stopped because the money we got was wasted.

As for our supplies, when the four private shopkeepers left, we were practically on our own.

It suffices to say that the people's stores developed with their own sad history although we never had any of them in Mexixine. As a result, we felt really abandoned, until soap turns to gold, as we say here, even though we did produce much copra; loin-cloths are becoming fashionable again, in addition to the indescribable shortage of other daily necessities. Nobody can guarantee us the shipment of our surpluses out of the area, except for some private individuals who have not yet purchased them and who sometimes are victims of reprisals by district officers.

To make the situation worse, there are certain work attitudes or methods (such as we call them) employed by some of our government officials which remind us of colonialism. For them, they prefer to threaten rather than mobilize us.

Their main concern is "to do away with religion in Mexixine" rather than organizing life and seeking prosperity for the people. This is why they prevent the celebration of Christmas by the Christians, in spite of the tolerance permitted. But they are not concerned with the miserable bridges and highways, nor do they encourage popular initiatives--if anything, they do the exact opposite. These officials forget that the fight against obscurantism is an ideological fight which cannot be won with merely administrative measures. They only create fanaticism in response.

But those officials act this way because they are convinced that Mexixine is the land of the backward, where nobody can report them for what they are doing which is why any work method is used and which is why they pick the easiest--threats and even aggression, in summary, prepotence. But they are mistaken and they are wrong. Are they not turning the fruits of liberty into bitterness?

In conclusion I would like to make it clear that, at the point where our people's political and organizational offensive is underway, Popular Vigilance in Mexixine should be denouncing the infiltrators, the incompetents, the negligent individuals, the saboteurs, and the opportunists who, in the name of the offensive, are exspoliating the assets of the people in order to take control of them, thus ruining the political content of that offensive.

VACATIONING STUDENTS FROM CUBA DEPLORE LACK OF CONTACT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Aug 80 p 5

[Article by Rogerio Sitol and Francisco Sinela]

[Text] "Emulation is a thermometer that registers each student's capacity for integration into society." That is what our reporters were told by one of the 16 Mozambican students who, along with many others, are studying in Cuba and who have been rewarded for their example and dedication to study with a trip to Mozambique.

On being questioned at the place where they are lodging, they emphasized that as a result of their commitment to all the educational, productive, and other activities that constitute a way of implementing one of the principles of socialist education--that of linking theory with practice--they were rewarded with a visit to their homeland, Mozambique.

Julia Inacio, a seventh-form student, said, "We were not the only ones honored in this campaign. There were others, but they did not come with us simply because of economic difficulties and the lack of transportation."

Concerning the results of their school work, it was concluded that the percentage of those passing was higher than last year. This demonstrates "the correct performance of the teaching personnel and the dedication of the students to the goal of studying more and more in less and less time," Julia Inacio also said. Parallel with that priority activity, the OJM [Mozambique Youth Organization] sponsors sporting and cultural events, principally but not solely in connection with commemorative dates. Sometimes Cuban young people and those from other countries also participate in those events.

How the Present Offensive Was Viewed

"We followed closely the offensive underway in our country by reading the newspaper NOTICIAS, the magazine TEMPO, and even the Cuban media. All of it stirs us considerably. To understand it better, sessions were organized for the study of documents concerning it, and this was reflected in the improvement of our organization and in application to our studies in order to meet the country's needs in a suitable manner." That is what Antonio Bartolomeu, a seventh-form student, speaking in response to questioning by our reporters, wanted to emphasize as the important thing in activity by our students in Cuba.

As another means of implementing some of the directives arising from the offensive, those students gave their attention to beautifying the facilities made available to us by Cuba. Flowers played an important role in this endeavor, with the result that medical clinics and other workplaces now have a better appearance than they had before.

Difficulty in Corresponding With Those at Home

Several difficulties were also mentioned by the group. Almost all of them, however, concerned contact by the students with their home country, relatives, and friends.

The delayed arrival of letters in that country--it takes several months for a letter to reach its destination--makes it difficult for the students to remain in contact with their country, but most serious is the fact that some relatives do not write regularly, and when they do, it is only for the purpose of announcing some misfortune or other.

The sector of the MEC [Ministry of Education and Culture] responsible for our students' stay abroad has emphasized on previous occasions that those young people show concern over the lack of sensitivity revealed by some relatives in not maintaining permanent contact with them. An indirect appeal is therefore being issued once again to all relatives of our young "ambassadors" to maintain permanent contact, something that is essential to their well-being.

We recall that 2,400 students are in that country. They are scattered among four secondary schools made available to Mozambique by the Cuban Government. This is the second visit of this kind. The first took place last year.

GENERAL STAFF CHIEF ON MILITARY OPERATIONS, MANEUVERS

Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 24 Aug 80 pp 26-29

[Interview with FPLM [Popular Forces for the Liberation of Mozambique] Chief of Staff Sebastiao Marcos Mabote by Arlindo Lopes: "Armed Forces Will always Accomplish Mission"]

[Text] "I would like to underscore the fact that our military maneuvers are being conducted within the context of the political and organizational offensive launched by our party's and government's supreme leadership; the important thing is to follow through on the watchword to "turn the weapons against the domestic enemy"--the forces of reaction who are trying to sabotage our revolution, including the bands armed by imperialism." When FPLM Chief of Staff Sebastiao Marcos Mabote made that statement to me, several days ago, in his office, at GHQ, about a month had passed since, throughout the country, the military operation was announced which finally led to the destruction of the main camp of the counterrevolutionary groups in the zone of Mossurize. In the midst of these military exercises, we asked this high-level leader of the FRELIMO Party and the government to give us a detailed analysis of the operation but the interview had to be postponed due to the situation. But one day, at the Beira airport, we happened to run across the FPLM Chief of Staff after the victory at Sitatonga II and an interview was definitely scheduled for Maputo. In this interview, Sebastiao Mabote draws a picture of the abnormal situation which developed in that frontier area; he analyzed the political-military operation of the FPLM and concluded with the following observation: "The offensive is permanent; we are permanently alert against any aggression. The armed forces will know how to accomplish their mission." Here are the questions and the answers.

[Question] What is the significance of the recent military operation in the frontier area of the province of Manica as far as the FPLM are concerned?

Sebastiao Mabote: First of all, I would like you to know that the military exercises conducted for a period of 2 months first of all had the essential objective of wiping out some armed bands which were operating along the border between Zimbabwe and Mozambique. These elements had infiltrated Mozambique after our independence, especially when we ordered sanctions against the British colony of Southern Rhodesia. These operations were primarily confined to certain areas, along the border, where they were operating for the purpose of destroying certain particularly economic targets in order to hinder the country's economic development.

But the basic point is that this type of military exercise is a general thing for us, in the People's Republic of Mozambique. With or without a physical enemy, we are conducting maneuvers in order to prepare our soldiers, to train our troops to operate in all kinds of terrain.

[Question] What phase is the operation in now?

Sebastiao Mabote: I am not going to say that the operation is still in progress but the exercises are underway now because we are responding to the order issued to the effect that we must participate in the political and organizational offensive now underway in the country. The armed forces participate resolutely, in military and organizational aspects, by supporting the offensive in zones threatened by armed bandits.

[Question] What is the record of this operation so far?

Sebastiao Mabote: Generally speaking, what we have accomplished so far is already known to you to a great extent; we have successes, we obtained our objectives almost to the extent of 90 percent. We inflicted more than 1,000 casualties (dead and wounded) upon the enemy; we captured more than 500 armed personnel and miscellaneous military materiel of capitalist origin, as well as many commodities which have been stolen from communal villages and people's stores in the regions of Mossurize, Macata, and Espungabera. But we hope to capture even more materiel scattered there.

[Question] What did the reactionary groups do after the operation of the FPLM was launched?

Sebastiao Mabote: We can say that, after we took the main camp in the mountains of Mossurize, the situation became stabilized. Our forces are there with all of their firepower and continue to pursue their search and capture operation aimed at fugitive individuals in order to restore life in the villages and that of course also applies to the political-military system in that border region. Right now, you can still see evidence of one or another bandit as he engages in some kind of criminal act but most of them have surrendered to our authorities with their own war materiel.

The party and government agencies are doing their job with the support of the armed forces and all of the operations along the border are being conducted briskly. The armed forces have absolute control of the situation.

[Question] Was there any other major military operation after the attack on the main camp of those groups?

Sebastiao Mabote: No, nothing worth reporting after that assault. Some scattered bandits still attempted some isolated operations, without success, such as, for example, a small group which fired at the hydroelectric power station of Revue, where two or three of them were captured later on.

[Question] Did these isolated actions interfer with traffic on National Highway No 1, from Maputo to Beira and Chimoio?

Sebastiao Mabote: There was no enemy action that was really capable of interfering with movement on that highway. Some scattered bandits tried to ambush some trucks but the armed forces went into action and nothing further happened. Here again the armed forces have complete control of the situation.

[Question] Getting back to the main phase of this offensive--the destruction of the camp of the counterrevolutionary groups--what are the factors that contributed to their getting a foothold in this region?

Sebastiao Mabote: There were various factors. First of all, they were able to operate in the mountains of this border zone which are difficult to get at and they found shelter in caves. In this favorable terrain they also had an opportunity to receive outside support by helicopter and aircraft.

The second factor which the enemy exploited was the low political consciousness of the people there. The tactic was to organize certain individuals among the local population who could be used to help them while at the same time this would make it easy for those groups to hide out. There is also one other important aspect to consider: the region is very rich, as you were able to see for yourself, it has various crops, cattle, small animals, much millet and mapira. All of these factors are very important from the logistic viewpoint.

[Question] What kind of activities did these groups conduct in order to persuade the less politically aware elements of the population to join them and how did they get those people to cooperate with them?

Sebastiao Mabote: Imperialism uses various methods to obtain its objectives. But money is one of the most important ones. This is why we saw that many of the armed individuals were persuaded to join with the help of money.

They told them that, if they managed to destroy a truck, they would get 3 contos or $300. They thus were mercenaries since they are also commanded by mercenaries.

Another aspect which they exploit is the lack of knowledge of the national situation and the ambition of certain persons. They tell them: "If you manage to "liberate" 3 kilometers in a certain border area, we will proclaim 'independence.' And one of you might get to be 'president' or commander." Other people they would offer stores and shops inside and outside the country.

Finally we must realize that they force their "soldiers" (we call them bandits because they have no real ideology, they have no cause) to smoke suruma. Now, a person who has been drugged very often does not know what he does; he has no awareness of the horrible crimes he commits.

[Question] During a meeting held in Chimoio, Your Excellency announced that the captured individuals would be returned to productive activities. How is this working out in practice?

Sebastiao Mabote: This mission is being implemented right now with the support of the local structures. Minimum conditions were created to enable them to work, to clear the roads which they themselves had mined and to rebuild bridges. This work is going on normally within the plans that have been drafted.

We are thus reintegrating those individuals who have been deceived and we are thus continuing with the policy of clemency which the Mozambique Liberation Front implemented throughout our armed national liberation struggle. Our job is to reeducate them so that they can serve the country.

As for the social problems of the population, we are tackling them through intensive mobilization so that many persons who have been deceived have now been recovered. The main effort which the party and government agencies are making at this moment is aimed at improving the living conditions of the population groups in the previously hit zones.

[Question] What are the main difficulties encountered during these military maneuvers?

Sebastiao Mabote: There were no major difficulties. Our manpower and materiel losses did not come up to 1 percent thanks to the excellent planning of Operation "Leopardo" (as we called it) and the way the soldiers performed.

[Question] What was the general performance of the FPLM during this operation when various branches operated in a coordinated manner for the first time?

Sebastiao Mabote: By way of a general and specific critique, I would say this: first of all, from the viewpoint of discipline, in the zones where the operation took place and with relation to the population groups, our forces acted as mobilizers of the population. From the viewpoint of military discipline, they did their job with zeal and this is why they managed successfully to beat the banditry back.

Another important aspect is that, in the course of those maneuvers, we managed to train both the new and the old soldiers--those who participated in the national armed liberation struggle and those repelled the aggression against the People's Republic of Mozambique after the application of sanctions against Southern Rhodesia. All of them got combat experience under difficult conditions. The morale and initiative of ground forces and air unit commanders rose considerably and showed that they are ready to defend the country and to repel any kind of attack no matter where it comes from. The important aspect however is this: in the People's Republic of Mozambique, all of our experienced soldiers are in the thick of the fighting. Now our task is to improve those qualities even more even though we no longer have a physical enemy to confront.

[Question] Finally, what are the action prospects for the immediate future?

Sebastiao Mabote: We must always be vigilant. Imperialism will never stop opposing us; this is the basic point that has to be understood. It will always try to create trouble because that is its nature; Comrade President Samora Machel teaches us that "where there is revolution, there is reaction." This is the class struggle. This is why it is not astonishing to find these bandits. Why are they fighting us? Because we are in the process of making a revolution. But they are doomed to failure.

We will continue to fight them, no matter where they may come from. The Comrade President also teaches us that the political and organizational offensive is permanent. This is why the armed forces will also continue permanently to operate, since all of us have been given the assignment of turning our weapons inside our country, against the domestic enemy.

NEWLY-ESTABLISHED CHAMBER OF COMMERCE GOALS DETAILED

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 9 Aug 80 p 5

[Text] The bylaws of our country's Chamber of Commerce have now been approved and made public. It has been established that the chief role of that organization has to do with the international market and the world economy. As a result, it has the mission of establishing and developing relations of cooperation with other organizations and institutions for international trade, signing accords, agreements, and contracts with similar organizations abroad, and studying and analyzing the organization and operation of foreign trade in other countries.

Domestically, the chamber is responsible for providing its members with legal and technical support. That support will extend to operations by the latter in the field of foreign trade and to the training of their cadres. It is also responsible for gathering and publishing, on a periodic basis, information and advertising materials in its area of responsibility. Such materials will make the potentialities and capabilities of the People's Republic of Mozambique [RPM] better known both to visitors and to businessmen.

Also as part of its role within the country, the chamber is to organize receptions for foreign trade delegations, issue certificates of origin for merchandise exported from the RPM as well as any other certificates that may be required in the pursuit of foreign trade, and cooperate in the organization of international fairs and exhibits within the country or abroad when Mozambique takes part in the latter.

As for its makeup, the Chamber of Commerce will have active, honorary, and corresponding members. Its membership is open to enterprises under the Ministry of Foreign Trade or those whose production has to do with foreign trade, international transportation enterprises, insurance companies, and other organizations or institutions connected with foreign trade.

Listed among the rights of the members is that of receiving all possible support in the solution of problems in their area of responsibility and of enjoying priority over other users in utilizing the chamber's services.

In return for those benefits, all active members are required to accept the chamber's bylaws, comply with decisions reached by its governing bodies, and provide all information required by the Office of the Chairman when necessary for correctly carrying out the functions and pursuing the objectives for which the chamber was established.

Corresponding members--whether enterprises, institutions, organizations, or private citizens--will be admitted provided that they agree to cooperate with the chamber in activities within its field. Honorary members may be named when, having rendered service of outstanding usefulness to the performance of the chamber's functions, they are nominated and accepted as such.

The Chamber of Commerce has the following organs: the General Assembly, the board of directors, the Office of the Chairman, and the Control Commission. It will have the Foreign Trade Court of Arbitration as an associated body.

PRODUCTION DIFFICULTIES HINDER LIMPOPO COMPLEX

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 3 Aug 80 pp 1,4

[Excerpt] Despite its present rate of growth and intensive mechanization (currently 85 percent of the entire production process in ricegrowing), the Limpopo Agroindustrial Complex [CAIL] is not yet producing yields consistent with the investments made there. This is a major problem to be overcome so that CAIL, which is of strategic importance, can develop and contribute to victory over underdevelopment. This question was explicitly discussed in a speech on 18 March by President Samora Machel, who said at the time that the enterprises are not only supposed to produce but also to generate profits so that other sectors can be brought into being and the life of our people improved.

Production at CAIL is increasing steadily, however, and this reveals great effort on the part of certain sectors, but the problem of profitability is far from being solved: many millions in invested meticais are being lost every year.

The material conditions for constantly increasing yields at the complex have already been created, but various limitations exist. The need for further refinement of the production technology, for a more rational use of equipment and other material means, and, above all, the need to keep the irrigation system operational through permanent maintenance are some of the chief limiting factors.

The need to accumulate capital for new investments is one of the main problems being posed at present with respect to CAIL as a state enterprise. The state has bestowed every attention on this enterprise through the application of material, financial, and human means. This is because of its strategic and priority character. As the "future granary of the nation," it has a great responsibility in supplying the country with rice and the city of Maputo with a certain quantity of some garden products.

But the nature of the enterprise itself, the conditions in which it emerged, and the difficulties with technical cadres, combined with soil factors--especially as regards drainage, crop varieties (particularly rice), and the current phase of production technology, among other things--have so far prevented the achievement of yields consistent with the investments made.

AGRICULTURAL COOPERATIVES DEPARTMENT FOUND DEFICIENT

Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 13 Aug 80 pp 1,3

[Article by Antonio Matonse]

[Excerpt] Moamba, 12 Aug--The Advisory Council of GODCA (Department for the Organization and Development of Agricultural Cooperatives) met in full session yesterday afternoon. Discussion of the report submitted to the meeting by that department of the Ministry of Agriculture led to the conclusion that the management of GODCA, in the person of its director, Amir Molg?, is incompetent.

Following speeches by several participants, who criticized the report and the work done by the organization in question, Mario da Graca Machungo, minister of planning and agriculture, concluded by saying: "There is absolute incompetence in the management of GODCA, and it is made worse by a lack of conviction concerning the importance of the cooperatives."

According to the minister, the incompetence of GODCA's director "reveals a class attitude" that was manifested in the excessive bureaucratization of that organization at the central level, since only paperwork was being done, with the result that "it has become isolated from the peasants."

Before the minister's speech, and as happened in the case of the provincial GODCA's, several participants criticized the report and the work done by the central GODCA during its 16 months of existence. Luis Pereira, director of the Ministry of Agriculture's Planning Office, said, "Despite its being a rendering of accounts, the report limits itself to describing and drawing attention to what has been done." Carvalho Neves, administrator of the BDP [People's Development Bank], added, "It does not succeed in synthesizing what the cooperative movement is today."

It is recalled that this type of report was presented by almost all the provincial GODCA's and that the true situation in the cooperative movement was stressed only by the cooperative members attending the meeting.

The speeches by the delegates to this council meeting also led to the conclusion that the central GODCA, in addition to not having maintained close ties with other Ministry of Agriculture structures involved in the problems of rural development, has shown very little interest in familiarizing itself with the problems of peasants belonging to the cooperatives.

Discussion of Provincial Reports Complete

Yesterday morning saw the conclusion of discussion concerning the reports by Sofala, Inhambane, Gaza, and Maputo provinces. In those discussions, it was revealed that MECANAGRO [expansion unknown] did 50 percent of its work in the cooperatives at the wrong time.

To that and other questions, MECANAGRO's national director responded by saying that its capacity in terms of farm equipment is not adequate at present for meeting the growing demands of the agricultural cooperatives. In addition, priority in the use of farm equipment is given to farms devoted to crops covered by the plan and the programs, with the cooperatives coming in last.

In this connection, Minister Mario Machungo said it was important for the Advisory Council to study mechanisms for making better use of MECANAGRO's current equipment capacity.

BRIEFS

GDR YOUTH BRIGADE--A brigade from the Democratic Youth Federation of the GDR, made up of 14 individuals, spent 3 months doing volunteer work in CAIL (Limpopo Agribusiness Complex) for the purpose of providing support in the training of the workers of that production unit. All of them are specialists in the branches of mechanics, while some of them are engineers from agricultural enterprises in the province of Neubrandenburg, GDR. According to information reaching our editorial office, this is not the first time that this volunteer team has been participating in the rice harvest in an African country. It had done so earlier in Ethiopia. Commenting on the team's participation, the leader said: "We did not come to be work supervisors. Our objective is to make sure that the Mozambican workers will over the next several years be able to handle those harvests by themselves, relying on their own strength. We can say that we are achieving this objective. The mechanics and operators now have a better knowledge to run the harvest combines." [Text] [Maputo TEMPO in Portuguese 3 Aug 80 p 2] 5058

PRIZES FOR BEST WORKERS--In the afternoon of the day before yesterday, about 30 workers in seven of the capital's hotel establishments were rewarded for having distinguished themselves in the first Socialist Emulation Campaign in support of the elections in the city of Maputo. The workers were awarded furniture, household electrical appliances, and articles of clothing at various ceremonies held at the Polana and Turismo hotels and at the Hotel Industry Literacy Center, where a party organized by the workers themselves was attended not only by members of the enterprise's management and structures but also by officials from the national headquarters of the Production Councils. At all three places, the prevailing feature was the atmosphere of happiness and satisfaction and the participation of a number of workers, who praised their colleagues for their high level of organization, discipline, punctuality, and diligence, which constitutes an example. As we were told in private by one of those in charge, those parties were a stimulus that others will try to imitate. [Excerpt] [Maputo NOTICIAS in Portuguese 4 Aug 80 p 2] 11/98

SOVIET WEAPONS--SWAPO is strong enough to drive South Africans out of SWA/Namibia without foreign troops, declared SWAPO leader Sam Nujoma last weekend in Copenhagen. "But we need weapons from the Soviet Union and from other communist countries. Although we need weapons, the West refuses to support us. Whereas socialist countries, including the USSR, provide us with weapons. We have the right to accept arms from any country whatsoever," emphasized Nujoma. "Therefore we are still far from dependent on that country." African countries can provide SWAPO with advice but "they are not arms manufacturers, and arms are the central issue." Foreign troops are another matter, said Nujoma. "I am not of the opinion that Cuba can afford to be dispatching soldiers to any and every country. We do not require any foreigners for our liberation struggle; we have sufficient people of our own and we are able to keep training more." [Text] [Windhoek ALLGEMEINE ZEITUNG in German 8 Sep 80 p 2]

MEASURES REGULATING NUMBER, PAY OF CIVIL SERVANTS

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 22 Aug 80 p 3

[Article by Abdallah Faye]

[Text] The Ministry of Public Offices, Work and Employment, which manages 57,000 civil servants, costing the state 5 billion francs per month, has a very large role to play in the area of budget savings. It must see that recruiting capabilities are adequate for personnel requirements.

From now on, due to circumstances that will no longer tolerate blind flying and confusion in filling positions, recruiting will be very strictly supervised, after the ministerial departments have calculated their actual personnel requirements.

In addition, recruiting has been frozen to allow for a judicious redistribution of personnel among the different governmental departments. The Ministry of Public Offices, which is supervising this task, is being assisted by the Office of Organization and Methods and by the ministerial departments. Next, the creation of flow charts for the ministries will streamline their organization and will make stricter management of personnel more feasible.

However, the freeze on recruiting does not involve civil servants from professional schools (ENAM, Ecole superieure normale [college of education], etc.), who were already included in the planning when they were admitted to these institutions.

Last year, 2,819 civil service workers were recruited into the civil service ministry, the majority being made up of teachers.

The minister of public offices, work and employment told us that where personnel are concerned, his department has always been very concerned about the problem of retirement among government workers. In fact, several workers were kept on in service past retirement age.

Some took advantage of an extension because they had dependent children, others (Mohammedan judges, jurors) took advantage of a waiver, but a large number of employees who were not in either of these two situations remained in service, because the circulation of payroll statements took too long, or because they were not informed of their retirement privileges.

Therefore, they continued to receive pay to which they were no longer entitled, because their names continued to appear on payroll statements when they should have been deleted, after the order for their departure was issued.

The situation is going to improve soon, because the Ministry of Public Office is proposing to institute an "almost daily" check to find out ahead of time who should be eligible for retirement, so as to be able, within the time allotted, to notify the payroll department, in writing, of any action taken in this area. This will have the advantage of reducing the time required for carrying out the required action.

Already in September, the pay of all government workers over 55 years of age will be suspended. All workers who have reached this limit and who are not entitled to either an extension or a waiver will be asked to stop working after having been paid, for the work done for the government.

For those workers who are on half-pay, or who voluntarily leave their positions, and who continue to receive their wages, the use of an attendance list will make it possible to keep track of these irregularities. By using this attendance list, only active workers--those still working--will be paid.

Moreover, the planned personnel administration information will make it possible to proceed with promotions, appointments, and retirements, on time; which will result in considerable savings for the government.

The measures imposed by the present situation do not, however, lose sight of the problem of employment, which is still a present-day problem in the civil service ministry.

The ministry tends to control employment more and more. And from this point of view, it has turned over all of its authority to the manpower department, which is required to refuse anything to do with personnel recruited without its knowledge from now on.

The employment situation has incited those responsible for the civil service ministry to refuse all unjustified reduction of personnel.

In an effort to protect the employment of citizens, recruiting of emigrants is always strictly regulated. If the emigrant does not have a higher level of education than the Senegalese, says the Minister of Public Offices, Work and Employment, he is served with a rejection notice. In hiring, the priority is reserved for Senegalese graduates, of whom a list is furnished every year to the various ministries and employers, so that they can recruit the graduates according to their requirements.

STRICT IMPLEMENTATION OF CIVIL SERVICE MEASURES ESSENTIAL

Dakar LE SOLEIL in French 22 Aug 80 p 1

[Article by Cherif Elvalide Seye]

[Text] The situation which prevailed in the Senegalese Ministry of Public Offices and which the government has decided to put an end, was nothing less than anarchy. The working force, some 57,000 civil servants for a country of approximately 5 million inhabitants, is too large. This condition arose from the fact that while the working force was already topheavy at the time of the country's accession to independence, the employees have continued to increase although common sense advised a halt to recruiting.

In fact, the capital of French Western Africa, Dakar, should administer the entire region. Thus, although all of the officials employed in Dakar were not Senegalese, the fact remains that our compatriots make up a huge majority, already too numerous for a single country.

In the absence of strict control, the working force has continued to grow, with the administration becoming the only opportunity for attractive promotion. By means of unfair promotions, many people were recruited with no qualification. Employers even used several employees for the same work instead of just one. The Public Offices, therefore, developed in an ill-considered manner, becoming an enormous, totally disjointed "house" where almost anything was possible: to be paid without having worked, but also to work for many months without being paid due to a very complicated circulation of payroll statements.

Under these conditions, it is obvious that the reorganization being undertaken by the government can only be unreservedly appreciated. Its very character of economic healthfulness makes the strict application of established measures imperative. Everyone must be made aware that these measures, under penalty of their being drained of all substance, must not suffer the slightest delay.

It is from waiver to waiver and from exception to exception that we have arrived at our present unanimously denounced evils.

REASONS FOR INCREASE IN TAZARA RATES SET FORTH

Dar es Salaam UHURU in Swahili 12 Sep 80 p 4

[Editorial: "Our Views"]

[Text] The rates of the Freedom Railroad established [between] the city of Dar es Salaam and Kapiri Mposhi, Zambia have been increased. The fare for the transport of passengers has been increased by 20 percent and the rate for the transport of freight has been increased by 10 percent. The new rates will begin to be used on the first day of next month.

The increase in the rates of the Freedom Railroad is a matter which could not be avoided. An organization like the Tanzania Zambia Railway Authority [TAZARA] must conduct its work successfully. Conducting its work successfully includes ensuring that it does not incur losses in its operations, as its manager said.

The chief [presumably manager] of TAZARA, Charles Nyirenda, said the day before yesterday [that] the rates and cost of transport on the Freedom Railroad were below the cost of operation by 84 percent. It is obvious that a situation like this needs to be corrected to enable this authority to conduct its work with excellence.

During the 4 years since the Freedom Railroad began operations, its rates have been lower than any other railroad or other means of travel in East and Central Africa.

The TAZARA authority established these low rates because: TAZARA is an agency for serving Tanzania and Zambia and their people and not for accumulating for itself exceedingly large profits by squeezing these people by means of high rates.

But, the situation which existed 4 years ago is not the same as the present situation. The cost of nearly everything has increased and thus the cost of operating the Freedom Railroad has been increased by a large amount. Under conditions like these the directors of TAZARA have no other means than to increase the levels of rates, in order that they may be similar to those imposed by other railroads to control the cost of operations.

We believe that the people in the countries of Zambia and Tanzania will understand without difficulty the good intention of TAZARA in increasing its rates. Thus, as they have done in the past, they will continue to use the Freedom Railroad fully and ensure that the freight to be transported does not diminish.

Along with various steps which are being taken by the managers of TAZARA to correct the state of affairs, of which the increase in rates is one step, it is important not to forget the topic of labor productivity among our brothers who are serving this railroad.

The record so far has been good. [During] the meeting attended by [representatives] of the three countries of Zambia, Tanzania and China, which was held in Lusaka, Zambia recently to seek means of revealing the problems of TAZARA, it was acknowledged that the work of TAZARA was not bad [even] along with the problems which affect the railroad.

Our citizens from Tanzania and Zambia who are using the Freedom Railroad must take this pronouncement not only as praise but make an effort to fulfill their responsibilities with greater excellence for the benefit of our countries. As we expect the customers of TAZARA to understand the good reasons for all the changes which are bieng made by that authority, so we expect the staff of TAZARA to understand that the customers will expect greater efficiency in the transport of passengers and freight in accordance with the changes which are being announced by TAZARA.

MUGABE BACKS FREEDOM FIGHTERS IN ASSEMBLY CAMPS

LD191020 Salisbury Domestic Service in English 1745 GMT 18 Sep 80 CA

[Text] The prime minister, Comrade Robert Mugabe, says the government is resolved to end the very unfair treatment of freedom fighters suffering in assembly camps. Answering debate in the House of Assembly today on the defense vote he launched out at critics of the plan to move the former liberation forces into urban areas. Comrade Mugabe, who is also minister of defense, said the treatment we have given these freedom fighters so far has been very unfair. Government is resolved therefore to bring an end to the suffering which they have endured all these months that they had been in assembly points.

The prime minister discounted fears that the move of the armed men to the high-density suburb of Chitungwiza and to a similar town in Bulawayo will lead to more violence. He said: The necessary precautions will be taken to ensure that the new situation will not lead to disturbances, and I have asked the Joint Military Command to give me a plan to ensure that they are going to be in full control so that discipline will be maintained.

The prime minister asked if critics of the plan expect the freedom fighters to live permanently in rural areas while members of the former Rhodesian Army remain in comfort in urban barracks. Where do you want these sons of the soil to live? he asked. Permanently in the bush like animals? Comrade Mugabe concluded: We are not going to discriminate against them. They are the instrument which led to the settlement at Lancaster House.

BRIEFS

MUGABE REJECTS MILITARY AIRFIELDS--The prime minister today rejected suggestions that Zimbabwe should begin constructing defenses such as military airfields in preparation for war with apartheid-ruled South Africa. The prime minister told the House of Assembly: I do not think our priorities at the present moment allow us to sink funds into a project of this nature. He added: One would want to believe that the Pretoria regime also wants peace and that it will not indulge in aggressive activities against us. ECONOMIC OBJECTIVES OF S. AFRICAN INVASION REVIEWED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 8 Jul 80 pp 2, 11

[Text] With the systematic policy of aggression that the current invasion has been demonstrating--to even the most incredulous--in its true dimension, the racists of South Africa have not been attacking only military objectives that--in their view--could reinforce support by the People's Republic of Angola for the heroic people of Namibia, in the form of militant aid to the SWAPO, its revolutionary vanguard. Over and above the destruction, the looting, the killing, the South African policy has been characterized by a systematic attack on structures of our country, trying in this way to destabilize our economic life and impede the glorious process of national reconstruction now underway.

We all know the importance of Kunene province in the nation's economic life. A leading cattle-producing province, with a herd of over 1 million head, a strong state marketing network has been set up there in order to establish firm ties between the countryside and the city, buying cattle for slaughter from farmers and delivering essential consumer goods to them. The prospect of processing 60,000 head of cattle a year in this province, equivalent to 10,000 tons of dressed meat, was considered a realistic possibility. In their systematically destructive way, the racists have been attacking purchasing stations and means of cattle transport, trying to prevent shipment of animals already marketed, thus forcing the People's Republic of Angola [RPA] to make an enormous financial effort to assure, through imports, the supply of a product essential to the people. Were it not for this destabilizing situation, the RPA would have to resort to imports on a much smaller scale and would achieve self-sufficiency in a much shorter time. At the time that the illegal occupants of Namibia invaded our territory in a series of aerial incursions, there were over 2,000 head of cattle at the main shipping point, ready to go to Lubango and Luanda; they could not be shipped, raising by tens of millions of kwanzas the material damage they have caused us in the livestock sector alone--and for which they will have to account to our people, as the UN Security Council decided recently. But there are other effects of the aggression against the people's supply of meat. Beyond the panic and insecurity they have caused among farmers in the Canama region, considered a leading feedlot area, the enemy has tried-- although without success--to attack the city of Tchangongo. The major facilities of the national enterprise for buying, slaughtering and distributing meat to the country's southern region are located here. After the numerous studies that the importance of the investment called for, an Italian company was contracted to construct a modern slaughterhouse with a daily capacity of 120 head, which would greatly improve the nation's meat supply.

Continual incursion, bombing and destruction forced completion of the undertaking to be postponed, as it was not possible to guarantee the complete safety of the foreign experts who would be supervising the work and to safeguard such an important financial effort.

But, although predominant, livestock is not the only economic activity in Kunene province. With willful sadism, the South Africans have tried systematically to involve the Manquete region, one of the most fertile regions in the southern part of the country. In that region, more specifically, in Chivemba, results have been either destroyed or irreparably damaged in a study center for agricultural research. It has been pursuing a series of experiments, mainly in rice production. Kalueque is also under constant attack, even endangering the significant hydroelectric and hydroagricultural infrastructure existing there. The Kalueque Dam is the inalienable property of the Angolan people who, aware of their militant obligations to the occupied people of Namibia, are perfectly willing to permit its use for the economic recovery of an independent Namibia, led by the SWAPO. The waters of the Kunene will be used, not only to improve the quality of life of the Angolan people, but, on the opposite side of the river, to be transformed into foodstuffs for the Namibian people.

Another concern of the South African racists is to prevent the People's Republic of Angola from effectively carrying out the so-called Kunene Plan, conceived originally by the satanic alliance of the South African racists and the Portuguese fascists as a way of creating a buffer zone through establishing hundreds of thousands of colonists, which, they thought, would guarantee for South Africa forever the inhumane policy of apartheid and permit them to illegally occupy Namibia indefinitely. To facilitate that, South Africa supported Portugal not only with technical means but mainly with powerful financial resources. This plan, which in its concept is inevitably doomed, can, however, be radically changed and utilized not only for the direct benefit of our people but also for the Namibian people. The entire project, which will be described in some detail on another occasion, consists of a series of dams to be installed along the Kunene River from the Gove dam, a little to the south of Cuima in Huambo province, to the Kalueque dam at the Ruacana Falls. These dams are intended for hydroelectric and and hydroagricultural use, making it possible to irrigate tens of thousands of hectares and guarantee not only national self-sufficiency in foodstuffs but also an exportable surplus of products such as rice, corn, cotton, tobacco and so forth. Angolan technicians have analyzed the series of projects prepared at that time and the RPA has met with specialized companies in various countries to discuss their accomplishment. Our capability to do it, our commitment to carry out the task successfully, can be shown by the reclamation already carried out at the Matala dam and by the vigorous transformation of the erstwhile Folgares farming settlement in the Capelongo Agro-Industrial Complex. Here, where the work is developing steadily, the RPA is showing the South African racists how their policy is the antithesis of what we practice: about 50 families of the former settlers who remained in the settlement are working fraternally side by side with the Angolan farmers, one and all with the same objective: the battle of national reconstruction carried out through establishing just relations of production, with the disappearance of any difference based upon racial prejudice. Here, as in other places from Cabinda to Kunene, we are showing what we really want to do and could do better and sooner if it were not for the continual, systematic and destabilizing attacks that frequently force us to shut off the tractor, put down the hoe, abandon our herds, in order to take up the rifle in defense of our nation's soil.

NAMIBIAN COUNCIL OF MINISTERS PROPOSAL CONDEMNED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 4 Jul 80 p 1

[Editorial: "The Mountain Brought Forth a Mouse"]

[Text] The grotesque farce staged by the racist Pretoria government Wednesday in Windhoek to "institute" in Namibia an illusory "council of ministers" did not surprise the People's Republic of Angola, the Frontline Nations and the SWAPO, vanguard of the Namibian people in the struggle.

In frequent appeals to public opinion, in communiques and in the international courts, the respected voice of the People's Republic of Angola was raised more often recently to unmask before the international community the latest maneuver the South African racists were carrying out in Namibia, under cover of the brutal invasion of the southern part of our country.

On Wednesday, at the very hour that South African troops were massacring the defenseless population of Cunene and Kuando-Kubango provinces, international news agencies were reporting from Windhoek the inauguration and swearing in--of allegiance to Pretoria and apartheid--of a "council of ministers" with 12 members presided over by Dirk Mudge, a puppet of the South African racists, leader of the "Turnhalle Democratic Alliance," an organization created by Pretoria to serve the so-called "internal solution" of the Namibian problem. Thus was consummated the latest insult to the international community and, specifically, to the UN Security Council, resolved to implement in Namibia Resolution 435, which provides for creating a demilitarized zone on the borders of Namibia with Angola and Zambia, as a first step toward organizing free elections under the direct control of the United Nations.

And that is the reason for the resounding slap in the face the racist Pretoria government just gave the international community, provoking the Security Council and the UN secretary general himself with the grotesque farce it staged Wednesday in Windhoek.

That is the latest insolent provocation by Pretoria, contrived under cover of the criminal invasion of the sovereign territory of the People's Republic of Angola.

But Angola knows, as the other front-line countries and the Namibian people in struggle under the leadership of the SWAPO also know, that the mountain did not bring forth more than a domesticated mouse, an ephemeral puppet "government."

The South African racists have just installed "their" Muzoreva in Namibia. But in Namibia, as in Zimbabwe, the victory of the fighting people is inevitable. Even the racist government of Pretoria knows that.

As a matter of fact, in an interview granted in Windhoek to the U.S. magazine NEWSWEEK a few days after beginning the military invasion of the south of our country, Gen Jannie Geldenhuys, commander of the South African occupation forces in Namibia, asserted, in a brief flash of enlightenment, that his troops were engaged in a war they knew beforehand was lost, adding that only a political solution can solve the Namibian problem.

Why, then, does the Pretoria government resist the political solution recommended by the UN Security Council?

In the same magazine, Lt Col Andre Koetze, commander of one of the most important military bases set up by Pretoria in northern Namibia, next to the Angolan border, declared that if the United Nations would organize free elections now in Namibia the SWAPO would win with over 60 percent of the vote. This is the real reason for the panic that has seized the South African racists.

In the agony of approaching defeat Botha again launched his troops--enlisted by the former mercenaries of Ian Smith--against the People's Republic of Angola in order to destabilize our revolution and cover up installation of a puppet government in Namibia which represents only the interests of South Africa and international imperialism.

In Angola the racist troops found, in the combative determination of the glorious FAPLA [People's Armed Forces for the Liberation of Angola] and the ODP [People's Defense Organization], in the entire people united behind the MPLA-Labor Party and Comrade President Jose Eduardo dos Santos, a response worthy of our revolutionary traditions.

In Namibia there is no doubt that the mountain gave birth to a domesticated mouse, one that is a deliberate affront to the international community gathered in the United Nations.

The MPLA-Labor Party and the People's Republic of Angola government, while reaffirming their internationalist support for the people of Namibia through their vanguard, the SWAPO, vehemently condemn the latest maneuver staged in Windhoek by the racist Pretoria government and demand that the UN Security Council take immediate and concrete measures to once and for all put an end to the arrogance and continuing insults against the international community by the South African racists.

The struggle goes on! Victory is certain!

INCREASED PRODUCTION LINKED TO SUCCESSFUL DEFENSE

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 2 Jul 80 p 2

[Article by Gustavo Costa: "Strengthen the Economy to Liquidate the Invasion!"]

[Excerpts] The fascist and racist military command of South Africa has just ordered an unexpected increase in the lackey forces who since 7 June have been invading our country in flagrant defiance of the international community.

The sudden increase in the number of South African invaders not only seems to be an omen that the Pretoria authorities will pursue their violence against our territory with even greater intensity on an unparalleled scale but also reveals the setback that the racist troops were already beginning to suffer from the prompt and determined response of our people's armed forces.

This invasion should be seen as a typical Hitlerian adventure sustained by the inhumane irresponsibility of the Pretoria gorillas supported, in one way or another, by the leading Western powers--citadels of crime, of looting and of unbridled exploitation of natural resources belonging to peoples struggling for peace and social progress.

The current aggression of which our nation is a victim requires adoption of serious preventive measures that put the home front in a permanent state of alert to confront the invaders. The home front, in effect, is called upon to mobilize the utmost effort to support the fighters stationed on the front lines of combat against the invaders.

This mobilization presupposes, as a determinant factor, widespread increase of production in all work places.

Workers engaged on the production front are called upon to assume their responsibilities in order to strengthen our economic power, a large share of which must be concentrated on the war against imperialist aggression.

The situation thus demands a rapid buildup of efforts to guarantee the necessary material and logistical support to combatants on the military front engaged in repelling and liquidating the Pretoria gorillas.

At this moment, hundreds of Angolans have been violently assassinated in the regions affected by the aggression. Many others, exposed to Pretoria's Hitlerian pursuit, run the same risk. Although worrysome, the moment is not, however, one of dispair. Rather, it demands the greatest serenity so that, with a cool head, we can demonstrate once again that the Angolan people will never bow before the boot of any aggressor.

VITAL ELECTRIC CABLE PLANT PRODUCTION PARALYZED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 2 Jul 80 p 4

[Article by Pires Ferreira: "Production Completely Halted By Lack of Raw Materials"]

[Excerpts] The Avila factory, located in the Viana industrial zone, produces electric cables for various uses and, inasmuch as Angola's present development stage puts special demands on this type of article, its economic importance is not hard to understand.

But this factory is now completely shut down. This situation is more serious because there is only one other plant in Angola doing this work (CONDEL), also now closed down for the same reasons.

So we went to see what is going on.

The Avila electric-cable factory works exclusively with raw materials from Portugal and Belgium, specifically copper and special plastics for insulating cables. The company has enough copper but plastics shipments have been delayed and will force this plant to remain closed until about November, which will cause enormous losses.

Thus, although the plant was shut down only 15 days ago, it will remain closed a long time and will require an inquiry into responsibilities because closing a factory of such economic importance to the nation cannot go unpunished. These plants produce a product that is very expensive in the international market and whose importation represents an expenditure of foreign exchange needed to buy other goods abroad which we do not produce in Angola at all, such as industrial equipment, farm implements, and so forth.

A mixed-economy company in which the Angolan state controls 75 percent of the stock, Avila does not appear to measure up to either the enormous trust placed in it by the nation or its new status as an economic unit truly at the service of the Angolan people, as the production plan for this year uses no more than 30 percent of the plant's capacity, despite the fact that this represents a 20 percent increase over the 1979 output of 178 tons.

The company's technical director, Barbosa Miguel, gives us some explanation:

"I don't know whether we will be able to carry out our plans for this year, because we are waiting for raw materials that we have not heard a word about. We have copper here, but we do not have the plastics imported from Portugal that are irreplaceable for insulating electric cables. We hope to receive them in October, but we doubt that because the usual delivery time until arrival in Angola is about 6 months.

"Under such circumstances, unfortunately, we will have to keep the plant closed for a much longer time, because we do not use any domestic raw material..."

Barbosa Miguel told us this about the lack of trained specialists:

"We can say that our workers have only practical knowledge. They work without theoretical background but they get good results because of their long experience. And in this area we really don't have serious problems, because we have been able to overcome difficulties within our own capabilities."

The plant received assistance in 1977 and 1978 from some Cuban experts in planning and mechanics. Right now the arrival of some trained Portuguese specialists--contracted to teach courses in occupational training and thus contribute to forming cadres in the company--is being awaited.

COFFEE HARVEST REGISTERS POOR RESULTS

Kwanza-Norte Failure

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 3 Jul 80 pp 3, 2

[Text] The most outstanding aspect of the National Coffee Campaign--which is now underway in several regions of the country, especially in the traditional coffee-growing provinces--during the past 2 weeks was the staggering failure of activities occurring in Kwanza-Norte.

In fact, this region, having fulfilled only 30 percent of the established quotas, was far behind the forecast plan and the other regions.

This situation is explained by several reasons, the major one being the weak organizational structures that seem incapable of responding properly to the many demands of the harvest.

To this factor must be added the lack of an internal system of information and control and a high rate of absenteeism that results in serious reduction of worker productivity.

The product's late ripening--which in relation to Luanda represents the main reason for the delayed start of its harvest--although it has much influence in the case of Kwanza-Norte--cannot, however, be considered the number-one cause of this situation.

The current state of the harvest thus requires prompt intervention by the appropriate parties in order to revitalize this activity in Kwanza-Norte so that the region can meet the forecast plans.

The other provinces, however, have essentially fulfilled their plans, among which should be singled out Kwanza-Sul, whose workers' performance led to accomplishing 127 percent of their goal. Uije province, although recording a fulfillment of 108 percent, reported in the last 15 days a drop to 103 percent.

Organizational deficiencies and lack of internal information--factors that require a prompt and vigorous solution--persist in this region also.

In regard to the measures recommended by the last meeting of the National Coffee Commission, although provisions remain irregular and hence incapable of meeting the needs of the workers, the ministries of Domestic and Foreign Commerce have begun an effort to provide workers engaged in the harvest with the goods they need.

However, the precarious medical and medicinal situation persists, which has as a consequence a significant lack of health care for workers. The problem of fuel was given a boost through its transportation in railway cars to Lucala, where storage capacity is estimated at 200,000 liters, so that both Uije and Kwanza-Sul can be supplied within 1 day.

Also in respect to trained personnel, the National Commission for Restructuring Coffee has a contingent of 60 pupils that were in Cuba for 1 year where they attended various courses concerning specialized farming techniques, plant health and administration. Moreover, a course in practical agriculture will be concluded soon at the Saidy Mingas School in Gabela, a municipality in Kwanza-Sul. These are some of the more substantive problems reported in the last 15 days whose solution requires once again the mobilization of various national groups to make this productive activity, so important for our economy, more vigorous and efficient.

Foreign Advisers

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 8 Jul 80 p 2

[Article by Jose Aragao: "Agriculture Minister Led Coffee Meeting"]

[Text] A meeting to study reports about the 5th People's Harvest in Kwanza-Norte province took place last weekend in Kibaxe, seat of Dembos municipality. It was directed by the agriculture minister and member of the MPLA-Labor Party Central Committee.

The national director and municipal directors of ENCAFE [National Coffee Company], members of the Restructuring Commission and other agriculture officials also participated in the meeting.

In speaking at the opening of the meeting, Manuel Pacavira recalled the importance of coffee in the national economy and the efforts made by the late Comrade President Agostinho Neto and the then planning minister, now chairman of the party and president of the republic, Comrade Jose Eduardo dos Santos, to solve the problems that held back the increase in coffee production and productivity that would permit us to regain the levels of 1973.

"We are seeing this year," the agriculture minister went on to say, "that coffee must be radically restructured. For this very reason we established a restructuring commission, we contracted a foreign firm to act as consultants and suggest the best ways to create and implement territorial enterprises. And here in Dembos we are going to try to set up the first territorial enterprise to be included in the coffee restructuring program."

Failure to meet the established goals, with the exception of Samba Caju, was verified at the meeting. Failure was due to various factors, such as the disorganization prevailing in some production units and the negligence of certain officials.

At the end of the meeting Manuel Pacavira criticized the harmful behavior of certain municipal directors and ordered construction of houses for workers with resources available locally by the end of this year.

On Sunday, after participating in a voluntary work campaign, the agriculture minister met with members of the Coffee Restructuring Commission and technicians of ADL, the American company contracted to help restructure coffee.

HIGH RATE OF ABSENTEEISM REPORTED FOR MAY

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 8 Jul 80 p 1

[Excerpt] Contrary to expectations, some situations were observed during May that contributed in large part to the decline of some production levels in the nation's economy and a widespread increase in absenteeism of about 0.21 percent over April and 0.51 percent over March, with the largest increase recorded in Luanda, 6.68 percent, caused especially by illness and problems with food supply and workers' transportation.

These data were announced during a meeting held yesterday morning in the UNTA [National Union of Angolan Workers] headquarters between the director of the National Department of Socialist Emulation, Comrade Mario Tendinha, and representatives of the mass media to report on socialist emulation for the month of May.

Besides the matter mentioned above, Mario Tendinha, in a brief introduction, stressed that there is still difficulty in obtaining the necessary information to classify and grade companies and workers on the basis of what is established in union bylaws and declarations of commitment signed by business managers in association with union and party officials. A large number of companies make no reports, thus evading their public, democratic and revolutionary duty. Generally, he continued, the companies not reporting are those that have failed to fulfill production plans and that have the most disorganized production processes. The number of companies that failed to make any report during May represented about 36 percent of the 362 controlled companies, 60 of which are in the Benguela administrative area. For that reason, until the situation changes, Benguela has now become considered as "the rearguard province." In this context, it was possible to ascertain only 73 outstanding companies, a figure that could change if the local representatives of the National Department of Socialist Emulation would make more of an effort to collect more precise and verified data.

ARCHITECT'S INNOVATIVE SOLUTION FOR HOUSING CONSTRUCTION DESCRIBED

Luanda JORNAL DE ANGOLA in Portuguese 3 Jul 80 p 4

[Excerpts] The solution for the Angolan housing problem, especially in large rural areas, is undoubtedly self-construction, which would make it possible to accomplish vast programs to benefit the people through this basic right.

Self-construction in Angola is a directive recommended by government authorities and is intended to increase the creative initiative of the masses in directly solving their housing problems. The idea is to give each citizen the opportunity to build his own house, providing him with the basic materials.

A recommended experiment for that purpose (building on simple and efficient bases) has been made by a Brazilian adviser who is working in Angola, Fabricio Pedroza, architect for the Ministry of Construction and Housing.

His basic concern, throughout his work in Angola in the National Directorate of Urbanization and Construction, was directed toward solving with materials of local origin (brick and cement only) one of the factors that is usually the most difficult in building low-cost housing: the roof.

As a result, he eventually arrived at an extremely simple and effective solution that can be adopted by our country for massive self-construction not only of homes but also of other urgently needed small buildings, such as schools.

Although he has not discovered anything spectacular in the civil construction field, Fabricio Pedroza had the distinction of finding a desirable way to cover small buildings without resorting to traditional materials, which are zinc, fibrous cement, roofing tile or grass.

They are materials with certain disadvantages and which sooner or later affect the comfort or price of the work, because beyond altering the atmospheric conditions of the home, they must be replaced regularly and become expensive.

Fabricio Pedroza studied a permanent type of roofing that would be easy to construct, using only brick and cement. Besides dispensing with the traditional wood framework, interior papering and waterproofing, this type of roofing can be constructed by relatively unskilled labor and allows for a certain margin of technical imperfection that does not imperil the dwelling's safety--conditions that, after all, are to be expected when self-construction becomes widespread in Angola.

BRIEFS

COFFEE WORKERS TRADE UNION--The National Council of the Coffee Workers Union, which concluded its work recently in the municipality of Libolo, decided to expel nine of its members from its ranks: Joaquim Manuel of Kwanza-Sul and Torres Avelino of the same province; Domingos Carlos, of Kwanza-Norte; Domingos Luis of the same province; Albino Major and Armando Kimbungo of Uije; Maria F. do Amarel and Eurico Joao Lemos of Luanda; and Mateus Guida of Cabinda. Their expulsion was due to various negligent and liberal attitudes they assumed, not having appeared at a single session since the union's national council was elected. The meeting's business centered on the production record of coffee workers and their social situation, which led the participants to study the issue. In analyzing worker discipline, it was verified that much of the problem was due to, among other causes, shortages of food, medicine, transportation and housing, as well as the delay in receiving wages. The problem of worker vacations and the high rate of absenteeism merited a special recommendation of the Coffee Workers Union National Council. OPA MEMBERSHIP STATISTICS--About 1 million children are enrolled in the OPA --Agostinho Neto Organization of Pioneers, it was revealed to ANGOP [ANGOLAN PRESS AGENCY] by the first national secretary of the JMPLA [Youth Movement of the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola]-Party Youth. After announcing that the broad reorganization movement in the Agostinho Neto Organization of Pioneers now underway has the objective, among others, of studying the best ways to enroll the pioneers in schools, Renato Tito said that "the intention is to transform the organization into a real school of revolutionary thinking." The leader later stressed the need for teachers having more contact with the OPA-Agostinho Neto Organization of Pioneers leadership in order to help enroll pioneers and carry out work more vigorously. Regarding international exchange, Renato Tito assured that delegations of the organization he directs will soon be going to [illegible] friendly countries to learn the history of their respective peoples and explain the Angolan situation. ABSENCE OF UNION LEADERS AT PDCI PRE-CONGRESS SCORED

AB231926 Abidjan FRATERNITE MATIN in French 21, 22 Sep 80 p 1

[Editorial by Auguste Miremont: "Patriotic Fiber"]

[Text] I was both surprised and shocked at the reaction of some leaders of trade unions, a few days ago, to the call made to them to participate in the preparations of the seventh congress of the party. Hiding behind some legal subterfuges such as "we are not authorized by our members to engage them in such actions" they spurned the honor given to all Ivorians to show their faith in the change promised by the PDCI-RDA [Ivory Coast Democratic Party-African Democratic Rally].

We all know better than anybody else, through the declarations of the honorary chairman of the party, that it concerns a congress rightly described as very important for the strengthening of the stability of our country and the consolidation of the peace and national unity it will bring about. It should, therefore, interest each one of us. The intellectual or trade union sublteties at this crucial hour both for our future and that of our country is ill-timed.

I say subtleties, for how can one get hold of a trade union if it is not through its leaders who, after being informed of what is expected of them, in turn, turn to their members. Certain situations can also arise when leaders should assume their responsibilities and take immediate decisions.

One should not think I refuse to believe in the militancy of Ivorian cadres nor should I be taken for somebody who has an axe to grind with these trade unions. I simply believe that by relating these facts at this time when we should all be mobilized to present a clear and clean image of our country by actually taking part in the preparations of the congress, when we should all volunteer to provide the best possible welcome to our invited guests and make their stay here a happy one, it is the patriotic fiber which should stir within each one of us and not the wish to show publicly our intellectual independence.

I am, however, happy that these trade union leaders have demonstrated another proof that individual freedom exists in the Ivory Coast. In other places this "act of independence," considered a "crime of high treason," would have placed these leaders in the category of "dissidents," with all the consequences that this entails. I still regret, however, the systematic refusal to become involved by this minority of Ivorians on whom tomorrow's Ivory Coast will also rely.

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM AGREEMENT--A 5-year rural development program has been planned for the population at the northeastern part of the Ivory Coast. An agreement on the joint financing of this project was signed this morning by the World Bank, the Aid and Cooperation Fund of the Council of Entente, and the Government of the Ivory Coast. Some 4.5 billion CFA francs will be used to intensify the production of corn, groundnuts and rice in the Bouna and Bondoukou regions. DIVISION IN SWAPO RANKS NOT CONSIDERED SERIOUS

[Text] Windhoek -- The suspension of SWAPO's Deputy Leader Mishake Muyongo and the subsequent breaking away of his Caprivian comrades probably will not make any big difference in SWAPO's international status or in its internal support, according to the views of political observers.

Experts with whom DIE BURGER spoke voiced the opinion that the greatest influence which this can have will be to heighten SWAPO's picture of Wambo domination and also to weaken its following in the Caprivi.

In SWAPO circles the split with Muyongo is being compared with the breaking away of Andrea Shipanga from SWAPO a few years ago. In the long run this did not cost SWAPO very much in terms of support and status.

However, observers believe that SWAPO has leadership problems and serious ethnic and ideological differences. The organization's last congress took place in Tanga, Tanzania, in January 1970. Despite a great deal of dissatisfaction about this and the frustrations of quite a large number of ambitious people, who believe that they will be getting positions of leadership if a new crop of leaders is elected, there is now no talk of holding a congress in the foreseeable future.

According to the observers, ideologically SWAPO is being dominated by Marxist "hawks." This is especially true with respect to Secretary of Defense Peter Nanyemba, Nimo Amaambo, commander of the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN), and Deputy Secretary of Defense Richard Kapelwa, who are strongly Moscow-oriented and in complete control of SWAPO's military forces.

According to reports, Nanyemba, Amaambo and David Meroso, the national deputy chairman of SWAPO, have the strongest influence over SWAPO President Sam Nujoma.

East Germany

It was only yesterday that Nujoma engaged in discussions with Gerard Gruenenberger, a member of the East German SED Politburo. According to reports from East Berlin Mr Gruenenberger promised his country's continued support to SWAPO.

Additional "palace revolutions" against Sam Nujoma are likewise not excluded, but it is not expected that these will succeed easily. For example, the suspended Muyongo has intimate friends in SWAPO's top hierarchy and Administrative Secretary Moses Garoeb and Shapu Kaukungua, the West Europe representative, who are not very happy at all about the suspension, are amongst them.

Observers in the Caprivi are predicting that, as already indicated, SWAPO will try to gloss over the Muyongo affair by maintaining that Muyongo was merely a temporary deputy leader and that the actual deputy leader, Brandon Simbawaye, also a Caprivian, is still under detention in South Africa.

Simbawaye, who along with Muyongo was cofounder of the Caprivi African National Union, was arrested in 1964. His confinement was ended when the UN group visited South Africa in 1972. Shortly thereafter he disappeared without a trace.

ACTIVITIES OF MALAGASY INNOVATIONS INSTITUTE DISCUSSED

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 19 Jul 80 pp 1,5

[Article by J. M. Vanivato: "From An Idea to the Hitsikitsika--Everything About the IMI"]

[Text] Following the remarkable performance of the Hitsikitsika during the great parade held to commemorate the 20th anniversary of Madagascar's independence on 26 June last in Mahamasina, we sought out Mr Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy, director of the Malagasy Innovations Institute (IMI) in an attempt to learn more about what the IMI is and the extent of its field of action. In particular we wanted to know what reasons guided the IMI in its choice of wood as the material for the building of a plane in a period when aircraft builders seem more and more interested in such light metals as aluminum or titanium, not to mention light alloys such as aluminum bronze or duralumin and also alpax in airplane construction.

Our interview with the director of the IMI on Friday 4 July last had its natural extension in a guided tour of the Hitsikitsika made possible for us on Tuesday, 8 July , by a whole team of officers from the Ivato Naval Air Base, including Col Henry Aime Clovis, Lieutenants Andrianiaina and Randriambelomanana, and Second Lieutenant Ratsirahonana.

Fascinated by the graceful sweep of the Hitsikitsika in the skies over Mahamasina during the great parade commemorating the 20th anniversary of Madagascar's independence on the morning of 26 June last, we wanted to know more about this new aircraft which has just added a unit to the air fleet of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar. Our inquiries led us to Tanjombato. This complex, situated at the southern gate to Tananarive is in fact the location of the Malagasy Innovations Institute. There we visited Mr Rabearvivelo Andriamalagasy, the director of the IMI late in the afternoon last Friday.

He is a young director whose good cheer, easy manner and precise speech, added to a natural simplicity of gesture and dress, give him at the very outset a very winning aspect. Put at our ease, we asked him directly for personal background before asking him to outline for us a brief history of the IMI, followed by a brief summary of the major line of research pursued by this establishment. Our interview with the IMI director very naturally led to a discussion of the performance of the aircraft baptised the Hitsikitsika.

At our insistance then, Mr Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy described his career. A truly impressive record, as you can judge: doctor of space astrophysics, he worked with the Skylab program. He has a doctorate in management and is an informatics engineer. He is now director of the IMI and to top it all, advisor to President Didier Ratsiraka of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar.

A Spectacular Denial

The Malagasy Innovations Institute is a state body which was created by Ordinance 79-0-14 dated 13 August 1979. Its stated goal is the development of original technological models adapted to our socialist choice through research and development of technology based on the natural and human aspects of the country, working basically with renewable resources and according to reproducible models. In simpler terms, the IMI seeks to adapt technologies to the local context by making maximal use of the potential of the receiving country in terms of raw materials and human resources.

Our interlocutor took the opportunity to insert a parenthetical statement for greater precision. "In a discussion of technology, many industrialized countries or those in the process of development regard certain techniques as the private preserve of the developed countries, and thus inaccessible to little countries such as ours. The IMI proposes to contribute a spectacular denial to this method of thinking. The IMI is moreover firmly convinced that the obstacles to development encountered in the undeveloped countries are less of a technological than a psychological nature. Strong in this conviction, the IMI has developed a prototype hovercraft. It is an apparatus affiliated with a technology of a strategic nature. Currently, this apparatus is serving as the basis for other ever more profound studies.

The building of the hovercraft involving vanguard technology, sweeps away many prejudices, just as it strengthens the concept to the effect that the realm of technology is not necessarily close to us either by difficulties of any sort or in terms of the materials used in the building of the apparatus.

An All-Terrain Vehicle

Another field in which the IMI wants to disprove commonly but erroneously widespread ideas is automotive construction. Vehicle lovers must have noted in the streets of the capital a miniscule red all-terrain vehicle with the license plate 1 TK, built by the IMI. We have given it the name

"Karenjy." We want to be able to build many others in small-scale production, with a team of about 20 persons, without sizeable investments, but rather using the domestic manpower skill we propose to train simultaneously.

Hitsikitsika

A third research direction pursued by the IMI pertains to aviation. Wooden aircraft exist throughout the world, thousands of them. In Madagascar, a wooden aircraft inspires little confidence because it is associated with a "prehistoric" model. The Hitsikitsika is an airplane built entirely of wooden parts which the IMI proposes to produce on the assembly line, and the best advertising guarantee for the IMI is found in the demand from foreign countries for this item.

In the aviation sector, the IMI program calls for the building of a transport plane in wood and organic substances (resins and other products).

At the Malagasy Innovations Institute, according to its director, it is believed that numerous difficulties encountered in providing access to an economic region, in terms of the problems in building and maintaining roads, can be averted through the use of a rather simple but intensive air service.

And our interlocutor went on to say that at present, 1 kilometer of roadway costs about 40 million Malagasy francs, and thus to link two points on the island relatively distant one from the other, the bill comes to 1 billion for the 25 kilometers of roadway.

In the IMI proposal, a rather simple landing field for each fivondronana could resolve many difficulties. The aircraft which the IMI proposes to build should cost a few hundreds of millions of francs. The overall economic costs show that under these conditions, the plane could compete with the truck. In fact, when truck transport by road is used, the trucker never takes the amortization of the road-building costs into account in his rate. For purposes of comparison, if amortization of the road is added to the cost of operating the truck on the one hand, and if we consider on the other the amortization of simple runways in addition to cost of operating the plane, the competitive aspect of the aircraft becomes clear.

The hovercraft, the all-terrain vehicle and the airplane each represent a technology pertaining to the transport sector. But the activities of the IMI are of such great diversity as to cover many other fields.

From Buildings to Windmills

By way of example, the director of the IMI mentioned its activites in the construction sector, in particular the building of the Fianarantsoa Regional University Center (CUR), where the cost price per square meter today is less than for other procedures used in this CUR operation. The expenditures in foreign exchange account for less than 30 percent of this cost, for comparable time periods with other techniques used elsewhere.

The IMI also has a program pertaining to energy, and generally speaking, the IMI director explained to us, the efforts of his establishment had to do with the improvement of living conditions for the citizens of Madagascar, and in particular those living in the rural sector, through the use of technologies which are not new inventions but often techniques retrieved from the four corners of the earth and adapted to the level of capacity of the masses and the raw materials available to them. By way of illustrating what he had just said, Mr Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy explained to us that the IMI has built a prototype windmill with canvas blades and supports or footings (also called posts) of wood. In the building of this windmill, metal elements were kept to a minimum so that any deterioration of the system can be repaired by any craftsman in the locality where this energy source is placed, without requiring the use of welding equipment or other tools which are more complicated and costly to buy.

Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy, doctor of space astrophysics, has worked on the skylab program. He has a doctorate in management and is an engineer in informatics. He is the director of the Malagasy Innovations Institute and advisor to President Didier Ratsiraka of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar.

Admire the beauty of the line of this entirely wooden plane built without, naturally, the motor and the fuel tank.... An airplane of the Hitsikitsika type offers the unquestionable strategic advantage of virtually escaping radar detection.... This airplane developed in the FRG is registered to the IMI, the state organ which will be playing a major role in what is known as "transfer of technology."

"Karenjy," which literally means "rover" has a very high performance. As a "copilot" and without safety belt, I experienced a rather strong sensation in the course of a little drive aboard the "Karenjy," driven by the director of the Malagasy Innovations Institute.... This small all-terrain vehicle has tremendous power. Nothing stands in its way: huge gaps, ups and downs of steep slopes, sand or mud. With or without dogclutch, which shifts softly even at full speed, the IMI prototype has a good future.

WOODEN HITSIKITSIKA AIRPLANE DESCRIBED

Tananarive MADAGASCAR-MATIN in French 19 Jul 80 p 5

[Text] An additional unit, quite recently acquired, has expanded the air fleet of the Democratic Republic of Madagascar: the airplane named "Hitsikitsika" registered as 5R-MII (5-Romeo-Mach-India twice). That is what avoids any confusion in the name of this airplane which distinguished itself last 26 June in the course of a great parade in celebration of the 20th anniversary of the independence, held in Tananarive, through its voluptuous development and its "loops" in the skies of Mahamasina.

A School Airplane

According to Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy, director of the Malagasy Innovations Institute, the airplane was developed in the Federal Republic of Germany [FRG]. It was carried in pieces in the hold of a Boeing 747 of Air Madagascar. In Tananarive it took only 3 days for three people to assemble it.

It is a twin-seat wooden airplane, i.e., the passenger or the student sits behind the pilot or instructor. It is a single engine twin controls plane, in a way a training aircraft.

A Car Engine

The airplane carries an advanced Volkswagen Combi engine developing 60 hp. This engine which uses high octane gasoline, which is available at service stations, can naturally run just as well using aviation fuel known in flying circles as 100/130 (high octane number), but whose steady supply is becoming ever more problematical.

What distinguishes the motor of the Hitsikitsika from that of a serially manufactured Volkswagen Combi is, in particular, its starting system which uses a magneto instead of the conventional delco, and its carburetor with direct fuel injection as used by some advanced cars, Mercedes in particular, as we learned yesterday by a group of officers from the Ivato Naval Air Base, which included Col Henry Aime Clovis, Lieutenants Andrianiaina and Randriambelomanana, and Second Lieutenant Ratsirahonana.

The "Hitsikitsika" has a wingspan of about 15 meters. To the untrained eye this may seem exaggerated compared to the fuselage. That is why the uninformed quite hastily assumed that the "Hitsikitsika" was a glider. Yet, anyone even vaguely interested in aeronautics would know that a glider has no engine. . . . Each of the plane's wings has a hinge toward its middle which enables half of the wing to fold back on the other half (on the fuselage side, naturally), when the airplane is on the ground. Deployed, each of the wings is equipped with a "balancing," a prop with a roller as one finds on some models of Mirage fighter planes.

Each of the wings has a system of air brakes or retracting flaps.

The fuselage is supported by a main gear with a single wheel which is sufficiently wide in terms of the size of the very small and very classical rear wheel.

Also very conventional is the tail whose turns are synchronized with the rear wheel and the depth governor.

Specifications

With its twin blade wooden propellor, 1.40 meters long, the Hitsikitsika, weighing 600 kilograms, requires a runway of no more than 100 to 150 meters for takeoff. The IMI director told us that on 26 June last the airplane could have landed on Mahamasina Stadium but, for additional precautionary measures, the fence at the end of the runway would have had to be removed to make the takeoff possible.

With its two reservoirs full, with a respective capacity of 38 and 60 liters, carefully distributed between the two wings, the airplane can fly a good 12 hours. This is quite a performance for an airplane whose cruising speed ranges between 150 and 180 kilometers per hour. Its minimal air speed is 75 kilometers per hour. At maximum speed it can fly 250 kilometers per hour.

The "Hitsikitsika" can reach an altitude of 5,000 meters and certainly even higher. In such a case, however, its passengers must wear an oxygen mask. We already mentioned that the plane was not a glider which could not take off unless dragged by an airplane until it would gain altitude and then fly on its own. Actually, once in the air, the Hitsikitsika can glide. For example, at an altitude of 1,000 meters, at the Antanjombato verticle, the pilot could cut off his engine and peacefully land on the Ivato Airport, 20 kilometers away. The distance becomes greater in the function of the altitude reached by the plane at the time when the pilot decides to cut off the engine. For example, it could cover more than 20 kilometers should its motor be switched off at a height of 3,000 meters, as the distance covered grows with the altitude. . . .

The airplane could land with the engine turned off.

Manpower Utilization

When we asked Rabearivelo Andriamalagasy, the IMI director, why were they still building wooden airplanes today, and was that not a case of backward thinking, he smiled, indicating to us what little notion we had about the "resistance of materials." The IMI director told us that the use of wood offers an advantage over metal in the sense that wood has virtually no fatigue. As an example he told us the following: "play around" for some time with a sheet of metal. For a while it will resist and then the metal will break. . . . If it is a question of wood, the wood would either break immediately or else it would stay firm for good.

Another advantage of a wooden plane is strategic. The wooden plane is certainly an advanced technology in the sense that wood is not detectable on a radar screen. The reflecting surface which the radar may pick up is reduced to the motor and the fuel tanks alone, in the case of the "Hitsikitsika." The propeller is wooden. The fuselage and the wings are wooden as are the controls which are made of plywood and pressed wood and put together with glues and all sorts of resins, and covered with a fabric.

A third advantage in the manufacturing of a wooden airplane is that it allows the use, not to say the reuse, of the knowledge of the craftsmen doing the work rather than a consideration of investments in machinery. The building of a wooden airplane helps to enhance the dignity of manpower using tools.

FOOTNOTE

1. An experiment was tried in the 1960's. From an altitude of 10,000 meters over Paris, a Caravelle-type aircraft cut off its two jet engines. The airplane glided and landed at the Dijon Airport, in Burgundy, or approximately 300 kilometers away from Paris. Another example mentioned on 9 July 1980 on Radio France International stated that a heavy carrier such as the Airbus could cover 150 kilometers should its captain decide to turn off the engines at an altitude of 10,000 meters.

Photograph of the Hitsikitsika next to an Antonov 26. The twin engine airplane should not be confused with the four-engine Antonov-12. Here the "Hitsikitsika" looks quite small.

The "Hitsikitsika" is equipped with an improved Volkswagen engine, properly located in the nose. The twin-screw propeller is 1.40 meters long. It is made of wood. The Hitsikitsika has no foot-brake but a manual brake.

Do you remember this strange bird? That was the "Hitsikitsika" in the 26 June demonstration in Mahamasina. This airplane is very maneuverable and its flexibility enables it to perform impressive flight tricks.

The photograph properly shows the two seats of the "Hitsikitsika." The cockpit is open and the double controls are clearly visible.

MMM PLANS STRATEGY TO RECOVER DIEGO GARCIA

'A Vessel for Diego Garcia'

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 30 Jul 80 pp 1, 4

[Text] "A vessel for Diego Garcia." This was the idea put forth yesterday by the MMM at a forum organized by the Mauricius Association of Students in Chemin Grenier. "It is time for all parties, the islanders and the sympathizers with the cause of return, to think of chartering a vessel to sail to Diego Garcia, thus calling world attention in original fashion to the occupation of this part of Mauritian territory and the problems of the islanders." This, in substance, is what the secretary general of the MMM, Paul Berenger, said at this first forum of the Mauritius Association of Students, held in the Rialto Cinema and attended by some 700 persons.

Mr Berenger stressed the "total demilitarization" of Diego Garcia and the Indian Ocean, warning those present against the presumption that once the United States has withdrawn from the Diego Garcia base, the Soviets will move in. The representative of the PSM, Mr Kishore Deerpalsingh, for his part, denounced "the blame borne by Sir Seewoosagur Ramgoolam in this matter, while the other two participants, Mr Eddy Ramdass (son of an islander) and Mr Alain Laridon, of the United Workers Federation (FTU), provided the background on the occupation of Diego Garcia by the Americans and spoke of the deplorable conditions in which the islanders live.

Mr Berenger, speaking of the idea of sending a ship to Diego Garcia, noted that this proposal, repeatedly suggested by the opposition in the legislative assembly, had always met with "the prime minister's irony." The MMM, he said, had even asked a delegation of parliamentarians to travel to Diego Garcia in order to see what is happening there. The main problem encountered with regard to the chartering of a vessel is the risk of seizure by the Americans. However, Mr Berenger added, the committee of islanders should consider this idea and its chances of success. He also said that for his part he would take certain steps to make it a reality.

Earlier, Mr Berenger had made a point of denouncing the role played by the PMSD [Mauritian Social Democratic Party] and the PT [Labor Party] in this whole affair. "History has shown," he said, "that the PMSD is the main culprit in the exclusion of Diego Garcia from Mauritian territory." The secretary general of the MMM stressed that this party has always "come out in favor of a Western base in the region,"expressing disagreement only on the matter of the amount offered in exchange. After speaking of the immediate reaction of India, which has indicated its disapproval, Mr Berenger said that the prime minister could not say now that he did not know that Diego Garcia would be made a military base. He cited as proof a statement to this effect made on 10 November 1965 by Mr Greenwood, then colonial secretary. This was exactly 2 days after the exclusion of Diego Garcia, which he said would be used "for defense purposes by the British and United States governments."

He then went on to discuss how the islanders were forced to remain on Mauritius beginning in 1968. In that period, some had come to Mauritius for medical care and were subsequently prevented from leaving. And when they were all sent back to Mauritius Island, the government, which was solely responsible for their transfer, established no structure at all to accommodate them. The whole attitude of the government toward the islanders is "a crime against humanity," this speaker exclaimed.

In conclusion, the spokesman of the MMM stressed to those present that four aspects of the Diego Garcia problem merit emphasis: 1) its immense wealth, fishing, minerals and other possible development, and 2) the military aspect. In this latter connection, Mr Berenger said, the MMM believes that the United States should withdraw and that at the same time the Soviets too should leave the Indian Ocean. 3) The tremendous human problem posed by the islanders, whose living conditions should make the government ashamed. And 4) the problem of the country's sovereignty. The speaker said that all patriots should do everything to ensure the return of Diego Garcia to Mauritius.

In this connection, Mr Berenger said that the MMM "has no faith in the International Court of justice." He referred to the judgments handed down by that court against France, which have not been implemented at all. The problem for the MMM is that this court "does not have the means of enforcing its judgments."

Mr Kishore Deerpalsingh, the representative of the PSM, spoke of the forced evacuation of some 1,600 islanders and the "criminal responsibility" of the government toward them. The islanders, he said, live today in the most abject poverty, while a government statement dated 10 January 1973 said that houses would soon be built for them with playgrounds, a community center and schools. This statement, which specified that such projects would be carried out at Pointe-aux-Sables and Roche Bois, also mentioned the facilities which would be provided to the islanders for livestock raising and vegetable growing. Seven years later, none of this has been done, Mr Deerpalsingh stressed, except for the payment of laughable compensation, and even that some 200 persons have not received.

In the view of the PSM representative, it is the prime minister, whom he called a "lackey of the imperialists," who is mainly to blame. He also denounced the attitude at that time of the PMSD, which refused to participate in the constitutional conference. History will judge these two parties as the two main culprits in this sad affair.

After denouncing the laxity of the government in the struggle to regain Diego Garcia, Mr Deerpalsingh also came out in favor of the demilitarization of the Indian Ocean.

Mr Eddy Ramdass, a member of the Joint Islanders Committee, and the son of an islander, described the history of the history of the deportation of his compatriots to Mauritius.

It should be noted that at the beginning of the speeches, the chairman of the forum criticized Mr James Burty David, who was invited to participate personally, for his absence.

Diplomatic Success for the MMM

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 7 Aug 80 p 4

[Text] Mr Jean-Claude de l'Estrac, the MMM spokesman on the international campaign to develop support for the return of Diego Garcia to Mauritius, expressed satisfaction yesterday with the results of the mission he undertook in recent days abroad in this connection. Mr de l'Estrac returned to the country Monday after raising the question at a pan-Arab conference, explaining the issue to French and British political leaders, and informing the international press about the Diego Garcia problem. He spoke yesterday, during a press conference at which Mr Paul Berenger was present, of the "diplomatic success of the MMM." Moreover, Mr Berenger will travel further in Europe and Africa, while Messrs Aneerood Jugnauth and Kader Bhayat, president and vice president of the MMM respectively, will travel to India shortly to pursue the party campaign on this issue.

Mr de l'Estrac participated first of all in an international symposium held in Beirut from 23 to 25 July on the initiative of the permanent secretariat for solidarity with the Arab peoples and their main cause, Palestine, on the subject "Egypt 10 Years After Nasser." "This conference," Mr de l'Estrac said, was "an overwhelming success," both in terms of the number of delegations participating and in terms of the quality of the speeches. The work of the symposium made it possible to establish a documented report on the situation prevailing in Egypt today, characterized according to Mr de l'Estrac by "ferocious repression" of every form of opposition to President Sadat's regime. There was much discussion of the Camp David agreements and their effects on the Arab world.

On the subject of the campaign for the return of Diego Garcia, it "began most auspiciously," according to Mr de l'Estrac, and has been enriched by a major diplomatic victory for the MMM. In fact, Mr de l'Estrac was able to get this question placed on the agenda for the Beirut conference, which enabled him to make a substantiated explanation of the entire question, after which the participants unanimously approved a resolution supporting the Mauritian claim, as proposed by the MMM, for the return of Diego Garcia. This was the first time, Mr de l'Estrac remarked yesterday, that an Arab conference has taken such a clear position on the matter. Thus, following the resolution approved by the OAU at the last summit meeting in Freetown, there is a powerful Arab-African bloc supporting the theses of the MMM on the matter. It was this which led Mr de l'Estrac to speak of the "diplomatic victory" of his party.

The Diego Garcia problem has aroused such interest that following the work of the conference on Egypt, Mr de l'Estrac was given a special invitation to participate in a working session of the permanent secretariat. It was decided there to hold an international conference on security in the Arab Gulf and the Indian Ocean, with particular reference to Diego Garcia, before the year's end. It was also proposed that this conference be held in Mauritius but "in view of the numerous reversals of the government on this matter, this will not be possible," he said.

Other International Meetings

In addition to this conference on the Indian Ocean, other international meetings were scheduled during the sessions of the permanent secretariat. There will be a conference on solidarity with the Libyan Jamahiriya from 30 August to 1 September, to which 500 foreign delegations will be invited; a conference on solidarity with Syria; the holding of an "international day of solidarity with the Palestinian people" is scheduled for 24 November; and finally, there will be an Arab-African conference which may be held in Zimbabwe. Not only has the MMM been invited to participate in all of these gatherings, but it will be working closely with those organizing these efforts.

After visiting Beirut, Mr de l'Estrac went to Paris, where he had talks with the officials of the leftist parties, including the French Communist Party (PCF), Socialist Party (PS) and Unified Socialist Party (PSU). The representative of the PS in particular stressed his party's intention of raising the question of the return of Diego Garcia at an imminent meeting of the European parliament. In addition to the discussions with the political parties, Mr de l'Estrac also met with a certain number of newsmen, and in the weeks to come, articles on the whole of the problem will appear in the international press, including AFRIQUE-ASIE, JEUNE AFRIQUE, L'HUMANITE, LE MATIN and LE MONDE.

After visiting Paris, Mr de l'Estrac traveled to the British capital, where he also made profitable contacts with the British Labor Party. He met with a journalist and professor of international relations at the University of London, among others, and that individual will in the future provide the MMM with active support there. An article on the return of Diego Garcia has already appeared in the INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE under the heading "Mauritian Politician Seeks Restitution of Diego Garcia," and a second will come out in another British newspaper, THE TRIBUNE, in a few weeks. Mr de l'Estrac also made contact with a "very represenative" British organization pursuing a campaign against nuclear armaments in England and in Europe. It promised to support the MMM by distributing information provided by the MMM in Europe.

In Beirut, Mr de l'Estrac granted two interviews, again on the same problem, to the Syrian newspaper AL THAORO and the Italian newspaper PAESE SERA. In the course of these interviews and his meetings with political leaders, Mr de l'Estrac made a point of pointing out the governmental doubletalk on the problem of Diego Garcia, which he said has aroused "considerable indignation."

Assignments of Other Leaders

Mr Paul Berenger, for his part, announced that the MMM campaign will be intensified with the assignment of other party leaders abroad. The MMM is meeting now with the leaders of the two islanders' organizations so that along with the campaign for the return of Diego Garcia, one can be pursued to benefit the islanders, obtaining compensation for them, to which they are in fact entitled, from the Mauritian and British governments. At the end of the month of August, Messrs Aneerood Jugnauth and Kader Bhayat will visit India, where they will meet with political leaders, while Mr Berenger will go to the Seychelles next weekend. He hopes to visit Tripoli at the end of the month to participate in the conference on solidarity with the Libyan Jamahiriya to which Mr de l'Estrac referred, before proceeding to London, Paris, Zimbabwe, Tanzania, Mozambique and Madagascar.

Mr Berenger explained that the MMM is especially interested in President Ratsiraka's proposal and is favorable to the idea of an international conference on the demilitarization of the Indian Ocean in 1981, but it would like to know more about it, particularly since an international conference will be held on the initiative of the United Nations in Sri Lanka in 1981 on the same subject. Mr Berenger plans to discuss this first of all with Messrs Albert Rene and Ratsiraka in order to try to prevent the two superpowers from sabotaging the Sri Lanka conference, insofar as this is possible.

Mr Berenger hopes to be able to join other MMM leaders in their efforts personally, for unfortunately it is possible that in connection with the first anniversary of the 23 August agreement ending the strike last year, he may be obliged to "join directly and personally" in any action on which the GWF [General Workers Federation] may decide. The secretary general of the MMM did not want to say more on this subject.

In conclusion he announced that the MMM has already sent a message expressing its solidarity with the Palestinian people and protesting against the "renegade law" of the Israeli parliament making Jerusalem the capital of the state of Israel in fact, a decision condemned by the United Nations and all the countries which desire a peaceful settlement of the problem in the Middle East.

MMM STRATEGY ANALYZED BY LABOR PARTY LEADER

Port Louis THE NATION in French 27 Jul 80 pp 1-3

[Text] How is the political situation in Mauritius developing? Eighteen months from the expiration of the parliamentary term, the MMM is attempting to give itself a new image. It is seeking "to reassure" by turning to Michel Rocard, one of the leaders of the Socialist Party in France, while at the same time claiming it is adhering to the "hard kernel" of its program in order to avoid an explosion at the base level.
Mr James Burty David, president of the Labor Party, analyzed the new trend within the MMM and the development of political events in recent days in an interview granted to THE NATION.

[Question] For some weeks, the MMM has been pointing to a new orientation in its policy in favor of social democracy. In what context do you place this new strategy?

[Answer] In attempting to set itself apart from its past, the MMM is finding itself again in a whirlwind of confusion and ideological contradiction. At the very beginning, the MMM was launched as an anti-electoralist movement, urging direct democracy, and going as far as preaching the recall of those elected, no matter when, and dreaming at a given time of making the island of Mauritius into a "little Cuba" in the Indian Ocean. It missed no opportunity to propagandize "the base" against the sworn enemies, which was how it then regarded the private sector and the whole bourgeois clique. Today, in the view of the leaders of the MMM, these positions adopted are but a wave which has passed, a distant reference, while "the base" for its part is entitled only to such nostalgic phrases as "the MMM program remains basically the same" and "the conditions under which the MMM wants to build socialism remain the same." One might be surprised, after a brief analysis, to see that even such phrases have undergone changes. I would cite for example two statements made at the MMM congress on 13 July. "The MMM must thus adapt its program in order to deal with certain realities," and "the MMM is destined to change to a certain extent, once in power."

It is a question of knowing along what line the MMM has embarked. What does this change mean? What is its nature? The MMM, its leaders say, has "evolved." It is surprising to note that even Mr Maurice Paturau, who was interviewed last Thursday by Finlay Salesse, says that "the MMM has evolved." Now the word evolution has become a catch-all for the MMM, a password used precisely to justify everything, even the most obvious contradictions and deviations.

The strategy is obvious. Berenger himself told LE MAURICIEN: "The MMM has been trying to provide reassurance for years. To do this, the MMM has had to accept the break with radical theories while stating that the 'hard kernel' remains inviolable. It claims it is 'doomed to change' while maintaining that the MMM retains the same strategy, the same ideology and the same program." The party appeals for popular and trade-union mobilization while flirting with Messrs Mervyn Coombes and Maurice Patarau. It rejects the concept of the "dictatorship of the proletariat" while urging the workers' struggle. It rejects the USSR as an "anti-model of socialism" while stressing that the aid of the USSR will be needed by the MMM to build socialism in Mauritius. It talks of the danger coming from the "domestic and international right wing" while claiming to be ready for "dialog with the devil." It asserts its Third-World commitment while condemning Libya, Algeria and Mozambique, calling some of their experiences "errors" and "excesses" (without explaining which). It has always claimed to respect freedom and democracy while claiming that it has become (and thus is now) "more tolerant with regard to the cadres and intellectuals." And this is the mire of contradictions in which the MMM finds itself today. In trying too hard to rid itself of its past, the MMM is not succeeding in finding its place in the present. It is this whole accumulation of vaguenesses that the MMM so proudly calls evolution. It is obvious that if the MMM has sought to reestablish its virginity, it is for strictly electoral reasons.

[Question] The MMM terms the socialism of the Labor Party "electoralist socialism." Is such an interpretation justified?

[Answer] The MMM has tried, and awkwardly moreover, to project its blemishes and weaknesses on the Labor Party. Not only has the president of the MMM engaged in a superficial analysis, stating that the socialism of the Labor Party is only electoralist, but he has vainly tried to conceal the deviations of the MMM. It is the socialism of that party which is electoralist. I would like to answer your question in two parts, showing first that it is the MMM which is using the socialist vocabulary for electoral purposes, and then to refute the weak argument of the president of the MMM.

Let us take some examples of the profound changes in the MMM, to begin with, the private sector. After having supported the owners' "lockout" in July of last year, the MMM recently expressed satisfaction at the presence of Mr Mervyn Coombes at the head of the MEF [Mauritian Employers Federation], the owners' union, and termed Mr Maurice Paturau, the coordinator of the private sector, a man with an "open mind." In this connection I would like to recall that Mr Paturau himself, speaking of nationalization, said the following to LE CERNEEN on 7 December of last year: "It is not by means of some harebrained criticisms and fake nationalizations that the private sector can be deflected from the path it has always set itself." And in this new embrace with the private sector, the MMM is nurturing great dreams of love. It sees a private sector which will exist for many long years yet, and playing the ardent admirer, condemns what it calls "the anti-private-sector hysteria," going on then to agree that "the great revolutionary upheaval" will not take place. What is still more surprising is that Mr Maurice Paturau had also stated on 7 December 1979 to LE CERNEEN that "some, in order to reestablish their political fortunes, have claimed that a revolutionary change in structure was indispensable for our recovery. Now nothing could be more false!" These are very surprisingly coincidental statements, you must admit.

Also, look at the changes in the foreign policy. After having stated openly that USSR aid will be needed by the MMM to build socialism in Mauritius, after solemnly explaining that "the danger for a socialist MMM government in the Indian Ocean would not come from the Soviet Union" (J. Claude de l'Estrac in WEEKEND, Sunday, 17 July 1978) and after having tried to make of the island of Mauritius a "little Cuba," the MMM is launching a war against the USSR, accusing it of providing the world with a caricature of socialism. In the same breath, the MMM criticizes all of the Eastern countries for having "falsified and contaminated" the concept of the dictatorship of the proletariat. It makes a clean sweep of communism, which it calls "dictatorship." Following these repudiations, the MMM represents Rocard as its new mentor and told Richard Luce, who visited us recently, that if the MMM ever wins power, a closer rapprochement with Great Britain can be expected. The MMM is thus wiping out a period in its history in which it urged its members to demonstrate at the Saint-Jean roundabout and at the university against Princess Alexandra, the symbol of neocolonialism, it claimed. It continues ironically to boycott the ceremonies for the inauguration of the Legislative Assembly, which are too imbued with British traditions, it believes. One could never finish the long list of reversals and contradictions, but I wanted to point out these two most striking examples.

Socialist Struggle

As to the socialism of the Labor Party, it no longer today needs to be demonstrated. Our lengthy history bears firm witness to the work we have done for the benefit of the workers' class. Dr Cure was able to say in 1963 that "the history of trade unionism in Mauritius is merged with the history of the Labor Party." The long socialist struggle of the Labor Party has included profound revisions in the constitution to allow the workers' class to be represented in the Legislative Council, the right to organize in unions at a time when talk of trade unionism was taboo, more humane regulations in industrial relations, the creation of democratic structures, the introduction of social security and pensions, the struggle for national freedom through the extension of the right to vote and respect and freedom for others. We would be the first to admit that this struggle is not ended. There remain still other fortresses to conquer and our past is the guarantee that we will be able to take charge of the workers' struggle. Our struggle has not ended: it is dynamic and the present circumstances are challenges we are capable of meeting. All the struggles, from 1936 to the present day, have been but a succession of tests of strength to bring us closer to the goal--greater social justice. We must push capitalism toward the crisis in order to prevent its adaptation at the rate of successive changes toward the socialist ideal.

The president of the MMM who was on the side of the Labor Party during the period of the struggle for independence should know that for us, socialism is neither an abstract theory nor electoral propaganda. He would do better to engage in the criticism of his own party today.

[Question] Can the MMM as it is today truly embark upon the path of socialism and draw closer to the Labor Party?

[Answer] The MMM would do well first of all to put order into the positions it has adopted, which are now more than ever entanged and confused. Lindsay Riviere, in his editorial in WEEKEND on Sunday, 20 July, wrote with justification that the MMM has situated itself in a "permanent blur" and that its ideological congress seemed to have raised more questions than it resolved.

[Question] With the new trend within the MMM, how do you foresee the political future of the country for the coming years?

[Answer] It is no longer possible to establish the true nature of the MMM, now that it has made such statements as "the MMM is destined to change," "the MMM will continue to correct its aim," "the governmental program of the MMM must change in order to adapt." Following the recent ideological gymnastics, other stunts are certain to follow. However, in adapting to reality, its slogan, the MMM seems to have cast off the mantle of intransigence and militant action to put on that of flexibility and accommodation. With this as a basis (desire to adapt, to change, to correct its aim, etc), many compromises by the MMM become possible. When it comes to change, we have recently seen how far this party is prepared to go. After clasping to its bosom the representatives of the owners' class and after the public admission that a dialog with even the devil could be foreseen, no further ideological surprises are possible from the MMM.

[Question] The Labor Party electorate demands certain changes within the party and in its political approach to settling certain questions on the national level, including transportation, water and housing. Can the Labor Party meet the challenge?

[Answer] The Labor Party must meet the challenge. It has met greater ones in the past. Since 1936, the party has undergone innumerable and immeasurable tests of strength. Events have shown that we were right.

Water and transportation were very serious problems 2 years ago. I would not say that we have totally overcome these difficulties, but we are beginning to see the light at the end of the tunnel. Housing is still a thorny problem. Every means must be put to use to resolve it.

Where the changes the labor electorate is demanding within the party are concerned, I believe that they are justifiable. Our supporters want to see the Labor Party struggle with militant determination and without compromise against those monopolizing our national wealth. They are entirely right and they should ask this commitment without reservation from us. The day the Labor Party and the workers' class cannot identify one with the other, our struggle will have no meaning. This is why I demand of our supporters unrelenting exigence in order to prevent our becoming bourgeois or deviating. As to our political attitude toward the various problems, it must, while taking the requirements of the moment into account, go beyond them, moving inexorably toward our socialist goal.

David and Goliath

[Question] As president of the Labor Party, you are pursuing a campaign for a better-defined housing policy, which puts you in open conflict with Minister Francois. Doesn't this battle between David and Goliath risk hindering relations between the two parties?

[Answer] My campaign for a better housing policy is in fact based on two different approaches. As negotiator for the CHA Employees' Union, I am combating this mismanagement which has led to the fact that 760 cottages are standing empty today awaiting tenants at a time when the housing problem is acute. I am combating that indifference which has resulted in the fact that houses have been built on marshland in Flacq and Saint Pierre. As a politician profoundly imbued with socialism, I stand beside the widows, pensioners and other impoverished groups who cannot pay the price increases imposed. As you say, this campaign has somewhat hindered relations within the coalition. I must say that it is necessary to avoid clashes. What would be harmful and irreparable above all is if our relations with the people were hindered. This must not happen.

The Pirates

[Question] The prices of rice, flour and bread have just been increased. Isn't this a harsh blow for the working class and in contradiction with the socialist policy of the government?

[Answer] Yes, it is a harsh blow. The government must find ways of compensating for this new erosion of the purchasing power. However, it is not solely a matter of being for or against, but of analyzing this increase within the context of a world economy thrown off balance. Since 1973, the economy on the international level has become capricious and unpredictable. The government authorities in Mauritius must give a straight explanation to the people of the reasons for this increase, with supporting figures.

The opposition pounced on this increase to attack the government. It has a very short memory if it does not recall that last year, during the famous "civil disobedience," the committee of 30, which included a number of members of the opposition, submitted a memorandum to the minister of finance demanding among other things elimination of the subsidies for rice, oil and flour. In 1976, the opposition demanded the elimination of subsidies on these foodstuffs during the debates in the assembly. Thus they should not shed tears today.

However, it is not isolated solutions which will resolve the price problems in Mauritius. It is necessary to be bold enough to take the national assets where they are to be found and to share them with the vast mass of the workers, the cadres and the people of the middle bourgeoisie. Modern pirates have monopolized our assets. It is our duty to take them back.

[Question] There has been much talk in the past of a possible coalition with the MMM. Does such an alternative still exist, above all with the changes urged by the leaders of the MMM?

[Answer] In politics, all situations exist potentially. They take shape according to the demands of events.

The Rocard Line

[Question] What do you think of "the Rocard line" currently being urged by the MMM?

[Answer] Rocard has suddenly become the mentor of the MMM, which has sought to make of him the author of "economic austerity," and "self-managing socialism." Finlay Salesse wrote naively in LE NOUVEAU MILITANT last Thursday that "in 1972, it was as if a light dawned in the PSU. The result of its labors was a concept which will flourish--that of self-managing socialism." This ignorance of socialist thought is surprising. Self-managing socialism does not date from 1972, much less is it the "product" of Rocard. We recognize his contribution to the socialist struggle in France, but this does not make him the author of a new socialist tendency capable of becoming an historical reference point in itself. If the MMM wanted to take Rocard as its inspiration, nonetheless, it overlooked the essential point--modesty. In seeking to establish a socialism never seen elsewhere in Mauritius, the MMM is ignoring Rocard's warning. I will quote it: "This is why, since it will not have tested the validity of its proposal in experience in government, self-managing socialism must evidence an additional quality--modesty."

I would also like to recall that the MMM makes no reference to other socialist experiments in the Third World. I am thinking, for example, of this new concept of populocracy in Libya, the analyses of Sanrir Amin, the experience of Sekou Toure, the socialist thinking of Nehru and Nasser. These are all trends which should inspire us in our daily struggle.

FRENCH NAVAL COMMANDER DISCUSSES INDIAN OCEAN PROBLEM

Port Louis LE MAURICIEN in French 8 Aug 80 pp 1, 4, 8

[Interview with Vice Adm Philippe Lejeune, commander of the French naval forces in the Indian Ocean, by Jean-Clement Cangy, date and place not given]

[Text] Vice Adm Philippe Lejeune, commander in chief of the French naval forces in the Indian Ocean, granted Mauritian newsmen a frank interview yesterday. The potential and role of the French forces in the Indian Ocean, French policy in the region, the strengthening of the American base on Diego Garcia, demilitarization of the Indian Ocean, French interests on the scattered islands in the Mozambique Channel, the stationing of troops on the island of Reunion--these were the subjects brought up with the admiral by LE MAURITIEN during this press conference.

On the policy of France in the Indian Ocean, Vice Admiral Lejeune said that its goal is "the maintenance of peace in this region."

On the American base in Diego Garcia: "I do not see Diego Garcia really becoming a fundamental strategic base. It is useful as a relay supply base . . . Diego Garcia has modest and limited means."

On the demilitarization of the Indian Ocean: "A very desirable thing. But one must not be carried away by the magic of words. Total demilitarization of the Indian Ocean is unfeasible."

On the scattered islands in the Mozambique Channel, ownership of which is claimed by Madagascar and Mauritius: "Currently there is a de facto situation. The fact is that these islands are French."

[Question] Some observers believe that the French forces in the Indian Ocean are contributing their support to the Americans there. What is the real role of the French forces in this region of the world?

[Answer] I believe that to specify the role being played by the French forces in the Indian Ocean, it is useful to go back a little in space and ime. You know that for 24 years now--since 1966--the armed forces of France have been withdrawn from the integrated military organization of NATO. But France has remained a member of the Atlantic Alliance (which has rallied the riparian maritime powers of the Atlantic Ocean since 1947), and thus it has obligations as an ally to the member nations of this pact. The meaning of this action is that France believed it had an independent path to pursue and that this independence of action meant that military actions would not necessarily be strictly linked with those of its allies. I believe that this provides the framework for our actions in relation to those of the Americans. It is true that in the Indian Ocean, the commitments to the riparian nations of France and the Americans are not necessarily the same. We are currently in a period of crisis. The implications of the various crises are not strictly the same for us and for the United States. It can be seen that the activities of the French forces in the Indian Ocean are totally independent of those of the United States. They do not have the same goals. They are not concerted. I would add that the consequences of this are very clear in fact, and that for about a year now, following the events which occurred in Asia, we have seen a very substantial strengthening of American and Soviet forces in the Indian Ocean, while the activity of the French forces has not changed because of that, and the size of the force in use has not changed either.

LE MAURICIEN: Does France then have a specific policy in the Indian Ocean?

[Answer] Yes. I would answer this question in relation to what is under my control. It is not for me to establish the general policy of France here. In my activities I try to serve that policy. Where the French navy is concerned, the first thing we seek to achieve is to encourage the maintenance of peace in the Indian Ocean insofar as possible. I know that this is the concern of all the riparian nations. This is one of the main guidelines of our activity.

France has a certain number of commitments in the Indian Ocean. The first is the very existence of Reunion, which is a French department. Thus if there were any threat to Reunion whatsoever--I know of none at the present time--it would be a matter of defending it.

The second thing France has to do is supervision of the exclusive economic zone around Reunion. And I was happy to see the publication recently in the French government journal of the Franco-Mauritian agreement on the delimitation of their respective economic zones.

The third point on which the navy is active with regard to Reunion is the whole complex of what we call the actions of the state at sea. A riparian nation has a certain number of responsibilities with regard to the sea which surrounds it. These responsibilities have to do with the safeguarding of goods and persons in the event of accidents at sea. These are the rescue operations in which we are directly involved. It also involves accident prevention--I am thinking above all of hydrocarbon pollution accidents. Finally, there is the matter of aid in castrophes. I would add that the French navy has been given responsibility for the Omega radio navigation station in Reunion.

The other focus of interest for our activities in the Indian Ocean has to do with the existence of the Republic of Djibouti, with which we have defense agreements. We have a responsibility to aid the government of Djibouti to safeguard its independence and stability. This is why we have troops stationed on the territory of Djibouti. We are helping the young Djibouti army to get started. We are its allies in a defensive position.

The third aspect of our activity has to do with the substantial maritime traffic crossing the Indian Ocean in all directions, which is essentially oil traffic, not to speak of other raw materials, including ores.

France believes that it is very important that this maritime traffic can function in full calm and that it be protected from stress. And under these conditions, we regard a naval presence as a factor in keeping the peace.

LE MAURICIEN: In brief, you are there to protect the oil routes, among other things.

[Answer] Protecting the oil route is saying a great deal. I do not believe we can say that the few gendarmes we have in France on the highways protect traffic on them. I think nonetheless that if there are a few gendarmes on duty, things go better! Moreover, France regards it as very important to have friendly and peaceful relations with all the riparian nations in the Indian Ocean. We are trying to be a factor in peace.

LE MAURICIEN: Isn't there a paradox in stating that you are working to keep the peace in the Indian Ocean while sending warships there?

[Answer] I would say to you that the state of Mauritius seems to me basically peaceful. I think that the state is working to maintain peace in the cities of Port Louis and Curepipe. Is it then a paradox to see gendarmes or policemen there?

LE MAURICIEN: In fact, there are a number of policemen today in the Indian Ocean--the Soviets, the Americans, the French. Isn't there a rivalry among the powers?

[Answer] The French have no intention of rivaling either the Americans or the Soviets on the level of power. It is not for me to assess what is happening between the Americans and the Soviets where their naval presence is concerned. That is not my business. I note that the level of their military presence has increased considerably in the past year. I must say however that the level of the French presence has not changed. The French potential has remained stable for about a dozen years. But until last year, it was the most significant naval presence. But since then, when the Americans sent aircraft carriers to the northern part of the Indian Ocean and at more or less the same time the Soviet presence increased substantially, the naval presence of these two countries became much more substantial than that of France, which has remained stable. But I have difficulty seeing, if at a given moment some troublemaker or other (I am not thinking of any nation in particular) were to create trouble by using blackmail on maritime traffic, for example, how it could be combated if a minimal means of action were lacking. I do not see how a police force would be credible if, no matter what happened, no policemen were ever armed. A policeman carries a weapon so that he will be respected, but he should do everything possible to avoid using it. However, it should be very clearly understood that if the need to use force arises, he will do everything possible to make the most effective possible use of it.

LE MAURICIEN: How do you view the strengthening of the American base on Diego Garcia?

[Answer] I do not feel that it is very serious. I am not familiar with Diego Garcia. I have never been there. But I do not believe that it could ever become a strategic base which would revolutionize the conditions of military action in the Indian Ocean, because the land surface is too small. If I were the American admiral responsible for naval operations in the zone, I would find Diego Garcia convenient enough for my air transport, my communications. It is useful as a supply base, as a stop, as a midpoint.

I do not see how Diego Garcia could really become a fundamental strategic base, if you will. I have read here and there that Diego Garcia would become a very important base for attack, but from what I know of it--and I repeat that I have never been there--the facilities on Diego Garcia are modest and limited, and I absolutely do not see it becoming a very important base for aggression.

LE MAURICIEN: How do you view the problem of demilitarization of the Indian Ocean?

[Answer] It is a very desirable thing. I think however that one must not be carried away by the magic of words. I think it is inconceivable to think of the total demilitarization of the Indian Ocean.

I think that any riparian nation and any nation having major interests in the Indian Ocean would want to have there a military force allowing it to demand respect for its sovereignty and its major interests. On the other hand, if the military forces remain at a reasonable level, allowing respect for the sovereignty and the actions of the state at sea, there is always the risk of tension, and that tension could become a serious conflict. What is dangerous in all the zones of the world, in fact--and it is true for the Indian Ocean, as elsewhere--is deploying military forces on such a high level, accompanied by political crisis, that there is a risk of explosion one day.

I think that total demilitarization is something of a utopia. The reduction of military means and tensions is a goal toward which one should work.

LE MAURICIEN: It is solely in the eventuality of a reduction of forces that you could conceive of a future withdrawal of French forces from the Indian Ocean?

[Answer] You are asking me a question there which is really outside my domain. It is not for me to define the military policy of France. That is the duty of the president of the republic. I think however that any reduction in tensions results in the reduction of the means provided to deal with them. I cannot tell you what the intentions of the French government with regard to the French presence in the zone might be.

LE MAURICIEN: Admiral Schweitzer said some time ago that "France has a fortune in the Indian Ocean. One does not leave one's wallet lying along the road unguarded." Does this explain the interest of France in the scattered islands in the Mozambique Channel, ownership of which is claimed by Madagascar and Mauritius?

[Answer] Listen. This too is a political matter which does not concern me. Currently there is a de facto situation. The fact is that these scattered islands are French. I know that! Where the economic zones are concerned, I do not believe that the inventory has been entirely concluded. I cannot tell you much more on this subject.

On the other hand, there is an exclusive economic zone, and that is entirely clear, the zone around Reunion. And in this kind of business, it is necessary to ensure respect of its rights and to settle matters peacefully with its neighbors. This is what we have done with Mauritius by delimiting the respective exclusive zones where there was a conflict between the Mauritian zone and the French zone.

LE MAURICIEN: You mentioned the case of Reunion a moment ago. You must know that the French military presence is criticized by certain public opinion sectors in Reunion which regard it as an intimidating force, at a time when, they say, a process of decolonization is beginning on the island. What do you think about this?

[Answer] I note that for the moment Reunion is a French department and I do not see why the stationing of some troops in a French department constitutes a provocation of anyone whatsoever. Moreover, if you look closely at the size of the troop contingent stationed in Reunion, I do not see to whom this could be a provocation or a threat. In Reunion there are, roughly speaking, one regiment, two transport planes and some support facilities for French vessels. I think that the average density of the troops in Reunion is probably the lowest of any of the French departments.

LE MAURICIEN: Do you regard the French forces in the Indian Ocean as a dissuasive force?

[Answer] I sincerely believe that our forces are dissuasive. First of all, if you will, the French strategy in the world as a whole is entirely defensive. In this connection it is currently pursuing no expansionist plans, no hegemonistic efforts, seeking solely to allow France to live in peace, and in respect for a certain number of international commitments. I believe that if you have a defensive strategy, it is inevitably dissuasive. In other words you are seeking to prevent a troublemaker from disturbing your calm. In this sense, our forces are dissuasive. Dissuasion functions on all levels. It utilizes all means. And in some cases, if you seek dissuasion, to prevent a troublemaker from disturbing your peace, you will have to strike. I will take the previous example of the policeman. From time to time he comes along with his ticket pad. This is already a small blow in a policy of dissuasion. In other cases, he uses his billy-stick. Sometimes he must use his gun or summon all the police in the country.

Real dissuasion, if you will, seeks to show what action can be taken. In this sense this French policy, designed as dissuasive, is also active.

Our naval presence is a manifestation of our desire for peace, but it would make no sense if our vessels were not armed and capable of acting. All I hope is that we will not need to use the weapons.

I also think that there is too much of a tendency to associate the word dissuasion with the word nuclear. But a defensive policy is infinitely more dissuasive when it can rely on nuclear weapons, which are a serious matter and lead to reflection.

BOTHA SAYS NO ELECTIONS THIS YEAR, REASSERTS WHITES' RIGHTS

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 15 Aug 80 pp 1, 3

[Excerpt] Potchefstroom -- Prime Minister P.W. Botha has announced that several ministers will be serving in the Presidential Council. At the same time he also indicated that he is not going to hold a general election this year.

At a gathering of the Nationalist Party here the prime minister told a crowd of about 1,000 enthusiastic party members that the government is now approaching prominent South Africans (whites, coloreds, Indians and Chinese) to serve in the Presidential Council which is going to be an influenctial body.

The chairman of the Presidential Council, who will also be South Africa's vice president, is going to be an illustrious person and the Prime Minister's Department will be providing secretariats to the Presidential Council so that, with its balanced composition, the council will be providing the government with valuable advice.

The prime minister said that many people had read a certain English language Sunday newspaper which stated that a general election was to be held in May of this year. When this did not take place the newspaper speculated that he would not hold a general election in September, and the latest is that he will be setting an election date in November. The prime minister wants to make it clear that there is not going to be an election.

The government is going ahead with a great deal of work, which of course it must do, and at the appropriate time after the [words illegible] to get the confidence of those who stand behind South Africa.

There was loud rejoicing when the prime minister stated that the white people of South Africa have the right to govern themselves and to have their own schools and residential areas, because he believes in a friendly and faithful nationalism which also holds the other people of South Africa in respect.

SOUTH AFRICANS WARNED AGAINST MUGABE'S PROMISES

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 18 Aug 80 p 10

[Editorial: "ANC and PAC in Zimbabwe"]

[Text] Reports that the African National Congress and the Pan-Africanist Congress have both banned South African terrorist organizations and will probably be allowed to open offices in Salisbury, do not come as a great surprise. Although Zimbabwan Prime Minister Robert Mugabe has already stated on several occasions that he would not allow terrorist bases against South Africa in his territory, he actually has been promising moral support to the terrorist organizations just as regularly.

The question now arises as to just where Mr Mugabe is going to draw the line between moral and active support if he should in any sense be allowed to make decisions alone in this respect. Although he may be very sincere, there are far too many Marxist extremists in his party leadership who would be only too glad to get involved in a struggle against South Africa. There is also the Tekere affair which, whatever the legal decision may be, will demonstrate how firmly Mr Mugabe stands in the Chamber.

It is impossible to see how Mr Mugabe will be able to physically prevent the establishment of ANC and PAC bases. There are large areas of Zimbabwe where armed dissident groups will have their way; these being areas where even the police and the security forces will not dare enter. If the Zimbabwan authorities cannot even control these regions, how can Mr Mugabe be able to restrain the ANC and the PAC effectively, especially if these organizations still enjoy the support of some of the local inhabitants?

These are factors which South Africans must keep in mind. The attack against South Africa will be increasing in violence and those who seek this country's downfall will not easily be stopped by Mr Mugabe's talk. It is vital, therefore, that all South Africans continue to strive for a greater measure of preparedness in order to resist this attack.

NIGERIAN PRESIDENT'S VIEWS ON AFRICAN ECONOMY CRITICIZED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 21 Aug 80 p 14

[Editorial: "Sweep in Front of Your Own Door"]

[Text] This week two reports with an interesting interrelationship were received rather accidentally within a few hours of each other.

One report from Lagos concerned the opening speech given by the Nigerian head of state, President Shagari, in the course of a conference of jurists from the confederation. In the course of the speech he dwelt on the existing gap between the rich and the poor of the world, or between North and South, as this is now being called. He accused the rich northern part of the world of being concerned only with nuclear problems while "poverty, like the nuclear bomb, has the potential of destroying the world." He stated that the fact that the rich industrialized countries wade in wealth and luxury, while the poor underdeveloped countries suffer from hunger, can no longer be condoned.

The other report is from Geneva and deals with the account prepared by the International Labor Organization on the conditions in Africa south of the Sahara. In the light of this ILO report leaders such as President Shagari should be counseled to sweep in front of their own doors before they reproach the "rich North." This is especially applicable to President Shagari whose country is now receiving enormous amounts of money for its oil.

According to the report there are now in Africa great inequities in the area of wealth and education. This can lead to the growth of rigid class differences which can perpetuate poverty and inequality in this part of the world.

According to the report, two thirds of the total income ends up in the pockets of 20 percent of the population of the various countries of Africa, and the gap between rich and poor is becoming increasingly wide. Much too often education is designed to meet the requirements of children of well-to-do families and health services are too expensive for the poor.

The report also points out the general malady of investing a lot of money in modern capital intensive industries and neglecting agriculture.

A few days later Nigerian scholar Dr Adebayo Adedegji, who heads the UN Economic Commission for Africa, also warned about the failure of developing agriculture. Today's serious food shortage, he stated, "is the result of 20 years of neglect and wrong policy." He regards it as ironical that Africa is now experiencing a food shortage in light of the fact that this is pre-eminently an agricultural region which 20 years ago produced enough food for its own consumption.

It is not the North's fault that now there is too little food.

ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES OF LAND REAPPORTIONMENT DISCUSSED

Capetown DIE BURGER in Afrikaans 18 Aug 80 p 11

[Text] Johannesburg -- A reapportioning of land could lead to more job opportunities for people within the borders of black national states and to a more significant economic structure.

This is the view expressed by Mr A. La Grange, senior economist of the Bureau for Economic Research, Collaboration and Development (BENSO), in a publication which appeared this weekend. In this publication he and other colleagues discuss the progress of black development from the point of view of researchers who provide counseling on policymaking.

Four possible methods are being followed, and according to these, land redistribution could produce benefits. First of all, the borders of black states could be brought closer to growth points in the white area.

Secondly, a few white towns could be included as growth points in black states.

Thirdly, some of the black residential areas could be included in black states.

Recognition

Fourthly, by reapportioning land a system of joint management of industrial growth points at border areas (collaboration areas) could also be rendered possible.

Underlying all four possibilities is the recognition that it is impossible to create enough jobs at or near the border of black states for allowing a meaningful number of people to live in the region.

Mr La Grange says that with respect to borders close to white areas the greatest success with decentralization is attained in regions located near white growth points. Thanks to government help a development axis has already been developed north of the PWV-region. This runs from Rustenburg over Brits, Rosslyn and Babelegi. With additional help this can be extended to Bronkhorstspruit, Witbank and Middelburg.

Competition

While the distances between Bophuthatswana, KwaNdebele and Lebowa on the one hand and Bronkhorstspruit, Witbank and Middelburg on the other is very great, this is the only solution for drawing the borders of the national states closer to white regions.

With regard to the inclusion of white towns in black areas, Mr La Grange stated that certain growth points in South Africa sprung up long before separate development came into being. The regions were not included in black national states when these were formed. The black states had no chance to compete with such growth points. The possibility of incorporating such areas into black states must be examined. The recent announcement with respect to Mafeking is a positive example in this respect.

With regard to black residential areas in white regions, he states that there are already so many people living there that it has become impossible ever to send them back to their own regions. One method of settling them in their own region is to make the region in which they live a part of the black state.

Cheapest

Providing jobs for a large number of people in their own area is certainly the cheapest conceivable method.

As for the joint control of border regions, Mr La Grange says that often the black states express the view that such a development is taking place at the expense of the development of their own states. Moreover, they must provide the infrastructure for their side of the border, yet they do not share in the profits of the border industries. Regions of collaboration must therefore be considered.

A.A. Lighthelm, another senior economist of the bureau, states in an article that not less than 50.6 percent, or 9.9 million, of all the blacks lived outside of the black areas in 1978.

Fundamental

"The solution must not only be given fundamental consideration and presented semantically, but any solution must also be apllicable in terms of the objectives that are being sought," he writes.

In the reality of homelands development and demographic distribution the solution of the problem of relationship in South Africa cannot be obtained in the concept of complete area separation.

The economist continues, "The creation of separate freedoms on a national basis, which must be the point of departure for the thinking which revolves around a constitutional solution, must thus be limited to separate political freedoms.

"The solution of the problem of relationship in South Africa is not to be found along the path of creating a series of separate economies, but rather along the way of economic collaboration and a system of separate political sovereignties or political separateness."

The concepts of a constellation of states in southern Africa and also a council of states represent subjects which are now under consideration.

The idea of a constellation need not find expression in a large formal organization immediately. Rather this suggests a grouping of states having common interests and a willingness to work together.

In contrast with a constellation of southern Africa in which Zimbabwe, Botswana and Malawi could possibly be included, there is considerably greater economic interdependence, technological and infrastructural integration and the granting of developmental aid between the states in the traditional South Africa.

BRIEFS

TEKERE REMANDED--The Minister of Manpower Planning and Development, Mr Edgar Tekere, and seven of his bodyguards made a brief appearance before Mr J. Makaza at Salisbury Magistrates' Court yesterday. They were remanded to appear again tomorrow. Mr Tekere and his bodyguards, Abel Bakochera, Gwinyai Chimbadzwa, Gibson Matayamanja, Joseph Chakanetsa, Abby Nyenganyenga, Crispen Zvenyika and Soul Gomo are facing allegations of murder and attempted murder. VACANT FARMS--The Deputy Minister of Lands, Resettlement and Rural Development, Mr Moven Mahachi, said yesterday it was not the intention of the Government to acquire farms already being productively run for its resettlement programme. Addressing the Wenembi Intensive Conservation Committee at the Ruzawi Country Club near Marandellas, Mr Mahachi said the Government would rather look to vacant or under-utilised farms near heavily populated areas. He added that a considerable number of farms have already been offered for sale to the Government, more than the Government had had funds for. Resettlement was not a crash programme, he said. It required planning, availability of funds and suitability of the land being bought. He praised the role being played by the Department of Agricultural Development in restoring and improving peasant agriculture. Although priority was being given to the intensive resettlement schemes, the more sophisticated types of resettlement scheme were not being overlooked, he said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Sep 80 p 2]

IRON, STEEL POTENTIAL--The iron and steel industry in Zimbabwe showed "tremendous potential in the light of the changing political situation in Zimbabwe," Mr John Rheim, a Risco planning engineer, told the mining section of the economic resources conference yesterday. Mr Rheim said new development projects being considered would, if put into action, greatly expand the industry and extend its life. As it was, the influence of the industry was felt in every aspect of Zimbabwean life. Iron and steel production employed a considerable number of people and those manufacturing industries who depended on steel employed many more, he said. This was a far cry from the days before 1938, when all iron and steel requirements had to be imported. It was then that a group of Bulawayo businessmen started the first smelter in the country to melt down scrap metal. Under the auspices of the Government, the forerunner of RISCO was started in 1942, with the first blast furnace being commissioned at Redcliff in 1948. Since then, a further three furnaces had been added to cope with the ore extracted from Redcliff itself and that mined at Buchwa in the South-East of the country. At present, the local market required between 18 and 25 percent of the total iron and steel production. The remainder was available for export, said Mr Rheim. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Sep 80 p 13]

CHROME RESERVES--In the years ahead the United States and Europe should be looking more strongly at moving their chrome production plants to Southern Africa, Dr Donald Slatter told the mining section of the economic resources conference yesterday. Dr Slatter, of the Zimbabwe Mining Research Institute, said 97 percent of the world's chrome reserves were in this area. Taking the official estimates which were conservative, Zimbabwe's reserves stood at about 560 million tonnes, compared with the rest of the world's reserve of 90 million tonnes, he said. Coupled with this was the fact that other world sources of chrome were rapidly being "mined-out." These two facts had important implications for Zimbabwe, he said. The only other producer of chrome in this area was South Africa, whose ore was of lower quality but whose mining costs were lower. However, in the future political considerations might mean investment in that country would be out of the question. Foreign investment in Zimbabwe's chrome mining industry would depend largely on a stable political and economic climate, Dr Slatter said. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Sep 80 p 13]

MEDICAL SERVICES--The Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, yesterday briefed a combined caucus meeting of ZANU (PF) and Patriotic Front Mps on the progress of his Ministry. According to Dr Frederick Shava, the Government Chief Whip, Dr Ushewokunze said the free medical services scheme introduced at the beginning of the month was "getting on very well." ZANLA POLICE FORCE BOOSTED--About 160 ZANLA policemen and security staff arrived in Salisbury on Tuesday from training in Belgrade, Yuboslavia. The men, some of them in dark blue uniforms with red stars on their berets, were flown in by a chartered plane, political sources said yesterday. The sources said the men had undergone intensive police and security training in Yugoslavia and would join more than 300 others who returned to Zimbabwe at the end of May and the beginning of June. There was no official Government comment on the men's arrival and their distribution. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 5 Sep 80 p 13]

PRESIDENT TO VISIT ROMANIA--President and Mrs Banana would pay an official visit to the Socialist Republic of Romania later this month, a Government House statement said yesterday. The visit would be at the invitation of the Romanian President, Mr Nicolai Ceausescu. Dates of the Presidential party's departure will be announced later. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Sep 80 p 1]

RISCO PROJECT--Preliminary work on the construction of a $60 million sinter plant has begun at Risco's foundry at Redcliff. The project should get off the ground early next year. The sinter plant is aimed at recycling large stockpiles of wasted "fines" of ore and coke which have been built up over the years. The process basically converts the fines into lumpy material before the material is put into a blast furnace. The furnace, where iron is smelted out of the ore at around 2 000 degrees celsius, can only accept hard and lumpy material. Fines cause clogging which in turn can put out the fires. A Risco spokesman said yesterday: "The testing and laboratory work is being done on the ore and coke fines to determine the parameters of the sinter plant which must be very carefully designed in relation to the feed material." LABOR SEMINAR--The Engineering Workers' Union of Zimbabwe was to hold a seminar to be attended by trade union representatives from several African countries and Geneva, Mr David Chimusoro, the union's general secretary, said yesterday. He said he expected the seminar to be opened by the Minister of Labour and Social Services, Mr Kumbiral Kangai, on October 8. Mr Chimusoro said the problems facing workers in the engineering industry in Zimbabwe and the role of trade unions in the development of the country would be raised at the seminar, expected to last a week. Representatives from other countries had been invited to advise "us on how to run trade unions efficiently--particularly in a newly independent country like Zimbabwe. We expect to learn more from this seminar, which is the big est yet in the history of our union in Zimbabwe. We are looking forward to its success." Mr Chimusoro appealed to the members of his union to be on guard against bogus trade unionists. "These are con-men and must be ignored. They just want to take people's money under false pretences." [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 11 Sep 80 p 3]

OVERSEAS LOANS FOR INDUSTRY--Medium-term foreign loans are to be used to finance a number of industrial projects in Zimbabwe. The projects are not specified, nor are the sums involved. But Mr Nick Cambitzis says in the Industrial Development Corporation's 1980 annual report, he is confident the funds will be forthcoming after talks during the last four months with overseas financial institutions. In his chairman's statement he says: "By the end of the year a number of agreements will have been concluded with the corporation for the provision of foreign medium-term loans at reasonable rates of interest to approved industrial developments in Zimbabwe." For the last financial year the IDC has turned in a record $2,4 million operating profit, an increase of 40,5 percent on 1979. Net profits almost doubled to $2 043 120. Results would have been higher had the IDC not been hampered by having a high proportion of its funds tied up in short term investments which yielded an average interest of only 3,8 percent. The corporation's balance sheet, however, shows it to be in a healthy state with net assets of $33,5 million (1979--$29,6 million). Reserves rose by 20 percent to $23,5 million. SWAZI AIRLINES TO FLY TO ZIMBABWE, MADAGASCAR

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 15 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] ROYAL SWAZI airlines are to extend their services with weekly flights to Zimbabwe and Madagascar, and in addition they hope to re-open regular flights to Blantyre.

This means that the national airline will be flying Swaziland's flag in a total of eight countries. And there is also a possibility that Royal Swazi might start a regular service to the Seychelles.

This week chief executive Mr. Dan Langeler told Business Times of plans for Royal Swazi which will make the airline one of the busiest in this part of Africa.

He said that a regular service to Madagascar had been launched on September 1. "Subject to the Government's approval, we also intend to reopen services to Blantyre," he said. "And we also hope to start a regular service to Salisbury from November 1."

Mr. Langeler said the Swaziland Government had already given the "thumbs up" for the Salisbury service and he was just waiting for the Zimbabwe Government permit.

Within a few days of the announcement that the Seychelles Government was to halt all flights by South African Airways, Mr. Langeler said he was in telex communication with authorities in the Seychelles discussing the possibility of opening a service. He said: "We're taking a very strong look at the Seychelles at the moment. We have been looking at this possibility for quite a while."

Mr. Langeler praised Swaziland Government officials who had been helping Royal Swazi to establish new routes. He said: "The good working relationship we have with the Ministry of Works, Power and Communications has greatly assisted this airline in going where it's going.

"We get a lot of help from the Ministry and our Board. Whenever we have been able to come up with the right figures they have given us their approval."

Royal Swazi's passenger carrying now exceeds 30,000 passengers a year and in two years the airline has grown from an operation of three flights a week to one of eight flights a week.

And there are even more plans afoot to extend the airline's services into large-scale freight carrying. The present Fokker aircraft is limited in the amount of freight it can carry because of the size of its hold.

"We're considering the possibility of leasing a back-up aircraft and we're studying freight operations," said Mr. Langeler. "There's oodles of freight going north and south. Swaziland has meat, pineapples and all sorts of fruits and vegetables and general cargo to export."

He said he was considering a back-up aircraft which had a "quick-change format" meaning it could be rapidly converted from a passenger-carrying layout to freight-carrying.

He announced that Prince Matatanela who joined the airline last year and who had worked in various departments of Royal Swazi, had just been appointed market research manager.

UNESCO PLANS TO SOLVE AFRICA'S ENERGY PROBLEMS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] UNESCO may help solve Africa's energy problems.

UNESCO Southern Africa regional information officer, Mr Mamdom Thiam Moctar, said this at a news conference held at the regional offices after his arrival in Lusaka yesterday.

Mr Thiam is here to finalise arrangements for Zambia News Agency to communicate information to otner Southern African countries during the 21st session of the UNESCO general conference which takes place in Belgrade, Yugoslavia, from September 23 to October 28.

Mr Thiam said UNESCO had decided to solve the energy problems of the African countries within the context of the research work the organisation was undertaking in various fields.

Avert

"The question of energy problems now facing African countries has been taken care of by UNESCO because there is a strong feeling that something has to be done to avert serious consequences," he said.

Mr Thiam said UNESCO would help in feasibility studies on solar energy in Africa, investments and other technical services to enable African countries to benefit from solar energy.

He said African countries had great potential for solar energy, except that they needed massive investments to benefit from it.

On the selection of Zana to feed other Southern region countries on deliberations of the UNESCO conference, Mr Thiam said this had been done because the news agency had bilateral agreements on the exchange of information with countries like Angola, Mozambique and others.

He explained that Africa's participation to this year's conference will be given extensive coverage as its own reporters would be available, unlike in the past.

Mr Thiam said past experience showed that many Western reporters covering conferences, were more interested in what "America, the Soviet Union are discussing" than in talks by African countries.

This year's conference, he said, would emphasise problems facing the youths and assistance to member countries which want to develop a chosen national language.

Development of an African language, he explained, was needed for promotion of any form of life.

An international commission for the study of communication problems, is another subject on the agenda.

SWAZILAND PRESENTS REPORT TO SOUTHERN REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT CONFERENCE

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] SWAZILAND presented a report on progress on the subject of manpower development for the Southern African region at the Development Co-ordination conference which was held in Salisbury, Zimbabwe, last week.

The report was received by the meeting with appreciation and the recommendations were unanimously endorsed by the Ministers who attended the meeting.

Swaziland was represented by the Deputy Prime Minister, Senator Ben Nsibandze, who was accompanied by officials from the Ministries of Agriculture, Education, Works Power and Communications and the Department of Foreign Affairs and Economic Planning.

The recommendations in the progress report included among other things, the continuation of a survey of existing training institutions in the region and their better use on a regional basis, and also the establishment of a co-ordinating committee and a small secretariat to service the committee.

Other subjects discussed at the meeting covered transport and communications, regional food security and agriculture, manpower development, industrial co-operation, the establishment of a southern African Development Fund, energy and the institutional mechanism for servicing the region.

In all these areas, the meeting reviewed concrete project proposals in the preparation for a Donors' conference due to be held in Maputo at the end of November.

While in Salisbury, the Deputy Prime Minister also met Zimbabwe's Prime Minister, Mr. Robert Mugabe, to whom he delivered a special message from His Majesty, King Sobhuza.

ZIMBABWE TRADE DEAL WITH ZAMBIA REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] Zambia and Zimbabwe were poised for an economic boom, the Permanent Secretary in the Ministry of Commerce and Industry, Mr Kabuka Nyirenda, said yesterday.

In an interview, he said Zambia would soon sign a trade agreement which would strengthen economic relations between the two countries.

Zambia and Zimbabwe were anxious to normalize their relations politically and economically. Preliminary talks on the pact started in May this year when Zambian Government officials met their counterparts in Salisbury.

"These discussions continued during the Zambia Trade Fair and all that remains is to put finishing touches before an agreement is signed."

Accord

The accord would be broadly based to involve Zambia's National Commission for Development Planning, said Mr Nyirenda, who was with the Zambian delegation which attended last week's economic conference in Salisbury.

The conference was also attended by Malawi, Tanzania, Mozambique, Botswana, Lesotho and Swaziland. Meanwhile, Zambia and Malawi are building a railway link costing about $4,5 million.

The Zambian Government recently started a World Bank project involving about $200 million. The project includes the renewal of 112 km of track between Mookamunga and Livingstone, work on the existing Kafue Bridge, installation of a centralized signalling system and replacement and repair of existing diesel engines.

A total of 915 wagons and two cranes which have since broken down will be replaced under the World Bank loan.

ZAMBIA DOES NOT SEEK RELEASE OF FISHERMEN SEIZED BY ZIMBABWE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

THE Ministry of Foreign Affairs is not negotiating the release of Zambian fishermen jailed in Zimbabwe last May for contravening that country's Parks and Wildlife Act, permanent secretary, Mr Peter Kasanda, has said.

"It is impossible for us to do anything because those people were tried and convicted (by a court of law)," Mr Kasanda said.

The 17 fishermen were jailed by a Karoi magistrate when they pleaded guilty to fishing illegally on the Zimbabwean side of the Zambezi river.

The court was told that the men, using boats and nets, caught 3,791 kg of fish in three days and later sold it to buyers from Lusaka and Chirundu.

Originally 27 Zambians were arrested for allegedly committing the offence, but ten of them were released after questioning.

Of the 17 convicted by magistrate, Mr G. Romilly, Rapson Kaponya and Mathew Mafungautsi were jailed for 21 months on two counts and were ordered to pay between them K5,400 to the State while a 12-month jail term imposed on George Leonard Jeffreys, 80, was suspended for five years because of his age.

Eight of the accused were sentenced to 15 months three of which were suspended.

They are Rupenga Lanas, Maxwell Phiri, Phineas Chimuka, Bornwell Moyi, Stephen Kapini, George Tembo, Watson Janana and Vincent Peter.

Seven others were sentenced to 12 months each but had three months suspended.

They are Barman Jeffreys, Samson Pongo, Wilson Kamwata, Mabvuto Daga, Mathew Katobola, Bernard Tembo and John Lupanda.

Mr Romilly ordered Daga, Katobola, Tembo and Lupanda to pay K182 between them.

It was reported last week that the ministry had been negotiating the release of the men and that Mr Kasanda had gone to Salisbury for discussions with officials in that country.

But Mr Kasanda, explained in an interview that if a foreigner contravened the law in another country and was convicted, the convict's home country could not do anything to save him.

"The only thing we can do is secure consular representation to visit the convict in prison or detention. But, there is nothing we can do once they are jailed.

"They can only be deported after serving their prison sentences," he said.

Mr Kasanda, who had just returned from Zimbabwe, said he went there to lead a Zambian delegation to the Southern Africa coordinating conference which took place in Salisbury, "not to negotiate the release of Zambian convicts."

ZIMBABWE EXPORTS BRICKS TO SOUTH AFRICA

Salisbury THE HERALD-BUSINESS HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] ZIMBABWE is propping up the South African building industry, through the export of millions of bricks this year. Besides earning foreign currency the trade is providing much needed business for the hard-pressed industry in this country.

The reason for South Africa demanding our products is because of the unprecedented building boom in the country. Brick manufacturers are way behind in orders, quoting as much as 18 months ahead, and they are turning to any source of supply.

Britain is also supplying South Africa and has offered 100 million bricks — but at a price. On rail to Johannesburg they will cost R310 for 1 000 ($258). Zimbabwe's prices are about $119 for 1 000.

The main exporters have been the Salisbury-based firm of Willsgrove Brick and Potteries. A spokesman said they had been sending bricks to South Africa since the beginning of the year. These were mostly high quality face bricks.

In Bulawayo MacDonald Brothers has also been supplying and is thinking of going into production full-time. At the moment it is largely engaged in low-cost housing projects for the city.

Building sources said this country is so much cheaper than Britain that a "killing" could be made if the brickyards had the capacity. Rail costs to South Africa are about $70 for 1 000, from Salisbury while Bulawayo is $20 for 1 000 cheaper.

Botswana has also helped keep the Zimbabwe industry going and a steady supply for housing is being sent to that country.

Even though costs for South Africa importing from Zimbabwe and Britain are much higher than for their domestic supply, building costs will not rise by much.

An average three-bedroomed house uses 35 000 bricks, representing six percent of the total cost. With inflation it pays a houseowner to build now with imported bricks rather than wait until local supplies are available.

In the first six months of this year Zimbabwe exported a total of 2,3 million bricks which brought in $96 000. Last year's total exports were only 250 000 bricks, worth $13 000.

The South African demand has meant that the yards in Zimbabwe are out of the doldrums to a large extent. There is only low-cost housing going on at the moment with virtually no home building.

The building industry began to pick up recently, especially in Salisbury where building plans approved by the City Council have increased tremendously.

However, these projects take 18 months to two years to come on stream and for the moment builders have to bide their time and seek what work they can.

BRIEFS

ZIMBABWE-SWAZILAND AIR LINK--Swaziland's Royal Swazi Airlines would begin weekly services to Salisbury from November 3, an Air Zimbabwe spokesman said yesterday. The airline's Fokker 28 aircraft will land at Salisbury en route to Lusaka on Mondays, and call again on the south-bound journey the next day. The spokesman said Royal Swazi did not have traffic rights between Salisbury and Lusaka and AZ was not at this stage considering operating reciprocal services. Air fares will be the same as for the Salisbury-Johannesburg service. The F28 seats about 50 passengers. [Text] [Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Sep 80 p 5]

AGRICULTURAL ADVANCES, PROSPECTS EXAMINED

London WEST AFRICA in English 22 Sep 80 pp 1817, 1818

[Text]

THOUGH dissatisfaction at the performance of the agricultural sector is becoming a welcome concern of many governments in West Africa, the complaints that have been made recently in Benin, deserve closer attention. A recent tour of the provinces by Ministers resulted in criticism of the insufficient extention services, of stealing from co-operatives and of excessive bureaucracy.

For Col. Kerekou's regime, the development of the agricultural sector has been one of the principal aims of a government which is keen to see the country become self-sufficient and less dependent on the exterior in its economic development. Since 1976 the revolutionary government in Benin has attempted to impose some more order in agriculture; co-operativè structures were set up gradually. Though government's had tried since independence to instill a degree of communalisation of agricultural exploitation, lack of proper publicity and extension work had merely reinforced peasant apathy. The Kerekou regime then decided on a gradualist approach.

A structural base was thought out which would revolve around the Groupements Révolutionnaires de Vocation Co-opératife (GRVC). In the last four years these have been spreading all over the country. Their aim is to provide for a socialist base for agricultural production. However, given the nature of society in Benin — it is ethnically very divided producing interest groups which are powerful and which have to be respected even if the Kerekou regime has managed to instill a degree of political stability unthought of in the sixties — there has always been emphasis on a gradual approach to change. For this reason, therefore, Benin's changes in the last few years have not been in the limelight but represent an experiment that is worthy of generous attention whatever the difficulties it may be facing at prsent.

The organisation of the GRVC reflects the government's pragmatism. Made up of smallholders and agricultural labourers, they organise work on the land which is communal, with the exception of a small area kept by each peasant for his own needs. While landowners do not lose their title to the land, they do not receive rent. Peasants are free to sell their produce to state or private traders. Experience has shown that in the south the collectives have been far slower in getting off the ground because of the regional disinclination to approach agriculture communally. Furthermore, private traders continue to flourish; in fact, they constitute a major proportion of the service sector of Benin's economy.

It has been generally acknowledged that the reforms in Benin have provided the peasant with a number of benefits; the rational use of collective agricultural land, facilities for mechanisation, improved productivity, the possibility of easier access to short and medium term credits and means by which political and technical organisation can be made easier. Cash crop production though, had been disappointing if one goes by the results of the 1978-79 season. Groundnuts dropped to 1.341 tonnes (a reduction of 1,375 tonnes on the previous season) but the cocoa crop rose to 4,111 tonnes (a rise of 2,738 tonnes) cotton, after a number of bad seasons rose to 18,740 tonnes (and improvement of 3,851 tonnes), karite fell seriously by 8,026 to show figures of 248 tonnes, while palm production rose by 11,632 tonnes to a figure of 23,432 tonnes.

If one takes production of groundnut, palm, cotton and tobacco together it can be seen that while the 1978-79 season showed an encouraging improvement rising to 43,681 tonnes as against the 22,633 tonnes of the previous season, this compares badly with the total of 83,703 tonnes produced in 1974-75 and the 77,177 tonnes produced in the following season.

The recent complaints about the performance of the co-operative sector made by two ministers, M. Garba, the Minister for State Farms, Livestock and Fishing, and M. Azodeghehou, Minister for Rural Development and Co-operative activities, point clearly to the problem areas. Foremost is the spasmodic effect of the extension services. Any attempt to improve production, especially in the context of the reforms desired by the Benin government, requires consistent, diligent provision of extension services. The authorities in the regions were criticised for not co-operating sufficiently with the co-operatives and they suggested that there had been too many conflicts between the co-operatives and the bureaucracy.

A further problem has been the high level of theft from co-operatives. In one region alone, Mono, it was estimated that 30 per cent of production somehow went out of circulation.

There are reasons for government optimism, however: by its pragmatic approach, acknowledging the cultural diveristy as well as the disparate and powerful interest groups — a commercial bourgeoisie in the south and a political aristocracy in the north, the government has not antagonised the peasant. Secondly, there has been a traditional inclination towards co-operative agriculture in Benin. This was reflected in the early efforts of the governments just after independence. A further advantage is that after over a decade of political tumult in which the representatives of the regional interests never managed to establish a system of authority with any permanency, Col. Kerekou has brought to the country a degree of political stability which has permitted the government to look to longer-term economic reforms.

DISPARAGING ATTITUDES TOWARD MOSLEMS REVIEWED

Mecca THE JOURNAL OF THE MUSLIM WORLD LEAGUE in English Aug 80 pp 46-49

[Article by Mustapha Ibrahim]

[Excerpts] The word Ulema which is a plura of alim means scholars in Arabic, the singular being alim, and this term has been corrupted by the Hausas as Malunma plural and Malam singular. This term is loosely accorded to any one who has any sort of book learning, and rarely indicates his degree of learning. In the modern Islamic Ghana, the influence and status of the traditional Ulama, who, in actual fact, are not qualified Ulema is gradually being whittled away especially in the urban centres. But those who have done intensive work in traditional Islamic disciplines still hold a great position in the Islamic community and the Muslims cannot resist their impact.

MOI SAYS CHINA, KENYA SHARE COMMON PROBLEMS

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 15 Sep 80 p 4

[Article by Cornelius Nyomboki]

[Excerpt] President Moi called on the super-powers to stop violating the territorial integrity and policital independence of the Third World to achieve their own selfish ends.

Speaking at a banquet given in his honour by Chinese Prime Minister Zhaop Ziyang, President Moi said: "The Third World must not accept perpetuation of these injustices and inequitable relations. [as published]

Mincing no words, the President declared: "Politically the major international institutions are effectively controlled by a few powerful nations. Although almost all Third World countries are now politically independent, they continue to be seriously disadvantaged and exploited in the economic field."

Referring to Kenya and China as sharing common problems, President Moi said as a group we press for the acceptance and establishment of a new economic order, equitable international relations and respect for the accepted principles of international law and behaviour.

He noted that the Third World must be allowed to participate fully in all decisions that affected their peoples, stressing that Kenya and China should give great weight to the fact that they belong to the same group of countries which for many years have been downtrodden. The President pledged Kenya's full support in seeing that all forms of colonialism, oppression and economic suppression by the super powers was eliminated.

Criticising big powers for spending a lot of their money on building up arms stocks, President Moi said: "One feels so unhappy about today's trends and developments at the international level.

While today many people were suffering from hunger, and other social problems in the Third World, some powerful nations were spending huge quantities of valuable resources on the sterile and dangerous programme of stock-piling armaments," he said.

President Moi observed: "Peace and stability will not come from acquisition of more and more arms, lasting peace and stability can only come from human contentment in each and every country".

Economy

Kenya, he added, strongly believed in disarmament and in using the resources and technologies available for human development. In this connection, he declared, the 1980s would either be years of great achievement or a truly dangerous period for the human race.

President Moi said the purpose of such State visits as he was making was to enable him to exchange views and ideas on many matters including seek-economic co-operation.

He pointed out: "At the bilateral level, Kenya and China have co-operated in a number of projects and, during this visit, we shall look forward to signing a number of agreements to facilitate even closer co-operation.

He said Kenya was grateful for the offer given by China of constructing a national sports complex in Nairobi.

BOY: NOVEMBER COTU ELECTIONS UNLIKELY

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 15 Sep 80 p 4

[Excerpt]

COTU'S elections are now unlikely to take place as planned in November.

The majority of affiliated unions will not have completed their national elections by that time, Cotu secretary-general Juma Boy said yesterday.

Mr. Boy was speaking in a telephone interview with the NATION from Kisumu where he was attending the elections of the Kenya Tailors and Textile Workers Union.

He said less than 10 of the 30 affiliated union's had so far completed elections. These include the National Seamen's Union, the Dockworkers Union, Agricultural Plantation Workers Union, the Kenya Pilots Association, Shoe and Leather Workers Union, Amalgamated Metal Workers Union, Engineering Workers Union and Building and Construction Workers Union.

The Quarry and Mineworkers Union is to hold fresh elections after the original election was nullified by the Registrar of Trade Unions.

Another high-ranking Cotu official, who requested anonymity, told the NATION: "The earliest date I can foresee Cotu elections is the end of the year."

GOVERNMENT RAPS PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE'S STATEMENT

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 13 Sep 80 pp 1, 24

[Text] THE Kenya Government yesterday issued the following statement:

"The attention of the Government has been drawn to a statement carried in yesterday's issue of the "DAILY NATION" in which the so-called Parliamentary Defence and Foreign Relations Committee rebuked some segment of the Kenyan Press and, by insinuation, some other leaders for having expressed their disgust at the anti-Kenya propaganda that has been coming from some neighbouring countries.

"While the Government would not wish to muzzle any person or group of persons from expressing their views on the various issues of national or international concern, it would, at the same time, not condone situations where groups of individuals assume an air of authority to censure others in the due excercise of their rights to make their views known, or in legitimate performance of their office.

"The Government wishes to state that the so-called Parliamentary, and Foreign Relations Committee has no mandate, leave alone authority, to make any statements on behalf of either the Government or the President of Kenya and would have wished to know whose views the group of six MPs was airing.

"On the one hand, Parliament is not in session, and the group cannot therefore convince the Government that their views were those of the majority or the entire National Assembly.

"On the other, the group should have taken its own advice of being content with the statement made by the Foreign Minister and should not have appointed itself Kenya's Foreign Affairs spokesman.

"All said, however, any person or group of persons holding the belief that putting the name of the President of our Republic into ridicule is a good joke must be seen as contemptuous of the reverence and esteem to which the Head of State must be held.

"Likewise, anyone who feels that vile utterances against this country should be excused and let to continue unabated cannot be a true son of this land, leave alone a follower of Nyayo.

"Anybody who feels that Kenyan leaders over-reacted to the slanderous attacks vented against Kenya must be seen to be in sympathy with those anti-Kenya elements operating from across our borders.

"It should be the concern of every Kenyan when an incongrous band of people in a neighbouring country should have the courage to slight on our nationhood, so jealously guarded by His Excellency President Daniel arap Moi.

"It is even worse when this amorphous band speaks from borrowed courage.

"It is therefore necessary for everybody to understand that His Excellency the President has created in his Government proper machinery through which the country's stand on various issues, defence and foreign relations included, can be stated. The Parliamentary Defence and Foreign Relations Committee is not part of that machinery.

"The Government would also wish to appeal to the Press to try to understand more clearly Kenya's interests." —KNA

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL OPERATION TO OPEN WILDERNESS

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 16 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] ONE of Kenya's last wildernesses looked at the weekend as though it had been finally opened up after a major international operation involving troops and civilians.

A cable link has been established with the unique Central Plateau of the dormant Susua volcano enabling scientists and explorers to examine the area in detail.

Experts are predicting that the plateau — which has been cut off from the rest of Kenya for centuries by a massive circular gorge — will reveal a multitude of unusual plants and animals and possibly provide an important future tourist attraction.

A 1,250-feet steel cable was stretched across the gorge to act as a lifeline for a team which will camp on the plateau. Although only 40 miles west of Nairobi, the central area of the volcano has eluded explorers over the years. The deepness of the gorge, lack of water and the daytime heat have prevented people from staying there for more than a day. And the heavy vegatation has made air supply drops difficult.

But now the multi-national Operation Drake, in co-operation with various Kenya Government agencies, plan to use the cable to ferry quantities of water and other supplies to a scientists' camp, enabling them to stay for days, even weeks, at a time.

The work was carried out by young explorers, which included several Kenyans, and a team of British Army Royal Engineers.

"The site is unique and has been like a lost world over the years", said Lt.-Col. John Blashford-Snell, who commands the project.

"Its isolation and its unusual vegetation means there could be some surprising findings."

The Operation Drake team hopes to establish a camp in the next couple of days on the central plateau.

MINISTRIES MUST PROTECT CITIZENS FROM 'GREEDY LANDLORDS'

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 16 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] The way some landlords are collecting rent these days leaves a lot to be desired. Their actions are brutalising wananchi unnecessarily. These crooks are hiring thugs to collect rent for them, and do a lot else. Early last week we carried a tragic story of tenants who were attacked by seven hired thugs when they were sleeping. The thugs came armed, not just to beat up the tenants but also to remove doors. They terrorised the tenants for several hours, beating children and adults alike so systematically that none escaped without a cut, a bruise or a broken bone. These tenants were beaten by people acting on instructions. The landlord argued that they had not honoured his quit notice. For their part they argue, quite consistently, that they were looking for alternative accommodation, but that, given the short notice and the generally tight housing situation, they had not succeeded.

In the middle of the week, in Mombasa, a magistrate authorized a landlord at Maweeni Kongowea to demolish houses occupied by 70 families who he claimed owed him rent arrears totalling 24,000/-. The demolition squad was hired by a court broker. Lawyers have assured us that the tenants, who were kicked out at night, will also be required to pay for the demolition costs! Whatever the legality of the eviction, is it fair to evict tenants at night and at the same time destroy their belongings? Even if they were squatters, why were they not allowed to take away their belongings? The sentiments expressed by the Mayor of Mombasa, Coun. Rajab Sumba, that the people were "subjected to downright humiliation and harassment under the pretext for law" are noble, but they do not in any way help the poor tenants.

Towards the end of the same week 600 people were evicted by hired agents at Mbotela, Nairobi. Here again the agents broke down doors and physically manhandled the people. These tenants were waiting for a rent dispute hearing on September 20 before the Rent Tribunal, yet the landlord chose to hire people to brutalise the tenants. It has been reported that the tenants, who work for one company, used to have their rent paid by the company. The landlord broke this arrangement so as to get a chance to raise the rents since it is easier to harass individuals than to tangle with companies, who usually insist on written contracts being honoured.

The Mayor of Nairobi reacting to the earlier Nairobi evictions, said the incident highlighted the activities of "get-rich-quick greedy and selfish landlords that was giving Nairobi a bad name". Although we agree with him about the reputation of the city, we think the issue of people being mistreated is much more important than the reputation of our august capital. It is in this context that we are encouraged by the action of the Provincial Commissioner's office in Nairobi about the Mbotela evictions. We are told it has instructed the DO of the area to reinstate the evicted tenants until such time as alternative housing is found for them. We hope that in future any landlord who humiliates wananchi in a similar manner is taken to task in a similar manner.

In the past, it seems, law enforcers and other authorities have been seen by the landlords to always be on their side. In the first case cited, the landlord went to the police and denied having sent the thugs! The police are therefore stuck. In the Mombasa case, the local MP Said Hemed, had to travel all the way to Nairobi to make representations to the authorities.

Nobody denies landlords the right to get a fair return on their investment. As Mayor Kahara said last week, tenants have an obligation to pay reasonable rents mutually agreed between them and the landlords. If this fails, there is always the Rent Tribunal to arbitrate. What is not acceptable to the people of this country is the practice of throwing tenants out in the cold even when their side of the story is valid. They are entitled to decent treatment even though they are poor. The molly-coddling of crooks should end since the way they treat Kenyans is not in keeping with the aspirations of this country.

It is time the Ministry of Local Government as well as the Ministry of Urban Development and Housing get together and define legal and administrative ways of protecting wananchi from greedy landlords. They should ensure that the kind of abuse which is being inflicted on tenants by crooks is stopped immediately. The law on rent enforcement needs updating to protect tenants. Buy also important is the need to find ways and means of controlling land speculation, which is the single most important cause of runaway rent increases, and by implication some evictions.

Many landlords are important people. Perhaps this explains why the authorities are reluctant to apprehend them. Even if this is the case it is still wrong that they should act as they wish and they must be made to comply with the law, as nobody is above it.

INDUSTRIAL PRODUCTION SYSTEM MUST BE LOCALIZED

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 13 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial]

[Text] PRESIDENT Moi has challenged the University of Nairobi and the National Council of Science and Technology to advise the Government on how the country should manufacture industrial spareparts and thereby save foreign exchange. It is important that this challenge be taken up by these and other institutions, who, in some respects, have more to do with production than either the University or the council.

Spareparts for machinery needed in this country are usually imported at fantastic cost. The reason is simple: We do not have a machine-tool industry worth talking about. This is a basic weakness of our economy. The blame for this is shared equally by the Government, the private sector and the technical schools and, perhaps most important, the technical professions. All these have in the past been import-oriented — whether one talks about ideas, designs or methods of organising production. For a long time, when they saw a problem the natural response was to run to some overseas country where they knew a similar problem had occurred.

They never approached industry to try and convince it to start fabricating the desired items. Industry, for its part, found it more profitable to trade in items made in other countries. This mentality was also encouraged by official credit schemes which, in their own way, favour the distributive rather than manufacturing trade. It is important to note that the emphasis on distributive trades is tied to the historical fact that Africans were not allowed into commerce in the colonial period and that, as the political pressure for Africanisation of trade mounted in the Sixties, they moved into this sector since it was relatively easy. Some members of the foreign communities quit general trade to go into semi-processing, but because of their own political insecurity they do not appear to be keen to tie up vast amounts of capital in a machine-tool industry.

In this context it becomes necessary for the Government to rethink its approach to industry. So far emphasis has been on building small-scale industry in the rural areas. This is commendable, but they need to be oriented to locally-produceable machinery. Also, some of them should be made to produce simple tools which are needed in those rural communities. Facilities to repair equipment in the rural areas also represents an opportunity for some rural industries to be supported by Government programmes. So far there is very little activity in this sector and individuals can usefully be spurred to invest in it.

Perhaps the most potent policy instrument the Government possesses to start forcing engineers industrialists and consumers to think about spareparts self-sufficiency is drastically to reduce the allocation of foreign exchange for the importation of such spares. If this is done a lot of the money tied up in spareparts imports and storage will be released for investment in their manufacture. This will also force users to go to designers to get local substitutes created for fabrication here. This should even make industry consult local engineering talent both at the university and in the professional bodies, something they have been reluctant to do in the past.

The issue of spareparts also raises a much more serious question about the myriad types of machines we import. Those who have studied this problem argue that at some point we must begin to indicate areas where we need standardisation of machinery. Such an approach is desirable from a cost-cutting point of view. It would reduce not only the cost of importing the original machinery but also of setting up a repair and spareparts system. Again, this is an area to which the bodies charged with the responsibility for allowing imports should exercise themselves.

Many students of the activities of the professions in Kenya have uniformly reached the conclusion that all professions show a fantastic bias for things foreign. The usual explanation is that they were trained overseas and that they never sat down to think out the application of their training to local conditions. This is an area in which the University can make a fundamental contribution since it is producing a significant proportion of our national manpower. They should be trained always to think of local conditions.

When they come out we expect them to be better than the older generation whose values and intellectual preferences were moulded abroad. However, as our society is still dominated by the older generation, which continues to be foreign-oriented, one must point out that our young, local-oriented professionals have a hard struggle ahead as they try to sell their ideas to a fossilised older generation. This is where the President's and the ruling party's leadership will be important in the future. Our people must be told in clear terms that there is need to localise the industrial production system by using indigenous talent for design and production. This message will, however, only be taken seriously if the political leadership is seen to be committed to the idea.

Universities the world over are created to lead society in basic research and teaching. It is most encouraging that President Moi has reiterated this yet again in the Kenyan context. All that remains now is for the University to become more creative and to come up with concrete proposals on this important issue.

KTDA CONSTRUCTING PLANTS, EXPANDING PLANTING

Nairobi DAILY NATION in English 13 Sep 80 p 5

[Text] The Kenya Tea Development Authority is to construct 11 new tea factories at a cost of Sh. 22 million.

Five of these will be ready this year. They are: The Iriani Tea Factory in Nyeri, the Gatunguru Tea Factory in Murang'a, the Theto Tea Factory in Kiambu, the Kapset Tea Factory in Kericho and the Sanganyi Tea Factory in Kisii District.

The rest will be ready by next year, Agriculture Minister G. K. M'Mbijjewe said in a speech read on his behalf by Assistant Minister Patrice Ivuti at Baraton, Nandi District, during the West Rift Valley Tea Growers field day.

Mr. M'Mbijjewe, however, said farmers should grow enough tea to provide the new factories with enough tea leaves.

He said the KTDA had now entered its fifth plan under which the planting of 25,000 acres was under way.

At the end of the plantation programme in 1982, the total tea acreage under the KTDA will be 135,140, the Minister said.

He called for co-operation among the tea growers, the KTDA and Government officials to ensure the success of the programme.

Speaking at the occasion, Nandi DC Ben Makosewe said farmers in the district expected to harvest two million bags of maize this season.

ESSENTIAL GOODS LIMITED--Only Kenyans will be allowed to trade as wholesalers and retailers in essential commodities in future. This was one of the moves announced in Mombasa yesterday by Commerce Minister Eliud Mwamunga in a bid to place business in local hands. Mr. Mwamunga also said that no trader will be allowed to operate both wholesale and retail trade with effect from next January. The measures, he said, would enhance Kenyanisation and involve more Kenyans in business. Addressing the Coast branch of the National Chamber of Commerce and Industry, the Minister said the Government was determined to spread business activities among Kenyans and his Ministry would employ all measures to achieve the objective. DOE ASKS 'TRADITIONAL FRIENDS' TO INCREASE AID

Doe's Radio Address

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 10 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Excerpt] The Liberian Government has appealed to her "traditional friends" to increase their level of assistance to meet our pressing needs, "many of which border on the survival of the state."

In his radio address this week, Head of State Doe thanked all friendly governments that have given moral, material and diplomatic support since the revolution. However, he said "while we appreciate the efforts of our traditional friends, we are disappointed over the level of assistance thus far received from them.

"Our traditional friends", he declared, "are quite aware of our pressing needs..... yet, many who call themselves our friends, have not gone beyond token assistance. Their interests, which we continue to protect in Liberia, require them to do more."

"As we continue to stand by the principle of genuine non-alignment, I must make it known that if more serious efforts are not made at increasing the level of assistance given us by our traditional friends more especially military equipment, we will have no alternative but to seek aid from other sources that are prepared to help us," he added.

Friends Should Come to Aid

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 10 Sep 80 p 2

[Editorial]

[Text] IN AN EFFORT to get financial assistance from abroad to help the PRC Government meet its commitments to the Liberian people, the government had to adopt certain measures, such as imposing more taxes and tightening the belt to generate funds to meet the basic requirements of our economy.

HAVING RESORTED TO these, assistance has been forthcoming, but not to the extent as to give us that thrust which would put vibrancy into the revolution and get the country moving faster .

ANYTIME THERE IS a revolution or social change, a nation stands at the crossroads. This is the time true and genuine friends are looked up to for guidance and for succour. Once at the crossroads, it is the direction to which a country finally turns that would determine its course of history in the coming years.

LIBERIA STANDS AT the crossroads today. And there is no doubt that she is in dire need of assistance. There is a teeming army of unemployed, there are spattering slum areas throughout the city which cry out for development, there are roads needing repairs, and there are villages yearning for roadways to market .

ON TOP OF it all, there is the vexed problem of improving the conditions of the people by giving them better housing, adequate food at cheaper price, and a quality of life that would provide them the incentive to be productive and self-reliant.

WE RECOGNIZE THAT we cannot by ourselves succeed with our meagre resources at hand, thus, we expect that those whose friendship we have long cherished and to whom we have offered our hospitality as co-partners in progress, should now come to our aid in a far greater measure as the occasion demands.

THE LIBERIAN REVOLUTION, it must be repeatedly made clear, is not directed against any group of people, but is intended to wipe away the unwholesome features of the past which were eroding the fabric of our society.

IT IS HOPED that out of the revolutionary debris a new nation would emerge, a nation of equal opportunities, a nation which will give birth to new avenues of growth, development and prosperity.

INDEED, A NEW nation, nutured with the help of our friends – our traditional friends in particular–will never forget to express its appreciation to these nations for helping its people in times of great need .For a friend in need, is a friend indeed .

MEANWHILE, WE APPEAL to all concerned to help foster a peaceful and favourable political and business atmosphere that would encourage our friends to urgently respond to our call for aid .

BOL MANAGEMENT TAKEN OVER BY NATIONAL BANK

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 8 Sep 80 pp 1,116

[Text]

Following a "flight of assets" and insecurity by shareholders and depositors in the viability of the Bank of Liberia, "the only true Liberian bank", the National Bank of Liberia with the assistance of the Bankers' Association of Liberia has taken over the management of BOL.

The take-over, which was effected last Friday came as a result of a request by shareholders of BOL to government that it "take over the ownership of BOL effective as at close of business on Friday, September 5, 1980".

This step, according to NBL sources, is in furtherance of the desire of the government of Liberia and the National Bank to ensure that the interest of BOL's depositors and shareholders be protected and to ascertain the "continued existence of an important Liberian institution".

In a note communicated to the former President of BOL Dr. A. Romeo Horton, the Governor of the National Bank, Mr. Charles Greene, informed him that arrangements "for the take over" included an "order to audit the cash, checks and other monetary instruments, securities, books, registers, records and physical assets at BOL".

Mr. Greene also instructed Dr. Horton to have his staff assist with the auditing as required by NBL representatives.

The note also mentioned that effective today's date, NBL authorized representatives would be in control of the day-to-day management of BOL.

"For this purpose, we require that BOL staff of the grade of manager and above should tender their resignations addressed to the Governor, NBL effective as at closed of business on Friday, September 5, 1980. [as published]

He however assured Dr. Horton that "it is envisaged that the majority of these officers will be re-appointed and that appropriate duties and responsibilities will be assigned them".

Mr. Greene concluded his note by rapping Dr. Horton that "I am sure you share with me feelings of relief that it has been possible to resolve the crisis at BOL without a temporary closure of the bank".

After the April 12 coup, the Bank of Liberia like other financial institutions, experienced numerous problems first the flight of assets from the bank, the pulling out of the staff of Chemical Bank which is the parent bank of BOL--based in New York City--and the continuous downward trend in the handling of the affairs of the bank. [as published]

The government of Liberia by virtue of the seizure of assets at the bank of former "corrupt officials" of the erstwhile administration, automatically became the majority shareholder of the total asset of BOL.

DETAILS ON NIC INVESTMENT CONTRACTS NOTED

Monrovia NEW LIBERIAN in English 8 Sep 80 p 8

[Text] Investment contracts totalling $235.6 million for projects in Liberia are being negotiated by the National Investment Commission (NIC) with a number of investors.

This includes an $18 million iron and steel plant for which a contract is being signed between the Government and some American investors.

The NIC is also in the process of concluding negotiations with a group of investors for the construction of a $51 million brewery.

In July this year an investment incentive contract was awarded to the Indo-Liberia Glass Company for an $8.5 million factory. The NIC is awaiting the ratification of the contract by the PRC.

Other investment contracts awarded include the building of a steel rolling mill to manufacture steel rods, etc, and a factory for the manufacture of clay bricks, dry cell batteries, nails and umbrellas. [as published]

Contracts have also been awarded for the expansion of a number of existing enterprises, such as the Liberia Glue Company, the Baker Home Grown Poultry, Maryland Wood Processing, and Monrovia Breweries.

According to reports, Prof. Dew Tuan-Wleh Mayson, Acting Chairman of the NIC, "an important feature of all these...is that they are, for the most part, using local resources. [as published]

He said that for example, the steel plant will use local iron ore, the glass factory will use local deposits of silica sand, and the brewery will use local rice, etc.

Another important feature of these projects, he said, is that NIC has insisted on the companies implementing training programs to ensure early Liberianization of the staff.

"We consider this aspect of the new investment contracts to be of major importance, for this is the only way we can ensure that the necessary technological skills and training are passed on to Liberians," Prof. Mayson was quoted.

FREE EDUCATION PROGRAM 'MIGHT TAX COUNTRY BEYOND RESOURCES'

London WEST AFRICA in English 22 Sep 80 pp 1833, 1834

[Article by Sarcone Bryon]

[Text]

THE GOVERNMENT of the People's Redemption Council of Liberia has started measures to put its free education programme into action, a commitment made to the people shortly after the Revolution, "to bring the country in the mainstream of contemporary African development". The programme aimed at acclerating the belatedly growing literacy rate in the country to maximise the much needed skilled manpower for development.

The overriding priorities of the programme are building schools, employing qualified teachers, training more teachers and providing good facilities for teachers to be able to "upgrade public schools to compete effectively with private schools" in providing quality education for the people. These priorities seek to meet the impending student explosion that might result from the attendance of the majority of the school age population who might take advantage of the programme.

According to the population division of the Planning and Economic Affairs Ministry, of the 1,527,378 school age population in 1979, only 240,076 attended school. The majority of those who did not attend during the period that 71.2 per cent of the 1.7m. population were illiterates in 1979, but the figures receeded to 69.5 per cent in 1980, showing an 11 per cent increase in literacy.

This rate may be acceptable, but is not substantial, given the fact that majority of the literates merely read and write and are handicapped by inadequate availability of facilities to acquire the technical skills needed for development programmes and competitive jobs openings.

The Education Ministry recorded 5,064 school teachers in 1979, but only 1,625 were certificated. The Ministry also recorded 214,193 students .from 1,321 schools during the same year. Schools have been unable to accommodate the growing student population, let alone the impending student explosion that might compound the student accommodation problems.

Estimated to cost $24m. annually, the programme might tax the country beyond its resources, for shortly after the PRC Government came to power, the Planning and Economic Affairs Minister declared that the deposed Government "left the country broke".

But, in spite of the declared bankruptcy of the country, Master Sergeant Doe is unwilling to compromise his Government's commitment and is initiating meaningful measures for its implementation to "lift our people from the dark crevices of ignorance" and to "alleviate the burden of exorbitant fees which cuts deeply into the meager income of our poverty-striken masses".

The Head of State committed the 17-man PRC, to "donate two months' salaries — August and October" — amounting to $76,659.54, to the programme. Two days after the PRC's pledge, Master Sergeant Doe presented a cheque for $150,000 to the Education Minister, Dr. H. Boima Fahnbulleh, also for the programme. This money was retrieved from a local bank as accounts of the defunct True Whig Party.

Master Sergeant Doe had earlier commissioned a committee, headed by the Education Minister, to study the high cost of school uniforms which "imposes unbearable financial constraints on the poor families".

As the first stage of the programme, the Education Minister has "abolished fees for public schools up to high school level". He also declared Government's commitment to "subsidise 50 per cent" of local college students' tuition.

The Education Ministry initiated another measure to enhance the productivity of public school teachers and to provide jobs for unemployed trained teachers. Last July, it sacked "75 persons" otherwise employed and doing part-time teaching at public night schools; many more are expected to be affected in the exercise.

The Ministry has appealed to private schools to reduce fees, "to conform to the Government free education programme." But private school authorities are said to be unyielding and are construing the appeal as an attempt to take over their schools.

The Government spends $3m. annually to subsidise private schools, covering "55 to 60 per cent" of their annual cost. Despite this astronomical subsidy, private school fees are not only exorbitant, but continue to soar. The Government is said to be re-assessing the programme in respect of private schools.

For instance, the Government gives a $300,000 annual subsidy to Ricks Institute, a Baptist Junior College, of which the monthly cost is said to be $25,000. Thus it appears that the Institute is being funded entirely by the Government. But its fees are still said to be so exorbitant that only the wealthy families can afford them.

The programme has earned the Government increased popularity, particularly among the poor. Nevertheless, given the situation of the ailing economy, it needs a "lot of sacrifices" to ensure its success.

But from the uncompromising manner with which the Government is spearheading the programme, the people seem convinced that it is not just one of those political promises they have been accustomed to.

REPORTED MRM SUCCESSES--The Mozambique Resistance Movement (MRM) has claimed in a clandestine broadcast heard by Durban radio hams in the city late on Sunday night to have killed at least 14 Frelimo soldiers and to have destroyed 14 army trucks. The broadcast, which came somewhere from inside Mozambique, claimed the losses incurred by the forces of President Samora Machel had been between July 23 and August 28. The broadcast also claimed that several bridges had been blown up and as a result, many trains derailed. It said the MRM forces had operated near the Mozambique-Zimbabwe border but did not give a definite area. This is the first time clandestine broadcasts have been heard in Durban since May when the Machel regime arrested several MRM members and brought them to trial. Later Mozambique radio reported that the "terrorists" had been executed. [Text] [Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 16 Sep 80 p 8]

OAU DISSENSION BENEFITS NAMIBIA

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Sep 80 p 6

[Text]

THE 1980 SUMMIT meeting of the Organisation for African Unity in Freetown, Sierra Leone, was reported to have come closer to open rupture between moderate and leftist African states than any previous summit.

The summit reached unanimity only on the "decolonisation" of Southern Africa and adopted resolutions demanding economic sanctions against South Africa but failed to resolve the burning issues concerning the conflict in the Western Sahara and the civil war in Chad.

The Africa Institute publication 'Bulletin' reports that much of the summit's time was focused on SA and SWA, particularly the recent attack by SA on Swapo bases in southern Angola.

Other resolutions that were passed concerning SA and SWA were:

- nuclear collaboration between the Western countries and SA
- oil supplies to SA
- the creation of an oil bank for SA's neighbours in the event of an oil embargo against SA
- the question of overflying rights for airlines on their way to and from SA
- condemnation of SA's military action against targets in Angola
- criticism of the Western powers that have continued to support the SA regime, and SWA/Namibia.

With the liberation struggle in Zimbabwe at an end, the OAU has served notice on Windhoek and Pretoria that its entire liberation effort has now been redirected at Swapo and the ANC.

The OAU's future course of action regarding SA is clear — unqualified support for the ANC's challenge of white rule and any new government force that might evolve through consultations between Pretoria and Black "internal" leaders.

However, what might yet be a blessing in disguise for SWA and Pretoria is the fact that a large number of moderate states made a concerted effort to counter moves by the radical group to have the Polisario government-in-exile accepted as a full member of the organisation.

The vehement rejection of the Polisario Front — to the extent that several member countries threatened to leave the OAU — proves that the moderates do not regard their membership of the OAU as sufficiently important to justify continuing subordination to the progressive majority, and that any ideas the leftist progressives may have had if following up the acceptance of the Polisario Front with similar recognition of Swapo and ANC governments-in-exile have been thwarted — at least for the forseable future.

WESTERN THRUST ON NAMIBIA BOGS DOWN

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 6

["Looking Around" column by Jean-Jacques Cornish: "Western Thrust on Namibia Bogs Down in the Sand"]

[Text] THE African bloc's move into the United Nations Security Council following the SWAPO solidarity conference at UNESCO here last week has brought the Namibian diplomatic saga the full circle.

It started with a Western admission in April 1977, that urgent steps were needed to force South African compliance with the Security Council demands for uncontrolled elections in the disputed territory.

While the Africans withdrew, the West put maximum diplomatic pressure on Pretoria. Eventually, the Western settlement plan was hammered out. It was accepted by both SWAPO and the South African Government and embraced by the Security Council.

At one stage, in mid-1978, even militant SWAPO officials were giving their country a 50-50 chance of peacefully gaining its independence.

Then South Africa dug its heels in.

It produced a succession of reasons for delaying implementation of the U.N. settlement plan — which is essentially the Western proposals it had agreed to.

This stalling over issues such as the size of the U.N. supervising force, reciprocal release of political prisoners, details of the demilitarised zone and, now, U.N. partiality for SWAPO, has run the Western initiative into the sand.

Britain, France and the United States — the three permanent members of the Security Council — are thus faced once again with deciding whether to veto an African call for mandatory sanctions against South Africa.

The U.N. charter reserves such action for situations deemed by the Security Council to threaten world peace.

The Western powers remain reluctant to make such a deliberation on Namibia. They are expected, therefore, to block an African sanctions bid if it comes to the vote.

But they know this will be very damaging for them.

They cannot afford to return to the pattern in the mid-seventies of repeatedly and unpopularly using their veto to protect a system they unreservedly deplored.

So they are obliged to demonstrate their recognition of the deterioration in the situation.

At the height of the election campaign, U.S. President Carter must do everything possible to avoid alienating the black vote with what would amount to a vote for South Africa.

His administration has previously toyed with the idea of abstaining on a sanctions vote. But such an ineffectual response will not be popular with the broad mass of the electorate.

'GRATUITOUS'

Even Tory-ruled Britain has little patience for South African delaying tactics. Whitehall officials have been particularly put out by what they see as "gratuitous" language in Pretoria's latest reply to U.N. Secretary-General Dr Kurt Waldheim.

France's traditional unashamedly expedient foreign policy will have it keep its options open till the last minute. But since reluctantly accepting the arms embargo, France has come closest of all three to actually voting for sanctions against South Africa.

All three will be hoping that once again the moderate core in the African group at the U.N. will prevail to offer the Western powers some way, albeit limited, around a veto.

Algerian Ambassador Mahomed Sahnoun, who will lead the Paris conference's delegation to the U.N. spoke about the possibility of a deadline for South Africa.

This could mean the Africans reluctantly agreeing to hold fire to create the opportunity for another Western demarche on South Africa.

Part of the trade-off for this time could be a demand for the disollution of the so-called five-power Western contact group.

West Germany and Canada, who complete the five, were members of the Security Council when the 1977 initiative was launched.

When their membership ended in 1978 they stayed with the group because they were familiar with the issues.

It is difficult to see how West Germany, with its historic ties to Namibia would give up its role.

And the three permanent Western members of the Security Council are the only powers with peaceful, i.e., economic and political leverage on Pretoria.

Their active participation in any negotiations settlement bid is, therefore, vital.

NAMIBIA MAY BE FOLLOWING IN ZIMBABWE'S FOOTSTEPS

Windhoek THE WINDHOEK ADVERTISER in English 19 Sep 80 p 6

[Text]

SIMILARITIES between the SWA situation and the situation which existed in Zimbabwe prior to the Lancaster House talks are becoming increasingly noticeable, according to Dr Mike Hough, Director of Strategic Studies at Pretoria University.

He spelt out his views in the latest issue of the Africa Institute bulletin.

Dr Hough gives two main reasons for his thinking:

- The definite attempt to strengthen the SWA Administration internally by the creation of the Ministers' Council;
- And the more aggressive military policy that is being conducted, reflected in "Operation Smokeshell" and the demolition of the Swapo transit camp at Chitado.

Both the political and military developments could strengthen the power base and credibility of the present SWA Administration, says Dr Hough.

In this sense, he reckons, the assumption in Zimbabwe that Muzorewa did not "deliver the goods" undoubtedly seems to have played a role, hence the attempts to avoid making the same mistake in SWA.

However, it should be remembered that Zimbabwe went one step further and elected Muzorewa Prime Minister of an "independent" Zimbabwe.

Therefore, he says, whether politically speaking the SWA Administration can be given a firmer power base than was the case with Muzorewa, without UDI, is questionable.

The attempt in SWA to strengthen the internal base is seen by critics as a prelude to UDI.

From the military point of view the SWA situation has been marked by increased activity aimed at pre-empting Swapo attacks, disrupting their logistical bases and hopefully deterring future attacks to some extent, Dr Hough says.

He maintains that it has become abundantly clear that the Frontline States, the OAU and seemingly even the UN General Assembly are intent on having a Swapo Government in SWA.

It could be argued that only a Swapo election victory will end the war, as it will at any rate not accept an election defeat, even in an internationally recognised election.

Although, in such a situation Swapo operations would be more difficult, it could still create a problematic situation as long as Angola is prepared to lend support to Swapo.

Regardless of these possibilities, the aim is SWA should be a free and fair election which is internationally recognised. Obviously this would imply Swapo participation in the election, and although it would be preferable for SA to have a moderate government in SWA, a Swapo victory in an election would have to be accepted, he says.

Although internal political developments in SWA and military action against Swapo could give the internal parties a better chance of election victory, the SA aim should still be a free and fair election. Ideally, this can be brought about by the complete cessation of hostilities.

Dr Hough warns however that although internal political developments in SWA and increased military actions against Swapo could strengthen the internal parties, it is not clear whether these developments will bring about LEADING academic and researcher in SA, Dr Mike Hough, argues that SWA could now be moving along a similar road to Zimbabwe and that it would be prudent for the SA Government to achieve a just political settlement as soon as possible, even if it means a Swapo election victory. His views on the subject are extremely interesting.

more acceptance of the Republic's case regarding SWA by the international community, or necessarily persuade Swapo to end its attack. Obviously Swapo will attempt to increase its power base as much as possible before agreeing to participate in an election.

That there is an urgent need for a political settlement in SWA is clear, Dr Hough concludes.

In addition to the increasing call for sanctions against SA, there are indications that Swanu is attempting to forge links with Swapo.

For Swapo, too, a speedy settlement should be important, especially in view of the heavy military casualties suffered in recent months. But it should be borne in mind that the basic assumptions of a revolutionary insurgency movement often differ vastly from what could be rationally expected.

CHIRAC SUGGESTS FRANCE SHOULD HOST A CONFERENCE ON NAMIBIA

Paris LE MONDE in French 21-22 Sep 80 p 6

[Article: "Chirac Criticizes France's African Policy"]

[Excerpt] Floating the Notion of a Conference on Namibia

"The United Nations has failed in its search for a negotiated settlement in Namibia. A new procedure must, therefore, be discovered if we are to speed up the process of decolonialization in Windhoek," said Jacques Chirac on Friday, 19 September. At city hall in Paris he had met with about 10 correspondents who were experts on African affairs. Before he was to talk with the mayor of Algiers, who was passing through the capital for a few hours, Chirac spent over an hour and a half discussing the situation in the dark continent, especially the situation in southern Africa.

After paying homage to black nationalist Robert Mugabe the mayor of Paris stated: "The Zimbabwe question was settled on the initiative of Great Britain.... A solution to the problem of Namibia is urgently called for since violence in that part of the world has escalated dangerously.... It is up to France to concern itself with the issue for two reasons: 1) the five Western powers have so far failed to make any concrete recommendations; 2) the negotiations begun under UN auspices are not yielding and will not yield any results.

"France cannot restrict its endeavors only to French-speaking African countries," Chirac went on to say. "The French Government should propose that a peace conference on Namibia convene in Paris. To be sure, we would consult our most serious African partners, the UN secretary general, SWAPO, whose leader, Sam Nujoma, seems favorably inclined in this direction, our Western colleagues, the Republic of South Africa, which is suffering from the increased military outlays, the frontline African states, including Zimbabwe, which seem inclined to give us a hearing..."

Urged to clarify his line of thought, Chirac said: "First a favorable climate has to be created.... Obviously the South Africans will have to make some gestures, if only by signing the non-proliferation treaty and freeing Namibian political prisoners.... France could then issue invitations to the conference that I am recommending should be held."

For Chirac, it is to France's advantage to promote anything that might help preserve stability in southern Africa. Actually, he believes that French-South African trade relations have grown considerably, especially since South Africa has become France's number one coal supplier, leading even Poland, and owing to the extent of French purchases of South African uranium. Politically, France should help keep the peace in an area that is especially vulnerable on the strategic level; morally, Chirac believes France has a responsibility firmly to support any initiative likely to contribute thereto.

He indicated that he would like to see Pretoria's leaders "abolish apartheid and alter South Africa's power structures to permit the establishment of a confederation of states." The mayor of Paris then raised the possibility of "a preliminary conference with an African elder statesman, say, Ivory Coast president Felix Houphouet-Boigny, in Abidjan." He also insisted on the need to "reintegrate the Republic of South Africa into the community of nations." Not only is it the sluggishness of the Western powers that has induced Chirac to recommend the initiative for a conference on Namibia, but also, he says, "the Federal Republic of Germany's lack of an African policy, with 35,000 individuals of German ancestry in Namibia. And the paralysis of the United States which will not take any action pending the November elections..."

ZIMBABWE CONFERENCE--SWAPO would be happy to talk to the SA Government at a conference hosted by Zimbabwe on Prime Minister Mr Robert Mugabe. SWAPO leader Mr Sam Nujoma made this clear in Paris yesterday. According to a report in today's REPUBLIKEIN, Mr Nujoma will only participate if the conference is observed by UN representatives. Mr Nujoma also wants members of the OAU to attend. Significantly, SWA's AG Dr Gerrit Viljoen suggested recently that the SA Government may have to come to some agreement with the Frontlines States on SWA if the Western initiative collapses. The SA Government however has always made it clear that it will not do anything that will prejudice the interests of the inhabitants of SWA. SWAPO LOSES 38--The Second in Command of the SWA Territory Force, Brigadier Pieter Bosman has announced that another 38 SWAPO fighters have been killed in operations during the past 14 days by the SWA Territory Force and the SADF. During this time contact was made mostly with small groups of terrorists. In the early hours of September 6, shots were heard and, with first light, the security forces went to investigate. They found that a Cuca shop had been burnt down and a local citizen murdered. They followed the tracks and in the afternoon made contact with a group of three terrorists. One of the terrorists was killed and the other two fled, but later the same day a second terrorist was killed. On September 6 the security forces also made contact with a group of terrorists hiding in thick bush. A short firefight followed and 4 terrorists were killed. The announcement was made by Governor Mohammed Abubakar Rimi, the state governor, when he received a delegation from the district at Government House, Kano. He said when the local government is created, the people of Gwaram would have a free hand to elect qualified people to run the affairs of the area. He, however, urged them to be patient, assuring them that new local governments were necessary to bring even development nearer to the people. The delegation had complained of the uncooperative attitude of the Birnin Kudu Local Government Caretaker Committee to affairs of Gwaram District. They also alleged that suspended village heads were making life difficult in the district. [Abdulhamid Babatunde] [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 10 Sep 80 p 3]

GOODS DISTRIBUTION SYSTEM--A new method of distributing goods in the country is soon to be introduced by the Federal Government. The method will provide for a central distributive system for all goods. It is aimed at checking the present practice whereby manufacturers and importers also take on the jobs of the distributor. Disclosing this in Lagos yesterday, the Minister for Commerce, Mr. Isaac Shaahu, described manufacturers and importers as the enemies of free and fair distributive trade system in the country. He was briefing the members of the Committee of the House of Representatives on means and ways of alleviating the problems of the high cost of consumer goods in the country. Mr. Shaahu said he was aware that the problems of the people stemmed from an irregular distributive trade system which had been operating in the society for quite some time. A lot of issues were being mismanaged by the manufacturers and importers. The Minister then promised to send to the legislature, a bill which would guarantee a central distributive system. AID FROM BRAZIL WANTED--Senate President Dr. Joseph Wayas has called for aid from Brazil for the execution of the Green Revolution programme. Dr. Wayas, currently on an official visit to Brazil, told the Governor of Brazilia, Mr. A.I.M. Lamaison last Tuesday that the slogan of the present administration in Nigeria was food and shelter and noted that the government was relentlessly working for the realisation of these objectives. "Since your agriculture is accepted everywhere in the world, it is worthwhile that you help us in this area," Dr. Wayas pleaded. He also noted that the two countries could also co-operate in housing and telecommunication. The Senate President noted that co-operation between the two countries had grown over the years. In his reply, the governor pointed out that economic co-operation between both countries was desirable because there was tremendous similarity in the social life of the peoples. On bilateral trade, Mr. Lamaison appealed to Nigeria to increase its supply of oil to Brazil. [Yinka Guedon] [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 30 Aug 80 p 1]

IRRIGATION TO BOOST AGRICULTURE--The Niger River Basin Development Authority has embarked on various projects aimed at boosting the green revolution scheme of the Federal Government. They include irrigation of 60,000 hectares of farmland within the next five years on which two or three crops would be grown on rotational basis per year. The Authority also plans to produce enough day-old chicks to meet the needs of farmers in Niger, Kwara and Kaduna states. The Minister of Water Resources, Alhaji Ndagi Mamudu, disclosed this at the official opening of the authority's secretariat and headquarters in Ilorin. The minister said the authority would also engage in the production of fodders for cattle. Fish production on the Niger and Kaduna Rivers, Kainji, Kangimi and Tatedu Lakes would also be stepped up. He announced that the Federal Government was planning to award contracts for the construction of irrigation on 42,500 hectares of land in the three states of the authority before the year ended. Alhaji Mamudu said that Basin authorities in the country were expected to tap of both surface and underground water resources for multipurposes with emphasis on irrigation. SOVIET STEEL EXPERTS, EQUIPMENT--Malam Mamman Makele, acting Minister for Steel Development has expressed satisfaction with the pace of work on the Ajaokuta Steel Complex. The minister was speaking during a meeting with the Consellor for Economic Affairs of the Soviet Embassy in Nigeria, Mr. Garry I. Kuznetsov in Lagos on Friday. Malam Mamman Makele who has just returned from a tour of the steel plant said that most of the equipment required for the project "had been rolling in at the plant," adding that "I personally received the ship that brought some equipment from Russia at Warri." He told Mr. Kuznetsov that he was aware of the problems facing the project and promised that the government would do everything possible to ensure that steel rolled at Ajaokuta by the middle of 1983. On accommodation of workers at the site, Malam Makele said that contracts for the construction of 8,000 housing units would be awarded shortly. He also disclosed that contracts for the civil work at the steel plant would also be awarded soon. In his own speech at the meeting, Mr. Kuzentsov disclosed that four Soviet experts had arrived in Nigeria to work on the steel training centre for Ajaokuta. He said the Soviet Government was committed to the steel plant and would endeavour to complete the project on schedule. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 1 Sep 80 p 13]

ARMY DESERTERS FROM SOKOTO--One hundred and thirty eight out of the 140 candidates of Sokota State origin, who were recruited into the army, have deserted. This development was revealed in Zuru by the Governor, Alhaji Shehu Muhammed Kangiwa, while addressing a public gathering. Governor Shehu described the mass exodus as very deplorable. He said the desertion of the candidates from the army was so rapid that their number dwindled to 20 and later went down to two. Governor Shehu observed that the people of Zuru area have always been the "saviours" of the state as regards mobilisation into the armed forces. He urged them not to disappoint the state over their appreciable patriotism. Speaking on agriculture, the governor expressed optimism for a bumper harvest. He said this was a sure sign of the goodwill nursed by everyone in the state. He informed the gathering that his visit was to ensure the fulfillment of a campaign promise. He said peaceful co-existence was important because it was the only way to progress. Governor Shehu said as brothers and sisters, the people should only engage in things that would further cement their unity and those of the state and the nation as a whole. He stressed that a united community would always be invincible until when they break themselves up. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 2 Sep 80 p 16]

FUNDS FOR BAKOLORI DAM--The Bakolori Dam Project would need about 200 million Naira between now and 1983 to meet its contractual obligations. The amount is in addition to the 180 million Naira already spent to complete the dam which constitutes 40 per cent of the project under the Rima River Basin Development Authority. The General Manager of Rima River Basin Development Authority, Alhaji Mohammad Arzika, said apart from the project itself, the Impresit Bakolori--the firm constructing the dam, alone submitted a claim for 28.9 million Naira to cover losses incurred during the farmers' uprising. The general manager said the remaining 60 per cent was made up of irrigation projects and the provision of infrastructure which involves the preparation of 23,000 hectares of land. He claimed that the federal authorities refused to make funds available for the project on the basis that its work had been completed with the commissioning of the Bakolori Dam by retired Major-General Shehu Musa Yar'adua in December 1978. He said the dam and its irrigation project, on completion in 1983, would provide an annual output of 32,500 tonnes of maize, 12,000 tonnes of millet and 33,000 tonnes of rice. Others include 77,000 tonnes of cotton, 2,500 tonnes of groundnuts, 60,000 tonnes of vegetables, 2,000 tonnes of beans and 1,000 tonnes of fish annually. [Ibrahim N. LAR: GREEN REVOLUTION NONPOLITICAL--The Plateau State Governor, Mr. Solomon D. Lar has appealed to all governments and those responsible for the execution of the green revolution to disregard politics in the appointment of agricultural board members and the distribution of tractors, caterpillars and fertilisers to farmers. Governor Lar explained that the green revolution should be insulated from politics because what the country needed was abundant food production to feed its people. The governor argued that when people go to buy foodstuff from the market, they don't care whether the seller or the buyer was from a different political party. In view of this, Governor Lar said board members of all agricultural schemes should be made up of people who can genuinely offer useful advise to farmers on farming, irrespective of their political leanings. Governor Lar who made this call when the chairman of the Agricultural Credit Guaranteed Scheme, Chief E.O. Ashamu, paid him a courtesy call in Jos yesterday also emphasised the need to grant loans to capable farmers. Replying Chief Ashamu commenced Governor Lar for his interest in agriculture and assured of his continued support and assistance to farmers in particular and the state government in general. He told the governor that his unit had a farm at Kafanchan from where the state government's Bokkos and Lafiya farm projects receive grain seeds. [Text] [Kaduna NEW NIGERIAN in English 3 Sep 80 p 3]

DAMS FOR GALMA RIVER--An appeal has been made to the Federal Ministry of Water Resources and the Niger River Basin Development Authority (NRBDA) to construct two dams at Galma River in Saminaka Local Government area of Kaduna State. The call was contained in a motion moved by Major Ahmed Abdu (Kubau West) in the Kaduna State House of Assembly. Major Ahmed Abdu told the House that Galma River stretched from Saminaka to Kadaru through Dutsen-Wai Zuntu and Gubuchi in Ikara Local Government area, a distance of about 250 kilometres. He argued that if the two dams were built in the area, they would provide electricity to the state and the neighbouring states of Bauchi, Plateau and Kano. He said farmers would greatly benefit from the project because according to him, million hectares of land would be available for irrigation of wheat, rice, tomatoes, onions and other agricultural products. FOOD SHORTAGE ALLEVIATED--The first consignment of 3,600 bags of rice, has arrived in the Sokoto State capital, Sokoto. This followed the recent acute shortage which hit the whole state. Speaking to the NEW NIGERIAN in his office, the General Manager of the Nigerian National Supply Company NNSC who owns the consignment, Malam Umaru D. Abdullahi, complained that a mamoth crowd which immediately besieged his office at the sight of the rice had caused damage to the door and table of his office. He explained that the consignment had already been distributed on the following basis, 30 per cent each to the state's Co-operative Consumer Shop and the State Supply Company, while 10 percent each was given to TRADEV Sokoto, and all federal institutions in the state. The balance of 20 per cent was distributed to individual customers on the ration of one, two or three bags. Malam Umaru D. Abdullahi revealed that another consignment but of unknown quantity was expected anytime from now. Meanwhile, sugar has now become a scarce commodity in the state capital. The Saint Louis brand in blue packets now sells at one Naira per packet and 13 Naira per carton, while the Family Cube has disappeared from the markets. The Sunsweet type sell at 60 kobo per packet and about 14 Naira per carton. Malam Umaru D. Abdullahi revealed to me that the NNSC has 65,000 cartons of milk in its store here in Sokoto. He said the company has decided to wave off 20 kobo for anyone buying from 250 cartons upwards. He said the price per carton was 11.78 Naira but for public benefit it has been reduced to 11.50 Naira. AGRICULTURAL LOANS IN KANO--About 2,800 co-operative farmers in Gezawa Local Government Council area of Kano State have benefitted from agricultural loans this planting season. This was announced by the chairman of the co-operative union in the area, Alhaji Lawan Husseini, recently. A government bulletin quoting him said 200,000 Naira was granted for the loans. In an address to the "lucky" farmers the caretaker Councillor for Education and Social Welfare, Malam Abdu Tela, urged them to strive to repay the loans on the specified time. AJAOKUTA STEEL INTERESTS SWEDISH--When the first finished products roll off the Ajaokuta Steel Complex in Kwara State, one of the interested parties from the business world will be Central Bolaget for Kemiska Industries AB of Sweden. This is because the products of the complex will go a long way in influencing the establishment of a branch of the company in Nigeria for the purpose of manufacturing sandblasters and anti-corrosion equipment. Disclosing this at the end of a five-day hectic business tour of the country, the Managing Director of the firm Mr. Gronlund, said discussions have begun with the Swedish firm and its Nigerian partners, Bank Craft & Company, (Nigeria) Limited on the issue of local manufacture of sandblasting machines. He stressed, however, that the take-off of the industry would depend on the availability of steel locally as the venture would not be profitable if steel were to be imported. LAND USE LAW--A university don has called for an amendment of the Land Use Decree. He said that the decree should be amended to make for personal security, fairplay, revision of credit, housing, medical, educational and health facilities. Professor Martin Ijere of the University of Nigeria, Nsukka observed at a public lecture in Nsukka that the migration of rural population to urban areas had persisted, in spite of the decree. This, he said, was because the existing infrastructural and social facilities in the rural areas were inadequate. These, he said, included good roads, water, electricity, hospitals, recreational centres. Besides, the rural dwellers enjoyed no benefits during ill-health, unemployment, death, invalidation accidents or for one child care, he added. Professor Ijere said only a negligible fraction of bank loans went to farmers, adding that the rural farmers were often discriminated against in the award of loans. He observed that many of those who should have benefited from the Land Use Decree were in the low income group who often had no funds to purchase or develop land. "It should, therefore, become a matter of policy for the law to make specific stipulations that Banks give loans to those wishing to develop land." "Since modernising agriculture implied the provisions of roads and other forms of infrastructures," he said, "the decree should stipulate that these duties be carried out by the Federal, state and local governments because individuals cannot bear their costs." Professor Ijere observed that such a step would allow the decree to stop the drift from urban to rural areas. [Text] [Lagos DAILY TIMES in English 27 Aug 80 p 24]

REPORTAGE ON MINISTERS' CONTACTS WITH ARABS

Houdoul Visits Lebanon

Victoria NATION in English 11 Sep 80 p 2

[Article entitled: "Palestinian Struggle Both Impresses and Shocks Minister Hodoul"]

[Text]

SEYCHELLES' Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Jacques Hodoul, recently left Southern Lebanon after a three-day visit a shocked and wiser man after seeing first hand the heart-rending results of Israeli aggression against the Palestinians, a valiant people waging a bloody struggle for their inalienable rights.

"What really shocked me was the cruelty of the Zionist forces towards the Palestinian people," he said to our reporter recently when talking about his visit at the invitation of the Palestinian Liberation Organisation. "I knew that Israel was very aggressive but was apalled to see for myself the results of this aggression and their atrocities which continue day and night," he added.

From September 3 to 5, Minister Hodoul had talks with PLO leaders, including their President, Mr. Yasser Arafat. and spent much time touring Palestinian-held West Beirut, where he visited the Sons of Martyrs movement and the Palestinian equivalent of the Red Cross, the Red Crescent, and Southern Lebanon which is controlled by the Lebanese Arabs and their Palestinian allies. Among the PLO officials accompanying him was their ambassador to Seychelles, Mr. Fouad Bitar.

The party visitied the site of the battle for the historic and huge Citadel of Beaufort two days after Palestinian forces repulsed a strong Israeli attempt to capture the fortress. The battlements built during the Crusades, crown a strategic hill in Southern Lebanon and the Israelis had launched a brutal attack that lasted over several days. By the time it was all over a village of about 2,000 people at the foot of the hill on which the castle is perched had been razed to the ground.

"What struck me was how the Israelis had massacred the local population," Minister Hodoul said in a quiet voice that showed how touched he had been by what he had seen. "Nothing remains of the village after the Israeli bombardments. Women and children were killed. We saw young children orphaned by the Israeli attack running around and women without legs and arms."

Minister Hodoul also visited the port of Saida where he was shown around by the PLO Chief of Staff. The party had hardly left for the larger and more historical port of Tyr to the south when another Israeli bombing of Saida began.

"Some of these towns that are continually bombarded look like ghost towns and it is difficult to understand the courage of their inhabitants who refuse to leave despite all. They have amazing endurance." Minister Hodoul said.

The Minister found much of Tyr, a major port of the area since Roman times, reduced to rubble. "I never realised the Israeli forces were so barbarous," Mr. Hodoul continued. "I have heard their representatives speak in UNESCO and other international forums of the need to protect historic monuments as well as human lives but from what I saw in Lebanon they seem to be doing the most destruction in this sphere.

What made the Israeli cruelty towards the Palestinians astonishing, Minister Hodoul said, is that the Jewish nation is always complaining of Hitler's atrocities against them during the Second World War. "I cannot understand how they can now act in more or less the same way...", he added.

"On the other hand it may be understandable if we realise that Zionism does not represent all Jews but a group of fanatics. On top of this these fanatics have the support of United States' imperialism.

"We cannot condemn Zionism if we do not condemn those who give the Zionists the means to attack the Palestinians. If Israel did not have the military, moral and financial support of US imperialism the Palestinian problem would have been solved long ago".

Despite what the Palestinians are going through, Minister Hodoul was very impressed to see how they tried their very best to keep day to day life running so as to feed and develop their nation. In Southern Lebanon the people, under the guidance of the PLO, have constructed schools, crèches, hospitals and other public services and run several factories with the little means that they have. They also plant extensively and Minister Hodoul was impressed to see villagers from around the Beaufort Citadel who had fled during the fighting, returning to harvest their crops.

Visit to Libya

Victoria NATION in English 17 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE FRUITFUL development of co-operation between Seychelles and progressive Arab states gained momentum in the education and information sectors with the recent successful visit to the Libyan Jamahiriyah of Seychelles' Minister for Education and Information, Mr. James Michel.

Invited to Tripoli by his counterparts in education and information, Dr. Abdu Al Hafiz Zlitni and Mr. Mohammed Hejazi, to attend the 11th anniversary celebrations of the September 1st Revolution and for bilateral talks, Minister Michel accompanied a Seychelles People's Progressive Front delegation led by the Front Political Secretary and Minister for Foreign Affairs, Mr. Jacques Hodoul.

As well as calling on the Libyan Foreign Minister with Mr. Hodoul, Minister Michel also had talks on education and information.

With Minister Zlitni he reviewed the two countries' experience putting into practice new education systems adapted to the aspirations and characteristics of their respective revolutionary societies. Both Seychelles and Libya, Mr. Michel said, are determined to integrate their education systems into the lives and wishes of their respective peoples in their hard struggle towards socialism.

Only this will enable them to throw off, once and for all, the remaining vestiges of the colonial system of education that bears no relation to the realities of the socialist systems the two peoples are striving to set up, he added.

The two countries agreed to exchange visits to allow education officials to see how the respective education systems work and to explore future avenues for co-operation.

In the information sector Ministers Michel and Hejazi examined ways in which Libya could help Seychelles in developing its information services whether in the field of television, radio or news agency.

It was agreed that a Seychellois technical mission will visit Libya in the first half of October for follow-up talks and to identify the precise areas for future co-operation.

SUCCESS OF CZECH COOPERATION TALKS REPORTED

Victoria NATION in English 17 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Text]

THE REPUBLIC of Seychelles and the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic are poised for fruitful development co-operation, following a highly successful three-day visit to Prague by a two-man delegation from the Ministry of Education and Information led by Minister James Michel.

After friendly talks with the Czech Ministers for Education and for Culture, Mr. Milan Vondruska and Mr. Milan Kusak and other officials, agreement has been reached for Czech co-operation in the fields of education, information, culture, sports and health and for exchanges at Party level.

Mr. Michel was invited to visit Prague by his Czech counterparts through the Czechoslovak Ambassador to Seychelles, Mr. Jaroslav Hes, who presented his credentials to President Rene in July. Minister Michel, accompanied by Mr. Patrick Berlouis, an Education Officer in the planning division, travelled on to the Czech capital after a visit to Libya.

He carried with him the fraternal greetings of the Seychellois Head of State, President Rene, and his Government to President Gustav Husak of Czechoslovakia and the Seychelles' wish to develop friendly ties and co-operation.

For Seychelles, Minister Michel said of his trip, it was the normal continuation of the development of relations with friendly countries, particularly those sharing similar ideals aimed at establishing a new society that makes the welfare of the people a priority.

Wide-ranging talks were held as to how Czechoslovakia would be able to help Seychelles in her development, and Minister Michel said that he was struck not only by the esteem in which his hosts held Seychelles, but also by their warmth and their sincerity in wanting to help us according to their capabilities and our wishes.

The Czech Government has agreed to send to Seychelles various qualified, technical personnel and equipment in the education, cultural, health and sports sectors. These include, among others, physical education, sports, gymnastics and swimming coaches for our schools and National Youth Service, music teachers, doctors and medical specialists.

In the cultural field it was agreed to hold a Czech film week in Seychelles next year to be followed by an exchange of folklore troupes, all aimed at cementing solidarity between the two peoples.

In the field of political relations, an exchange of visits between the two countries' political organisations and their affiliates was discussed. Minister Michel said he was impressed at how highly advanced the Czech youth movements were and said that the exchange of visits at party level would also include Seychelles' national youth and women's movements and the National Workers' Union.

All these talks and agreements are to be incorporated into a co-operation agreement that has yet to be drawn up and signed.

The Seychellois delegation also visited technical and secondary schools for a first-hand inspection of the Czech education set-up and were impressed by the Charles University, one of the oldest in Europe, founded in Prague in 1348.

Several hundred Third World students from Africa, Asia and Latin America are now studying at this university. Czech education officials heve opened their universities to Seychellois students, offering as many places as the Republic can use.

In all Mr. Michel found the Czech system of socialist education to be an advanced one, especially in the integration of education with society.

He also noted that all educational and vocational institutions had their own sports complexes including gymnasiums and swimming pools.

As a result, every five years thousands of schoolchildren from all over the federation converge on Prague's colossal stadium for a magnificent Spartakiad. Before a crowd of 250,000 as many as 30,000 schoolchildren at a time show their gymnastic and sports skills.

Explaining the Czechs' warm-hearted willingness to share their knowledge, experiences and gains with the Seychellois, Minister Michel noted that Czechoslovakia had suffered greatly from Nazi persecution and occupation during the Second World War.

They know the miseries and heartbreak of strife and, having also been cruelly subjected to capitalist and feudalist abuse, of economic and political exploitation.

"During their 33 years of socialist construction," Minister Michel explained, "the hardy Czechoslovak people have succeeded in creating a better society for themselves. In doing so they gained much experience and know very well the problems encountered when trying to create a really just and equitable society as we are. For this reason they are sincerely prepared to extend a helping hand to other countries who have set out determinedly on the same path."

CONTRACT FOR PRASLIN POWER STATION SIGNED

Victoria NATION in English 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

A R. 6.7 million contract for the construction of the Baie Ste. Anne power station on Praslin was signed yesterday by the Minister for Planning and Development, Dr. Maxime Ferrari, and representatives of the Seychelles Construction Company.

Meanwhile, SCC, which has been mobilising in the last few weeks ready for the official go-ahead, has nearly completed the foundations of the power house and expects to launch the construction of the main building shortly.

The contractors have in all undertaken to build the power house for three 650 kilowatt generators, offices and stores at the power station and seven houses for the Electricity Corporation staff who will run the power station and electricity system.

Minister Ferrari described the contract as proof of Government's intention not to neglect Praslin's progress. "This signing shows the Seychelles Government's determination to do something substantial for the development of Praslin," he said.

The Electricity Manager, Mr. Jim Romanos, who was among several Government and SCC officials witnessing the signing, said that the contractors expected to finish the power house in 14 weeks. This will be followed by the installation of the generators in November. These are now stored on Mahe and will be taken over by the Cinq Juin. The first public electricity is expected to be generated on Praslin by the end of February.

Signing for the SCC were its technical and commercial managers, Mr. H. P. Wyss and Mr. J. Klaus, who pointed out that the contract was not only the largest within the project but also the largest their company had ever undertaken for the Government.

Finance for the contract signed yesterday comes from BADEA, the Arab Bank for Economic Development in Africa, to the value of R. 7.5 million, which will also finance the installation of the power station's fuel depot and submarine pipeline.

In addition there is also financial co-operation with the Abu Dhabi Fund for Economic Development, which is providing funds for the construction of substations, overhead lines, underground cables and consumer services throughout Praslin as well as part of the power station electrical works.

The generators were financed by Oman and all other works are funded by Seychelles. In all the project costs almost R. 24 million.

BROKEN BIT SLOWS DOWN TEST OIL DRILLING

Victoria NATION in English 11 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Text] A broken drill bit in the Owen bank oil exploration well has forced the Amoco Seychelles-chartered drill ship, Diamond M Dragon to stop normal drilling operations for about two weeks.

The drill ship was test drilling at 4,374 metres (14,357 feet) deep on the Owen Bank west of Mahe when the drill bit broke off in a very unusual manner.

Oil company and drilling staff are at a loss as to how the pin end of the bit--the threaded part where the bit screws into the drill pipe--could have snapped off, effectively blocking the well as the bit could not be extracted.

"It just happened...it is just one of those things that we certainly do not wish for but which can happen," a baffled Amoco Seychelles spokesman told our reporter.

A broken drill bit in a well is one of the very costly hazards all drillers and oil companies fear like the plague. Only the potentially disastrous blow-out could be worse. The company had to bring in special drilling crew from Europe equipped with a specialized 'Dyna drill' so as to go round the offending "fish"--as an obstruction in a well is called.

First of all, once the drill pipe was pulled out, a cement plug was pumped into set above the "fish." Then about 30 metres higher the Dyna drill, deflected by a steel wedge on the cement plug, bored at an angle through the well casing and into the surrounding rock in a gradual curve that goes round the sealed part of the well. This process is known as side-tracking.

The Dyna drill was then pulled out and the ordinary drill, with a new bit, went back into the well. The side-tracked part of the well is some 300 metres long and wide enough to allow the flexible drill pipe to follow the contour easily.

The Diamond M Dragon expects to resume normal drilling either today or tomorrow but is now well behind schedule. It had expected to reach the target depth of 4,572 metres (15,000 feet), where it hopes to find an oil pocket, late last August but now does not expect to finish the well until the end of this month.

Once the Owen Bank well is completed the drill ship will move to another exploration site on the Reith Bank, also west but closer to Mahe.

BRIEFS

MINISTERS RETURN--The Minister for Education and Information, Mr James Michel returned home yesterday morning from an overseas visit which took him to the Libyan Jamahiriyah and Czechoslovakia. In the Libyan capital of Tripoli, Minister Michel had talks with his Libyan counterpart on cooperation in education and information between Seychelles and Libya. Mr Michel travelled to Tripoli at the invitation of the Libyan Government to attend the 11th anniversary celebrations of the 1st September Revolution and for discussions on matters of mutual interest. The Minister also had fruitful talks in Prague, Czechoslovakia, on cooperation in several fields. His visit to the Central European country followed the visit to Seychelles last month by the Czechoslovak Ambassador, Mr Jaroslav Hes, when the diplomat presented his credentials to President Rene. The Minister for Administration and Political Organization, Mr Guy Sinon, was also expected back home yesterday. Mr Sinon, who is also Secretary-General of the Seychelles People's Progressive Front, left for an official visit to the People's Republic of China last month accompanied by a delegation of SPPF branch members. CHINESE DONATION TO HANDICAPPED--The National Council for Children has been given a donation of R.2,000 for handicapped children by Mrs Xu Hanbing, wife of the visiting Vice Prime Minister of China, Mr Ji Pengfei. Mrs Xu Hanbing and other members of the Chinese delegation paid a visit to the School for the Exceptional Child, the playground and Cheshire Home, where they met some of the children and staff. Donations to the handicapped fund are still coming in from the public. Two businessmen, Mr Srinivasan Chetty and Mr Cuppini Nelo, gave R.2,000 and R.1,000 respectively. The NCFC on Thursday handed over baby clothes and linen, toys and sweets to Sister Superior of St. Elizabeth Convent for the children of the orphanages under their care. The baby linen and clothes were bought from a donation by Seychelles Round Table. [Text] [Victoria NATION in English 13 Sep 80 p 2]

ZAMBIAN FLIGHT--Zambia airways, the latest foreign airline to operate to Seychelles, has made its official inaugural flight carrying on board the Zambian Minister of State for Information and Broadcasting, Mr J Banda and his wife. The Minister, who is on holiday, was met at the airport by the Under Secretary for Information, Mrs Sheila Gemmell. On board the flight on Wednesday were also several businessmen, including representatives of the travel trade from both Zambia and newly-independendent Zimbabwe. It is expected that in the near future Seychelles, Zambia and Zimbabwe will exchange educational tours to find out what each country can offer to visitors. Zambia airways which is opening up the southern Africa tourist market, has been operating twice-weekly flights through Seychelles since April on its Bombay route. SPPF DELEGATION RETURNS--A delegation of the Seychelles People's Progressive Front, headed by the Secretary General of the Front, Mr Guy Sinon, returned home at the weekend from a four-week visit to the People's Republic of China. The delegation, which also included Mr Maurice Micock, Chairman of the Cascade Branch and Mrs Erline Adonis, Vice-Chairman of the Cascade Branch, were the guests of the Chinese Communist Party. Meetings were held with officials of the Chinese Communist Party and its Chairman, Mr Hua Guo Feng, the Chinese leader. The SPPF delegation learned the policies and functions of the Chinese Communist Party and visited several projects. [Text] [Victoria NATION in English 16 Sep 80 p 2]

NEW GENERATOR--A new electricity generator is being installed urgently at the Victoria "B" power station as the demand for electricity supplies continues to increase. The new generating set, with a capacity of five megawatts, the largest so far on Mahe, has already arrived on the island and is expected to start functioning before the middle of next year. A statement from the Department of Works explains that without this new set, it is likely that during the peak hours of consumption in the morning and evening, load shedding would have to take place. Preparations for the new generator's installation are well underway with the completion of a R. 1.6 million contract to make the site ready for the foundation of the engine bed. Tenders are now being invited for the construction of the engine bed within the existing powerhouse, which already has four generating sets of 2-1/2 megawatts each. Extension works on the powerhouse are also needed to provide additional floor area for the planned installations of the 6th and 7th electricity generators. Work on the construction of the engine bed and powerhouse extension should start in November. These projects are being financed by loan funds from Britain and the Commonwealth Development Corporation. [Text] [Victoria NATION in English 17 Sep 80 p 2]

EDUCATION MINISTER SEES STUDENTS AS REFLECTING NATIONALISM

London WEST AFRICA in English 22 Sep 80 pp 1834, 1835

[Article by Roland Buck]

[Text]

STUDENTS' demonstrations which plagued parts of West and Central Africa in the sixties, hardly touched Sierra Leone. If Sierra Leonean students were apathetic, in the sixties, to their political situation and condition 1977 saw a dramatic change, with the students not only questioning the political direction and leadership but demanding a say in the political process.

In 1977, students demanded a reduction in the number of ministers in the Cabinet and MPs in the house; in that they were merely echoing President Steven's call at his inauguration for a reduction in the parliamentary representation proportionate to the population of Sierra Leone. The students had also called for a free all-party election, the disbandment of the Internal Security Unit (ISU).

President Stevens countered by saying that the students held no mandate from the people of Sierra Leone, who had elected representatives, at the same time conceding that some of the matters raised were of constitutional proportions, which only Parliament could handle.

Although it was not stated, the Government made some concessions: elections, graduates in the cabinet, a special assistant in the office of the President to advise on youth affairs and the declaration that 'brains' were now needed to run the affairs of Sierra Leone.

The students of Sierra Leone have, since 1977, been growing in political stature, they have expressed solidarity with Liberian students, with Liberia's 'MOJA' and 'PAL' and threatened demonstrations and strikes. Njala University, the country's only agricultural college in the Northern Province, where there are still pro-SLPP sympathies, despite the one-party system, has always been restive, living conditions at the campus have always provided a basis for unrest and their actions have always been supported by the other colleges in Freetown and also by secondary and primary school pupils.

The Government of Sierra Leone recently announced that it is taking over the supply of electricity and the provision of water supply to the College. Education Minister Koroma, who was in London recently, remarked that this move should not be seen as a reaction by the Government to student pressure and demands but rather as the Government discharging its proper responsibility to the community of which Njala is a part.

Needs not theories

The Minister rejected allegations that Njala is a hot-bed of student unrest and a manifestation of students acting as a political pressure group. What happened at Milton Margai Teachers' College, Fourah Bay and Njala should, according to Mr. Koroma, be seen as student trends left over from the sixties; like students all over the world, they were only reacting to their various needs. Contrary to reports, Mr. Koroma said, no grants, scholarships or bursaries had been withdrawn, reduced or curtailed. The Sierra Leone Government and its Ministry of Education has a policy of giving grants and scholarships according to the needs of the country.

Sierra Leone students are not, according to Mr. Koroma, seen or regarded as any political pressure group, rather they are seen as reflecting the nationalism of the nation, like the many other groups in the country, their actions, therefore, are seen by the Government as a purely healthy and welcome trend in the development of the nation.

LABOR PARTY REJECTS PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL MEMBERSHIP

Hendrickse Statement

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 10 Sep 80 p 2

[Excerpt]

THE Labour Party leadership yesterday reiterated its rejection of the President's Council and dismissed claims that a prominent member of the party had accepted an invitation to join the council.

Party leader, the Rev Alan Hendrickse, said he was approached to serve on the council, but had not received a written invitation. He was not aware that any member of the party had decided to join the council, as reported in the Nationalist newspaper, the Burger, yesterday.

The Burger claimed that several prominent members of the Labour Party, including Mr David Curry, Mr Carter Ebrahim and Mr Jac Rabie, had received invitations to join the President's Council.

Mr Hendrickse described the Burger's article as "speculation" and said the Afrikaans press was trying to sow division in Labour Party ranks.

Party members would remain loyal to a decision not to participate in the President's Council, he said.

The party objects to the exclusion of blacks from the council, the retention of laws such as the Group Areas Act, Mixed Marriages Act and the Immorality Act and the continued detention of people opposing apartheid.

Mr Curry, the party's chairman, confirmed yesterday that he had received a written invitation, but said he would "write back to the minister and tell him that I will not accept the invitation". He rejected the suggestion that a party member had decided to join the council.

'THE CAPE TIMES' Comment

Capetown THE CAPE TIMES in English 9 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial: "The Reasons Why"]

[Text]

THE LABOUR PARTY's rejection of the President's Council in its present guise was unanimously re-affirmed at the weekend. At the same time, the party's view on the matter seems to have hardened considerably, reflecting public opinion in its electorate. The Labour Party leader, the Rev Alan Hendrickse, has emphasized that his executive would be happy to review their attitude if the Prime Minister took certain steps to make this possible. What would Mr P W Botha have to do to secure their co-operation -- and, through them, the co-operation of the coloured community, which the Labour Party indisputably represents?

It is not only a question of Mr Botha giving way on the central issue and including blacks. As the Labour Party argues, other preliminary steps are indicated to help create the right climate for negotiation. Essential preliminaries, in this view, are the abolition of the Group Areas Act, the Mixed Marriages Act and other discriminatory laws which are experienced as insulting and oppressive in the so-called coloured community. If there is to be real consensus, the Labour Party argues, the practice of whites unilaterally setting up constitutional structures for the rest of the population is wholly unacceptable. The Labour Party itself favours a national convention as the appropriate structure to set about a negotiated constitutional reform. But it is prepared to keep talking.

Mr P W Botha's reply to all this has been brief and to the point — and hardly helpful. Individuals and not parties are invited to join the President's Council, he says. Unless Mr Botha changes his mind, the road ahead is now distressingly plain. The Botha administration is going to constitute the President's Council, meeting behind closed doors, in a way which makes no pretence at creating a representative body. The people who accept nomination will represent nobody but themselves. And there are to be no black representatives. In this atmosphere, it is difficult to see how the President's Council can do much good. Being set up unilaterally by the Botha administration, this body is now to be imposed on the unfranchised majority of the population. This is a recipe for confrontation.

The official Opposition, in standing aloof, has been demonstrably correct. The job of the PFP, in the national interest, is to do everything in its power to bring the government to wiser insights and to help avoid confrontation. The attempt to impose consultative structures on the unfranchised population groups has been imprudent in the extreme. The prime minister will need to act quickly if the President's Council is to be salvaged as a viable starting-point on the road to constitutional reform.

SCHLEBUSCH DENIES COMMITMENT ON BLACKS IN PRESIDENT'S COUNCIL

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 15 Sep 80 p 7

[Article by Jaap Theron]

[Text]

MR ALWYN Schlebusch, Vice State President-designate and chairman of the President's Council, yesterday rejected allegations in weekend newspapers that the Government has given private undertakings to certain individuals that Blacks will sit as full members of the Council before the end of next year."

Mr Schlebusch was asked to comment on a report that said at least one senior Cabinet Minister had told prospective members of the President's Council that Blacks would eventually be full members of the Council.

"I know nothing about any assurance to anyone that Blacks would become full members of the President's Council," Mr Schlebusch said.

He said: "Government policy, as laid down by legislation, provides for membership of the President's Council" and that Legislation does not provide for Black participation in the Council.

A newspaper report yesterday quoted an Indian member of the President's Council as saying that he would resign from the Council unless Blacks were included as full members within a year of its inauguration.

The report left the impression that this member, Mr Pat Poovalingham, was given the assurance by a Cabinet Minister that Blacks would sit on the Council in two years' time.

Asked whether he had been given any such undertakings, Mr Poovalingham is quoted as aying: "No comment. You can draw your own conclusion."

NEW HYDROELECTRIC POWER PROJECT PLANNED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 15 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] THE Swaziland Electricity Boards' plan for a new E45 million power station near the foot of the Malagwane Hill could save an outflow of about E2 million a year from the country in terms of money saved by the reduction in power bought from South Africa.

Details of the power station were released by the Electricity Board at the end of last month.

The output of the station will be 20MW - enough to power 20,000 single-bar electric heaters for one hour, or 200,000 ordinary 100-watt household lightbulbs.

The S.E.B. hope to go to tender on the project at the beginning of next year and they hope the first sod of earth will be turned about next August.

The station will house two 10MW turbo-alternators, fed with water diverted from the Usushwana near Siphocosini. Annual output will exceed 90 million kilowatt hours.

The Usushwana will be dammed by a 40 metre high rockfill embankment about two kilometres downstream of the bridge on the Mbabane-Mhlambanyatsi road. From near the dam wall, engineers will construct a 4,5 km tunnel through the solid granite of the Luphohlo Mountain which will lead the diverted water to the Ezulwini Valley.

From the tunnel a steel pipeline will take the water to the power station, 250 metres below.

After the water has passed through a turbine it will discharge into rivers which rejoin the Usushwana near Lobamba. The water will then be used again in the Edwaleni Power Station and a third time at Maguduza.

The dam near Siphocosini will fill up in the rainy season and will be gradually drawn down in the dry season. The storage of flood waters will allow the Edwaleni and Maguduza stations to increase their outputs by three million kWh in the dry season of each year as well as improving the irrigation potential of the Lusutfu, downstream of Maguduza.

The entire scheme will take three years to complete and will cost E45 million. It is hoped that international lending agencies will lend E30 million and part of the rest of the cost is likely to come in the form of loans by the Swaziland Government and the Swaziland National Provident Fund, with the Swaziland Electricity Board contributing the balance.

By the time the station is complete in 1984, the annual requirements of the S.E.B. are estimated to be in the region of 450 million kWh, of which the existing Edwaleni and Maguduza stations contribute 130 million kWh.

The S.E.B. has also been considering plans for another new power station, on the Lusutfo near Sidvokodvo. It would be an 8MW, 30 million kWh a year station. But the scheme has been shelved for the present until more loan finance is available.

THIS illustration depicts the Swaziland Electricity Board's proposed E45 million hydro-electric scheme, to be completed by 1984.

MPHEPHU STATES VENDA'S DEMAND FOR MORE LAND

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 15 Sep 80 p 10

[Text]

THOYOHANDOU. — Venda would be satisfied by nothing but acquisition of the additional land it had asked for, the Venda President, Paramount Chief Patrick Mphephu, said at the weekend.

Addressing the Venda nation on the first anniversiry of their independence, at Thohoyandou Independence Stadium, he said: "We have asked the South African Government to incorporate Louis Trichardt, Tshipise, Messina, Soekmekaar and Levubu into Venda.

"These areas will be growth points to act as springboards for Venda's economic development.

"Although the request may appear radical to some people, we believe South Africa has to be restructured in such a way that the aspirations of the Blacks are satisfied.

"Whites and other racial groups in those areas should not fear to be incorporated in Venda. Those who wish to retain their properties and land can do so even after the incorporation of these areas."

He called upon all leaders of Southern African states to maintain peace and stability in the area by keeping the closest friendly relationships with one another.

"The existing economic links could be used to promote the friendship," he said.

When his country had opted for independence, many critics thought Venda had committed a heinous crime. "I am proud to tell you that we have nothing to regret on this decision. Today we are enjoying the fruits of our independence.

"Adverse Press comments prohesised division and disagreement, and I am happy our achievements have proved the opposite.

"I challenge those who still have misgivings and doubts about Venda to come and see for themselves what we have achieved within a year of our independence."

Developments at the towns of Thohoyandou, Makhado, Vuwani, Shayandima, Mutale and Makwarela and the building of the airport would accelerate the tempo of Venda's economic growth.

Compulsory education was Venda's ultimate objective and parents should pledge to keep their children at school. The planning of a university was at an advanced stage and construction would start in January 1981. — Sapa.

MANAGEMENT-ASSISTED NATAL SUGAR UNION EVOKES CRITICISM

Capetown MUSLIM NEWS in English 5 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Article by Omar Badsha]

[Text]

Trade unionists in Natal have reacted strongly to the Muslim News disclosures that the management in the sugar industry had helped finance a union, and are especially shocked at a TUCSA official's response to this new development.

The reactions are the latest development in the growing controversy in the trade union movement after last week's admission by Mr Selby Ntsibande that his newly-formed union was given a 5-year interest-free loan of R10 000 to help get it established.

The loan was given to Mr Ntsibande's National Union of Sugar Manufacturing and Refining Employees by the sugar industry employers in Natal.

Mr Alec Ervin, secretary of the Federation of South African Trade Unions (FOSATU), the largest federation of non-racial independent unions, said that the setting up of a 'company union' by management was a blatant act of interference in trade union activities and an obvious move to undermine the rights of workers to freedom of association.

In an obvious attack on TUCSA, he said, 'Unlike some trade unions FOSATU would have no dealings with a management-created union.'

He said that company unions went against all the traditions of the workers' movement and would, in the final analysis, undermine the position of any workers' movement which went out of its way to encourage its growth.

Mr Michael Mugabane, secretary of the Sweet, Food and Allied Workers Union, which has been organising for the past two years in the sugar industry said, 'My union is going to mount a campaign to inform workers about the existence of the financial links between the new union and the sugar employers.'

Mr Mugabane told Muslim News that many workers were suspicious of the new sugar union, especially when workers learnt that one of the union organisers was a former senior personnel officer at Tongaat Mills, and that he was also the chairman of the union.

The startling comment of Mrs Lucy Mvubelo, secretary of the 18 000-strong National Union of Clothing Workers, to a question posed by Muslim News as to how she viewd the problem of so-called African unions being financed by management was:

'I see nothing wrong in a union approaching management for financial assistance — providing the union pays back the loan.'

The management loan to the newly-established sugar union can be directly linked to Mrs Mvubelo's admission that she was invited, together with four other trade unionists, by sugar industry employers, to address members of the Liaison Committee from the sugar industry on aspects of trade unionism. The seminar was held on January 29 at a well-known conference centre at Botha's Hill, outside Durban.

Mr Arthur Grobbler, secretary of the Trade Union Council of South Africa (TUCSA), when approached for comment by Muslim News, said that his organization has had dealings with the new sugar union.

When asked how TUCSA viewed the management's move in financing a new union he said, 'I tend to look at these things in a rather cool sort of way.

'Quite candidly I think that things are to be given a chance. One must see how the union develops; whether it is worthwhile for furthering the workers' aspirations.

When Mr Grobbler was told that many unions took a strong view of this sort of development he said, 'You know it is a fact of life that many unions have been given some sort of financial assistance, and quite frankly, some of them get financial assistance from quite suspect sources.

At the time of going to press Muslim News was unable to contact the person in charge of Labour Relations at the Sugar Millers' Association for comment on the new development.

EIGHT BLACK TRADE UNIONS REGISTERED THUS FAR

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 10 Sep 80 p 14

[Text]

JOHANNESBURG. — Eight black trade unions have been registered since the government's new labour dispensation came into effect last October, the Director-General of Manpower Utilisation, Mr Jaap Cilliers, said yesterday.

In addition, there are now 40 mixed trade unions — many of whom are believed to have received permission to enrol black members.

Approached for figures on the composition of the registered union movement, Mr Cilliers said yesterday that 182 trade unions were now registered.

Of these, 80 represented white workers only, 54 coloured workers only and eight black workers. Another 40 were mixed, either for white, coloured and Asian workers or for all four races.

This meant, he said, that the all-white unions were now in the minority.

There are no figures available on the number of black or predominantly black unions in the country at present, but it is believed that at least 20 are still unregistered.

None of the black or predominantly black unions affiliated to the two major black union co-ordinating bodies, the Federation of SA Trade Unions and the Consultative Committee of Black Trade Unions, have been granted registration.

Labour observers regard the government's reaction to their registration applications as a key test for the new dispensation.

Thus far, only "parallel" unions — those with close links to their non-black counterparts — or black "company unions" have been registered.

Recently, several Fosatu-affiliated unions were granted permission by the Minister of Manpower Utilisation, Mr Fanie Botha, to apply for registration on a non-racial basis.

Some labour observers have criticized the fact that most of the "independent" unions — those not closely associated to registered non-black unions — have not yet been registered despite the fact that they applied several months ago.

However, its supporters reply that many registration applications took up to a year to process before black workers were allowed to join registered unions.

Several black or non-racial unions have decided not to seek registration, arguing that to do so would be to submit to increased government control.

SASOL CHAIRMAN DISCUSSES OIL STOCKPILE, ENERGY SOURCES

Johannesburg THE CITIZEN in English 6 Sep 80 p 1

[Article by Gordon Kling]

[Text]

SOUTH AFRICA's oil stockpiles are capable of sustaining the country for longer than those of any other country in the world and they were obtained at rock-bottom prices.

This was stated in Cape Town yesterday by the chairman of Sasol, Dr D P de Villiers, who also disclosed that the stockpiling programme had been virtually completed before the oil-price spiral began in the early Seventies.

This means the country has seen the value of its investment go up by at least 12 times times in the past seven years alone. South Africa could have been expected to make purchases at Opec prices below $3 a barrel in the early 1970s compared with current prices of about $38 a barrel.

Speaking at the dedication ceremony of the Cape Technikon, Dr De Villiers said it had not been necessary to use "one drop" of the strategic crude oil reserves, and regular tests indicated that the quality of the reserves remained constant.

Referring to South Africa's leading position in synthetic fuels, he said that of the first $100 million allocated by the United States Department of Energy for design work on these fuel products, $90 million had gone into projects in which Sasol was involved in either a consulting or licensing capacity.

Other examples of progress made in energy included the coal-export programme which took into account the desirability of conducting two-way international trade in energy while improving the investment climate for coal here, and the substitution of fuel oils by coal gas as a source of energy for industries in the country's main industrial area.

Numerous plans for the production of ethanol for motor fuel had fallen by the wayside because they were too costly, he said, but the time was likely to come when many of these schemes would become economical.

REPORT ON 1976 CENSUS RELEASED

Mbabane THE TIMES OF SWAZILAND in English 15 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

SWAZILAND is on the threshold of a massive population explosion which could double the present population of about 500 000 in the next 20 years - and send it rocketing to more than seven million by the year 2050.

According to the official report on the 1976 Population Census - just released - the Swazi population of Swaziland is one of the fastest-growing in the whole of Africa, with a huge rate of natural increase of 3.36 percent a year.

Even census officials were surprised that the figure was so high. The report - prepared by the Central Statistical Office of the Department of Economics, Planning and Statistics, part of the Prime Minister's Office - warns:

"The continuance of high fertility and declining mortality appears less realistic, as they would generate such high rates of growth that they could not be sustained for long. Thus if this set of projections is extrapolated beyond the end of this century, they show the de jure population passing the two million mark before 2015, and reaching a figure of between seven and eight million by 2050."

The report also says: "The close agreement between the estimated rate of natural increase and the inter-censal growth rate of the Swazi population born in Swaziland suggests that the estimated rates of fertility and mortality may be regarded as a reasonably sound basis for the construction of future estimates and projections of the African population of Swaziland, until such time as a new census or survey throws fresh light on these important questions."

The census also reveals that Swazi women give birth to an average of 6.87 children each. Women with primary schooling have more children than women with no schooling at all. And only among women with secondary education was there any significant indication of reduced fertility.

Swazis are living longer. Estimates based on 1966 census data gave an expectation of life at birth of about 44 years for both sexes combined. The 1976 analysis indicated life expectation at birth (for both sexes combined) is now about 46,5 years. Infant mortality has also decreased.

But one distinctive feature revealed by the census is that Swazi men die a lot earlier than their womenfolk. The average lifespan for a man is 43 years, while for a woman it is 49 years.

The report says: "Male mortality rates are higher than female at all ages. This is usually the case in both African and European populations and many Asian ones. However, the differential in Swaziland, especially in early adulthood and middle age, are unusually large. For example, male rates are about 35 percent higher than female rates in the twenties, and about 50 percent higher in the forties."

This feature is also reflected in Botswana and Lesotho.

The report compares statistics from other African countries on the numbers of women whose parents were still alive at the time of the census. Proportions for Swaziland fall half-way between the extremes for the other countries.

The report says: "A striking feature of this table are the very large differences between proportions with surviving mother and proportions with surviving father in Swaziland, Botswana and Lesotho compared with Malawi and Uganda. This may indicate a high excess male mortality among adults in Swaziland and its nearest neighbours."

This contributes to an imbalance of the sexes in adult ages, in a population which already has a very low male female ratio due to the large number of men who work outside Swaziland.

Swaziland also has a high proportion of children and a low proportion of old people, which is attributable primarily to the high level of fertility.

Census experts used statistics gathered in the 1976 census to look into the possible future for Swaziland. They based their projections on three different assumptions:

(1) That both fertility and mortality will remain constant at the estimated

1976 levels: a total fertility of 6.87 births per woman and expectations of life at birth of 42.94 years for men and 49.47 years for women.

(2) That fertility will remain constant and mortality will fall steadily in such a way that the expectation of life at birth will increase by one third of a year annually, reaching values of 50.78 years for men and 57.46 years for women in the year 2 000; and (3) that both fertility and mortality will fall, the latter as outlined above and the former in such a way that the total fertility rate declines by 0.1 annually, thus reaching a figure of 4.47 by the year 2 000. The patterns of fertility rates by age envisage this decline as occuring both as a result of rising age at marriage and of family planning.

The report says: "Of the three different sets of assumptions, the second - constant fertility and falling mortality - would appear to be the most realistic in view of the fact that when compared with the estimates derived from the 1966 census, the 1976 results indicated a modest improvement in mortality and virtually no change in fertility."

Also on the basis of the second set of projections, the report attempts to forecast the number of children of primary school age for each year up to 1986. It concludes: "... if the Government's target of universal primary education for six - to 12-year-olds by 1986 is to be achieved, at least another 49,000 primary school places will have to be created, while to accommodate a corresponding proportion of the 13-19 age-group could require another 35,000 places."

AN illustration from the report on the 1976 Swaziland Population Census just released. This drawing shows changes in the distribution of population in the decade between the last census and that of 1966. Greatest increase - 162 percent - was at Tjaneni, while the populations of Big Bend and Siteki declined.

The number of jobs needed in the future is another aspect of the report. In 1976 a total of 236,681 Swazis were of working age - between 15 and 65. Of these, 43 percent of the men and 13 percent of the women were in full-time paid employment.

The report says: "If this level of employment is to be maintained, a further 22,000 jobs will have to be created by 1986." But it warns: "In practice, however, the demand for jobs is likely to be appreciably greater than this, since with increasing education, the proportion of the labour force who would be content to derive their livelihood from subsistence farming will diminish."

GOVERNMENT RELIEF FOR DISASTER AREAS PRAISED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Editorial]

[Text]

WE take our hats off to Mr Willima of the Cabinet Office for acting promptly on the sorry situation in some parts of Senanga and Sesheke districts, particularly Imusho.

That is the type of reaction the masses expect from officers employed by their Party and its Government. Public offices are not for ostriches.

It is indeed gratifying to learn from Mr Willima that hundreds of bags of food are already on their way to the affected region.

The magnitude of the problem is seen from the amount of money the Party and its Government are going to spend on relief.

And Mr Willima estimates that the relief supplies will be enough to sustain the people in that area until their next harvest of crops in the new year.

The committee, includes permanent secretaries and general managers of relevent ministries and chaired by Mr Adamson, has so far bought 45,700 bags of maize worth K309,739 and 1,190 bags of groundnuts worth K59,500.

However a word of caution is called for here. The "high - powered committee" must work hard in overseeing the distribution of the relief food to the people.

If distribution is going to be left in the hands of junior officers, before long there will be a flood of reports that food is not reaching its destination or it is being sold for personal gain.

Such a prospect cannot be dismissed: It has happened over thirty bags of maize which were sent to the area in June.

While people are dying of starvation some of that maize is still lying uneaten and is becoming wasted because the villagers are destitute and have no money to buy it.

Those who could afford the K10.61 for a bag later resold to their neighbours for much more.

Now that the Party and its Government have officially moved in the situation should improve. That is why the Adamson committee's job task is onerous Officers charged with distributing relief will have to travel long distances over difficult terrain. The area is thinly populated.

Worse still is the fact that there are landmines which were planted by South African soldiers when they occupied the area.

So the relief teams will need to be guided by members of the Zambia National Defence Force who have performed commendably in restoring peace there.

We suggest that for security and effective supervision of stores, food depots should be set up at strategic points to which villagers can go for their rations.

Local Party cadres, MPs and information men must go all out and spread the word for the people to know the depot sites.

It is no use having mounds of supplies which cannot reach the mouths of those for whom it is intended.

MEMACO PRE-TAX PROFITS REPORTED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 4

[Text]

THE Metal Marketing Corporation (MEMACO) has scooped a pre-tax profit of K7.5 million during the financial year ended March 31, 1980.

Chairman Mr James Mapoma, who is Zimco Director-general said in Lusaka yesterday at the presentation of the report, that this signified the continued soundness of the company and efficiency of management.

The company made K3.9m after tax profit last year.

Mr Mapoma told guests at a reception that he was proud of Memaco because of its good results.

"It gives me pride for a company like Memaco which has a share capital of K500,000 to produce such a result and now it is sitting comfortably on reserves of more than K4 million and this is how a company should be run," Mr Mapoma said.

He said already a tax of about K3.6 million had been paid out to the Government.

"We are proud to pay this money and because of this good performance the company has decided to declare dividends worth K1.8 million," he said.

The mining industry had also done exceptionally well this year with pre-tax profits of K288 million.

Even in difficult times the industry had continued to provide the Government with revenue because of sound business management.

Mr Mapoma explained that Zimco's unconsolidated profits now stood at K238 million, an improvement of about 100 per cent more than last year's figure of 181 million.

He added that during 1979 the group was earning an average of K100 million per month in foreign exchange for the country.

"This shows that the economy is still very dependent on the mining industry," he said.

He called on other Zimco companies to be more profitable for the general well-being of the country's economy.

In the report, Mr Mapoma says that the quantity of non-ferrous metal prices handled by Memaco from April 1979 to March 1980, outstripped the four preceding years with an average London Metal Exchange copper settlement level reaching K1,705 per tonne.

"It is clear therefore that in real terms the prices of non-ferrous metals have not risen, but fallen substantially in terms of cost of other goods and services.

"Indications are that major economies may be thrown off course again this year," he says.

During the same period the prices of other main metals marketed by the corporation rose between 1.4 per cent and 400 per cent. Cobalt rose by 400 per cent, lead by 240 per cent and zinc by only 1.4 per cent.

These figures must, however, be discounted by factors which are largely outside the control of the mining industry such as escalating costs in mineral exploitation, unprecedented high interest rates and declining ore grades in old mines, he said.

"The supply-demand outlook which the combination of these factors portends, if left unchecked could strike at the very roots of mining and the pattern of world trade in these metals," Mr Mapoma said.

He adds that therefore the country's priorities must remain to secure metal prices which are remunerative to producers and fair to consumers within the present general economic climate.

"Needless to say that lack of revenue has greatly hampered the development of our country's infrastructure and transport facilities. To this we have had to suffer serious damage to existing facilities as a result of our support for the liberation struggle in neighbouring Zimbabwe," Mr Mapoma says.

He adds, however, that he is hopeful that the risk of interruptions suffered in the flow of exports in previous years because of transport difficulties will be reduced.

On cobalt, Mr Mapoma says the metal will continue to contribute to the profitability of the operating companies and Memaco will spare no effort that the present and future production is marketed to best effect.

COPPERBELT TEACHERS THREATEN TO STRIKE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

TEACHERS on the Copperbelt have threatened to boycott this year's primary and secondary school examinations unless the Government reviews their salaries by the end of next month.

Zambia National Union of Teachers Copperbelt regional secretary Mr John Mulenga described the situation in the province as "very bad".

He would travel to Lusaka tomorrow to consult ZNUT general secretary Mr Shiyenge Kapini on the matter.

Mr Mulenga addressed meetings in Kitwe, Mufulira, Chingola, Luanshya and Ndola and at each of the meetings, the teachers' tempers "were high".

He said the teachers now felt that the time taken by the Government to review their salaries according to the demands and proposals made early last year was too long.

Downed

Meanwhile, teachers at a primary school in Ndola's Kawama township, downed chalks on Monday and only resumed work yesterday after demanding that Ndola council provides the institution with water.

Intulo primary school has been without water for 15 days.

Workers at the Workmen's Compensation Board and International Labour Organisation-run Vocational Rehabilitation Centre in Ndola, are meanwhile demanding the removal of the manager with immediate effect or they will resort to strike action.

Ministry of Labour and Social Services, permanent secretary, Mr Bwembya Lukutati, yesterday spoke to some members of staff to avert a sit-down protest by the 16 workers.

Mr Lukutati told the workers that he had instructed acting centre director Mr Shantondo Chiyanika and other officials to look into the workers' demands to have the manager transferred elsewhere

ILLEGAL ALIENS ROUNDED UP IN SHANTY TOWNS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

A TOTAL of 236 aliens was rounded up from Ndola's Sinia and Chipulukusu shanty townships yesterday when armed police, soldiers and National Service personnel launched a dawn operation clean-up.

The foreigners, who were cornered when security officers surrounded the townships at about four hours in the morning, were whisked away to Kamfinsa prison in Kitwe where they are being screened.

Copperbelt deputy police chief Mr Levy Bwacha said in Ndola that several suspected criminals were among those rounded up and a number of television sets, radios and other items believed to have been stolen were found.

The exercise caused workers to be late for work because they were stopped from leaving the township until the search started.

A Times of Zambia team which visited Sinia was not allowed to leave until later.

Workers who could not produce identity cards were ordered to join others who had been grouped at points guarded by soldiers.

Mr Bwacha said: "We have rounded up 236 foreigners from the township and taken them to Kamfinsa prison where they will be thoroughly checked to determine how they came into the country without proper documents."

He denied reports that a man who wanted to flee from the township was shot dead by soldiers.

But he added that a man collapsed at Kitwe immigration office and died while his papers were being processed.

In Kitwe, a woman was admitted to the central hospital yesterday with leg injuries sustained after a stray bullet fired by police officers who were chasing two suspects in Luangwa township hit her.

Mr Bwacha said one suspect was arrested but the other escaped.

Acting hospital senior medical superintendent, Mr Harry Sunkwa-Mills, described the condition of Mrs Keneti Mulenga who was injured in the left leg as satisfactory.

A number of Kashitu township residents in Livingstone were rounded up and taken in a truck to the police station yesterday in a surprise clean-up exercise.

Most of those picked up were said to be aliens and armed police and soldiers confiscated property believed to have been stolen.

Southern division police chief, Mr Christopher Mutemwa, declined to comment on the operation.

Police are still compiling a list of people rounded up in their "operation clean-up" in some Lusaka township, Inspector-General Mr Crispin Katukula, said

Listing and counting of the people and property involved was still being carried out and figures would be ready by today or tomorrow.

Meanwhile, Zambia Congress of Trade Unions chairman Mr Frederick Chiluba said the ZCTU was appalled at the rate at which crime was being committed in the country.

Commenting on the crime wave, Mr Chiluba said workers wanted to find out from the Government how long it would take for peace to return.

GOVERNMENT URGED TO IMPLEMENT INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT ACT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 4

[Text]

THE Government has been urged to put into effect the revised Industrial Development Act soon as one of the measures needed to improve the economy.

Chairman of the Zambian Industrial and Commercial Association Mr Hellins Chabi yesterday expressed fears that Zambia's uncontrolled population growth would be doubled by the end of century.

Speaking at the annual meeting of the association, Mr Chabi noted that Zambia continued to register a positive trade balance while all the major economies in the world with the exception of Canada, West Germany and Australia, were experiencing trade deficits in the last 12 months.

On copper Mr Chabi pointed out that supply and demand relations for the metal over the past three years had been such that Zambia had been unwise to over-produce it in the light of falling prices.

Circles

"We hope that efforts being made in international circles, in particular the Lome Two accord, will go a long way towards convincing the industrialised countries to pay their prices for the exports from the Third World," Mr Chabi said.

He praised the Government for its incentives towards the farming community as well as efforts by the Bank of Zambia in reducing payments arrears.

But Zambia will not make any headway in tourism because of prohibitive air fares.

ZICA CHAIRMAN EXPRESSES CONCERN OVER STRUGGLING ECONOMY

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Sep 80 p 2

[Text]

THE economy continues to cause concern although the situation has now begun to improve, chairman of the Zambian Industrial and Commercial Association Mr Hellins Chabi has said.

Mr Chabi says this in an annual report presented to the association's general meeting and released in Lusaka on Tuesday.

He calls for hard work to reverse the rate of economic decline.

On the performance of agriculture, Mr Chabi says production in this sector remains at a level where the country is unable to supply all food requirements for the rest of this year while further imports are expected during 1981.

Recent incentives announced by the Government to encourage non-Zambian farmers to produce more maize, wheat and soya beans, is a step in the right direction.

"This is a step in the right direction and we hope further incentives and allowances will be granted to boost production of other agricultural goods," Mr Chabi says.

The exodus of highly qualified and experienced mining personnel is still going on. "It is, however, gratifying that the industry has returned to profitability."

He calls for fair prices for Third World exports to help boost economic growth and create new markets for further exports from the developed world.

On manufacturing and trading, Mr Chabi says industries and concerns are still facing foreign exchange problems and while the situation improves, these areas will play a substantial role in helping curb the level of unemployment in the country.

The country still registers a positive trade balance and in 1979 there was an overall balance of payments surplus of just over K158 million.

IMPLEMENTATION OF 1978 CANADIAN CROP AID AGREEMENT DELAYED

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 7

[Text]

THE implementation of an agreement signed between Zambia and Canada in 1978 under which the latter was to build 64 maize and fertiliser storage sheds in Zambia worth K18 million has been delayed because of a rise in costs.

This was disclosed in Lusaka yesterday by the second secretary development at the Canadian high commission, Mr David Viveash.

Mr Viveash said under the agreement, Canada was expected to have started building the sheds last year, but for the significant rise in costs.

He said that after the agreement was signed, his government has sent a team of experts to inspect the sheds and review the estimate.

Later it was discovered the costs had increased significantly, especially the prices of cement and other building materials.

Mr Viveash said the new estimates, which he could not reveal, had already been sent back to his country's treasury board—committee of ministers — for verification and approval before work on the project could start.

He said the Canadian high commission in Lusaka expected to get a reply from the board in the next six weeks.

When a reply is received the high commission would advertise for local tenders for the work to start, Mr Viveash said.

Meanwhile, Mr Viveash said a planning mission from the Canadian International Agency for Development (CIDA) is expected to arrive in Zambia next month to review Canadian-backed projects and to identify new areas where more aid was needed.

Similar

He said the mission which was similar to one which came to Zambia in November 1976 would be involved in agriculture, although other sectors would also be covered.

Canada has a technical assistance scheme with Zambia Railways.

Canada has given Zambia a K10 million loan to boost the agricultural and fish industries, in addition to the K1,318,000 loan clinched from the Canadian Government by the Development Bank of Zambia for food production.

Presently 640 hectares of land have been cleared in Mbala, Northern Province, for a rain-fed wheat project, and Mr Viveash said 360 more hectares would be cleared for the same project.

To complement this, he said, Canada had seconded two wheat experts at Mount Makulu agricultural research station to see how Zambia could increase its wheat production and prevent crop diseases.

LAND DISTRIBUTED TO VILLAGERS IN SOUTHERN PROVINCE

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Ministry of Lands and Natural Resources has given portions of land to villagers in Southern Province to alleviate the shortage in the area.

This is in response to complaints from villagers that there was a critical shortage of grazing and farm land.

Lands and Natural Resources Minister, Mr Clement Mwananshiku, announced at a news conference in Lusaka yesterday that the Government had given land to the "aggrieved" villagers and that they were free to settle anywhere. He did not say how much land had been given out.

President Kaunda last year announced that a commission of inquiry would be set up to look into the problem of land distribution in Southern Province.

He said the commission would find out how much land was under occupation so that those with too much of it could share it with others.

But asked for details of the presidential inquiry results yesterday, Mr Mwananshiku said this was outside his jurisdiction.

"The Prime Minister's office would answer that one," he said.

In January, Bweengwa Member of Parliament, Mr Rex Natala, warned there might be a mass exodus of people from Chiefs Nyamusonde, Choongo and Monze if the shortage of land there was not solved.

Mr Mwananshiku also warned his ministry would repossess idle farms.

Commenting on 15 Zimbabwean farmers in Chelston whose farms were recently repossessed by the Government and given to Zambians because they were allegedly being wasted, Mr Mwananshiku said the commissioner of lands was under instructions to repossess any farm which was not utilised.

Mr Mwananshiku, who has just returned from an international seminar on parks and game reserves in the United States, said the Party and its Government were in a "hurry" to boost food production and would not condone laziness by farmers.

Although he was not aware of the 15 farmers who he said had not yet approached him over the matter, his ministry would take appropriate action against erring farmers in line with Government policy.

"I wish to warn farmers that if they do not use land leased to them for long periods, they should give it up voluntarily instead of waiting for the ministry to repossess it," he said.

On housing plots, Mr Mwananshiku said people given plots should know that the same rules would apply to them. They should build houses within the stipulated two years or the ministry would move in.

"It is not my intention to disturb plot owners. The onus really is on them to develop the land given to them and help the Government improve the housing situation in the country," he said.

Those who were interested in developing housing estates should approach the commissioner of lands.

Mr Mwananshiku said an aerial survey by the Government and a Swedish company in Western Province was going according to plan and it should be completed before the end of the year.

Meanwhile, the Zambia National Farmers' Union has called on the Party and its Government to re-organise the agricultural development programme and give a chance to the peasant farmers to produce more food for the nation.

The union said the K54 million intended for importing yellow maize should be given to the Agricultural Finance Company.

Chairman of the union, Mr David Malimba, said in a statement yesterday that the Government should create a department of extension officers in which graduates from the National Resources Development College and the University of Zambia would be involved.

POLICE DESCRIBE DISCOVERY OF ANTI-KAUNDA LETTERS

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

TWO senior police officers described in a Ndola magistrate's court yesterday how their search led to the discovery of a stencil reproduced into about 753 "seditious" letters urging President Kaunda to resign.

Chief Inspector, Johnson Mazala, and Assistant Superintendent Moses Munkambe, were testifying in a case in which Chisala Mukunto, 38 of Washa farm in Ndola Rural and Abel Mukuka Chileshe, 43, personel officer of Mwata Kazembe Crescent, Ndola, are charged with sedition.

Mr Munkambe told senior resident magistrate, Mr Claver Musumali that on August 2 last year he was instructed by the assistant commisioner Criminal Investigation Department (CID) to search the house of Mukunto at his Kabwe road farm house.

Mr Munkambe said he found 253 copies of "notorious and subversive" letters talking about the Government in a car. He later went to Ujamaa grocery in Northrise belonging to Mukunto where he found about 500 more copies.

Mr Mazala said he was instructed to search Chileshe's office at Northland Engineering and his house.

He did not find anything relevant to State security matters at the house, but when he went to Chileshe's office, he found a cut copy of a photostat stencil letter addressed to President Kaunda.

He took the items to Ndola Central Police Station.

Mukunto is charged with five counts of publishing, distributing and having seditious publications while Chileshe faces one charge of having seditious materials.

The trial continues.

● A 33-year-old man was yesterday jailed for eight months for theft by agent.

Joseph Musonda of Masala township pleaded guilty to the charge before Ndola magistrate Mr Robby Mutemwa.

AUSTRALIAN TRAINING ASSISTANCE SOUGHT

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 17 Sep 80 p 7

[Text]

ACTING Foreign Affairs Minister, Professor Lameck Goma, has urged Australia to train Zambia's manpower to enhance development.

The liberation war of Zimbabwe in which Zambia was "embroiled" left no room for the country to enjoy its independence, but now that the issue was resolved it was time to devote "our energies to development," he said.

Speaking in Lusaka yesterday when acting Australian high commissioner to Zambia, Mr Michael Potts presented his letters of introduction to him, Prof Goma noted that Zambia's lack of trained manpower in many fields made a mockery of the development concept.

He said: "One of our major problems is lack of trained manpower. We need your help in many fields because you cannot talk of development when there are no skilled people."

Zimbabwe's success, he said, was an enormous achievement for the Frontline states. "It is a success of humanity and of all progressive forces that believe in the dignity of man."

Prof Goma, who is Education and Culture Minister, called on Zambia and Australia to strengthen the Commonwealth by agitating for the removal of tension and unhappiness in the world.

"We can reduce tension and unhappiness however little this may be. But the important thing to note is that by so doing we can go a long way in influencing world bodies like the United Nations on this course," he said.

As members of the Commonwealth, the two countries should pressure industrialised countries to halt the arms race. "That way we shall move forward as members of a family," he added.

He paid tribute to Australia for the role she played during last year's Commonwealth summit in Lusaka preceding the Lancaster House talks which led to Zimbabwe's eventual independence.

Mr Potts pledged his country's support for the liberation struggle in Southern Africa and called on the progressive world not to lose hope.

He said Australia would continue to help Zambia's economic development.

NDOLA COUNCIL APPROVES CONSTRUCTION OF HAMMARSKJOELD MUSEUM

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 5

[Text]

NDOLA council has approved the construction of the K100,000 Dag Hammarskjoeld memorial museum at the site where the plane carrying the late United Nations secretary-general, Mr Dag Hammarskjoeld, crashed on September 18, 1961.

According to the latest returns of approved plans for last month, the museum is among three principal projects approved at a total cost of K650,000.

Plans for the construction of the museum were initiated by the Dag Hammarskjoeld Foundation five years ago, but until this year no major financial contributions were donated.

In May, it was announced that Swedish companies in Zambia and the Swedish government had donated K50,000 towards the construction of the museum which is expected to be completed by September next year.

The completion of the museum and its official opening were planned to coincide with the 20th anniversary of Mr Hammarskjoeld's death, according to the committee.

Announcing the Swedish contribution, his nephew, Mr Knut Hammarskjoeld told Ndola mayor Mr Julius Sakala and other officials at a brief ceremony held at the site outside Ndola that the museum should be a place where visitors should be able to gather knowledge.

He said: "The museum should not be concerned exclusively with Hammarskjoeld himself.

"I think my uncle would have had objections to such an individualistic project.

"What each visitor should bring back with him when leaving the museum is the importance of service, dedicated service of each of us to our work, to our respective nations, and to the international community."

Mr Sakala, who spoke for the foundation chairman Mr Tom Mtine said some local companies had promised to help and see the project off the ground.

OFFICIAL TO PROBE BEHAVIOR OF STUDENTS IN ROMANIA

Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Ministry of Education and Culture is sending the secretary of the bursaries committee to Romania to investigate reports of Zambian students who drink too much.

Minister of State for Education Mr Alan Chilimboyi warned yesterday that should the reports be true the students involved would be recalled.

Mr Chilimboyi said the Party and its Government were spending thousands of Kwacha training Zambians abroad in science and technology in order to produce the manpower needed to develop the country.

He said students on courses abroad who became indisciplined were not only doing injustice to themselves, but were also betraying the country.

"Zambia as a developing country, is still lagging behind and needs every manpower available to bring her in line with other countries in science and technology," he said.

Mr Chilimboyi said the findings of the report by the secretary of the bursaries committee would determine the disciplinary measures to be taken by the ministry against the culprits.

And permanent secretary for the ministry Mr Peter Siwo has appealed to district education officers to ensure that examinations in all districts were conducted properly.

Mr Siwo said this in Lusaka yesterday when he opened a workshop for 27 district education officers from Central, Lusaka, Eastern and Western provinces.

He said over the past few years there had been many malpractices and thefts of examination papers in districts and this had caused great concern to the Government and the public.

He told the education officers to ensure that examination papers were evenly distributed to all schools and other centres in their areas.

Mr Siwo told the participants that the ministry headquarters and the examinations section were to introduce measures to improve the situation.

"Already some of these measures have been implemented while others may take a little longer because of certain constraints," he said.

Demanding

Mr Siwo outlined the role of district education officers in the educational system, saying their work was "very demanding" as they were in close contact with headmasters and staff in schools.

He described their role as a link between the local community and the educational system.

Because of the importance of their work, district education officers must fully understand the regulations governing conditions of service for teachers and problems their schools were experiencing.

He said as society changed and imposed new demands on the educational system, the responsibilities of the education officers also increased, and it was for this reason that they should relate the changes in the economic, social and political development to the educational needs of people.

Mr Siwo said directives from the Central Committee had been issued so that education officers could be instruments for mobilising both human and material resources.

The post of district education officer, although upgraded since January 1, 1979, did not come into effect because of constraints which were being looked into by the ministry, he said.

A similar workshop would be organised for other provinces at a later date.

BRIEFS

EXPORTS TO FRANCE--Zambia's exports to France during the first five months of this year amounted to about K91 million against her import bill from France of about K7.4 million. The French charge d'affaires in Zambia Mr Jean Michel disclosed this in Lusaka yesterday and noted that the trade was in favour of Zambia. He said in 1977, Zambia exported goods to France worth about K89 million against goods imported from France for about K15.2 million. In 1978, Zambia's export bill to France stood at about K71.8 million compared to her import bill of about K0.94 million, he said. Zambia exported to France goods worth about K183.2 million and imported about K9.2 million worth of goods last year. Meanwhile, a trade and investment mission from the London chamber of commerce and industry will visit Zambia in November in a bid to boost British-Zambian relations. The team is expected to have discussions with Government officials and parastatal chiefs and private businessmen. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 18 Sep 80 p 2]

ZAMBIAN-ZAIREAN AMITY--Party Secretary-General Mr Mainza Chona on Sunday called for love between Zambians and Zaireans in spite of the border dispute between the two countries. Mr Chona told a rally at Puta Primary School in Nchelenge that Zambians and Zaireans should love one another because they were blood-brothers as they shared a common border. It was Party and Government policy to work for peace and goodwill throughout the world and for peaceful settlement of inter-state disputes. "We have to accept that all Africans are one and most Africans are half-castes," Mr Chona said. He added: "No one can say he is a pure national in his country without any ancestors having come from another African country." He had been briefed on the situation on the border by member of the Central Committee for the Luapula Province Mrs Mary Fulano and promised to make a report to President Kaunda. It was earlier reported that Zairean authorities had claimed part of Zambian territory at Kaputa. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 1]

INFORMATION FLOW--Agriculture and Water Development Minister of State Mr Noah Dilamonu has urged rural information officers to devise an effective communication system between the masses and his ministry. It was important for them to have knowledge and skills for effective communication to enable the flow of information between the town and village communities, he said. Mr Dilamonu was officially opening a two-week provincial rural information officers seminar at Palabana training institute east of Lusaka yesterday. Noting that the seminar was being held when the Government had launched the K400 million "operation food programme," Mr Dilamonu said officers would be instrumental in the success of the programme. "If you are properly organized, you can play a very effective role in our food programme. Rural information service is a big link between my ministry and the rural community. The onus, therefore, rests on you to make it an effective tool for development," he said. Earlier, rural information services chief Mr Wittington Vuttah told Mr Dilamonu that the department had launched seminars throughout the country to equip officers with skills for efficiency. The seminars were being conducted by the department and the Friedrich Neuman Foundation. [Text] [Lusaka TIMES OF ZAMBIA in English 16 Sep 80 p 5]

MUGABE OPPOSES ANTI-SA WAR PREPARATIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 19 Sep 80 p 4

[Text] The Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, yesterday rejected suggestions that Zimbabwe should begin constructing defences such as military airfields in preparation for war with South Africa.

"I do not think our priorities at the present moment allow us to sink funds into a project of this nature. One would want to believe that South Africa also wants peace and that she will not indulge in aggressive activities against us," Mr Mugabe told the House when discussing Zimbabwe's defence programme for the coming year.

Mr Mugabe said it was not only former Selous Scouts who resigned and went to South Africa after the February poll. He said he wished the UANC leader, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, was in the House to comment on the fact that numbers of black Security Force Auxiliaries went to South Africa--"They were recruited by the South African regime and are still in the Transvaal", he said.

Mr Mugabe said the week he left for the Organisation of African Unity conference in Sierra Leone 29 former auxiliaries were arrested (by the South Africans) trying to cross into South Africa and were brought before a South African court at Messina.

Mr Mugabe said the 29 had pleaded in their defence that they were recruited by a man called Marais, on behalf of South Africa, operating from the South African diplomatic mission in Salisbury.

Mr Mugabe said it had been revealed that black and white Zimbabweans had been recruited by South Africa and kept in camps in "the northern part of the Transvaal". He said he regretted it was not known what South Africa intended to do with these recruits who were reported to number 5 000.

Before the South African mission in Salisbury was closed he had asked the mission head what South Africa intended to do with these recruits "and whether this was in accordance with a policy of peaceful co-existence".

Mr Mugabe said he had told the South Africans: "We ourselves did not want to attack South Africa and there was no reason why South Africa was holding them."

The Prime Minister told MPs he regretted that Government plans to integrate guerillas and members of the former Rhodesian army into a Zimbabwean army would not materialise by the end of the year.

To date three battalions (3 000 soldiers) of ZANLA and ZIPRA forces had been integrated, but there had been resistance from the former Rhodesian regular forces.

"The former Rhodesian regular forces are not yet integrated. Perhaps here there was a difference of opinion or approach between the way Government saw things and the way the army saw things and I must also mention here that there has been some resistance . . . and it did not come initially from ZANLA or ZIPRA but from the other side," he said.

However a delegation from the Rhodesia African Rifles had visited him a fortnight ago to ask why they were not being included in the integration exercise.

Mr Mugabe said a programme was now being worked out to integrate the first unit comprising all three sides of the new army and the Joint High Command had assured him it would in future work on full integration.

He expected the army to produce nine integrated battalions the end of the year.

Mr Mugabe emphasised the Government's determination to include in the army all guerillas who chose a military career. About 7 000 bush fighters had been demobilised, he said. They had been either too young or old to remain in the army, had physical handicaps from war injuries or illness, or had voluntarily opted out.

"Those who remain in the army and have chosen to make the army their career will remain in the army and they will become part of the army. The Government is determined that they become part of the army, whatever expense the Government has got to go to in achieving that position," he said.

He defended the plan from criticisms that the State could not afford to sustain such a vast force of men, outlining the scheme for an army that would be martial and productive — armed with spades as well as guns.

He warned: "If there are any old-fashioned ideas to the contrary, those ideas just have to go.

"A soldier has in addition to being armed with a gun, also the function of carrying a hoe, or carrying a hammer, or a spade and doing productive work, including, of course, construction."

In this way the army would become a source of revenue. "If they are going to produce and produce systematically, on a large scale basis, then obviously some of the expense the Government would incur will come from revenue from the commodities and products they are going to produce."

The vote was approved.

RENEWED VIOLENCE BETWEEN ZANU, PF FOLLOWERS, ATTACKS ON POLICE REPORTED

Grenade Attack in Chitungwiza

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 15 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

TWENTY-SEVEN people were injured, three seriously, after a grenade attack inside the Kubatana beerhall in Chitungwiza on Saturday night. The attack was the second in the area in three days. The first was on Thursday night.

A spokesman for Harare Hospital said yesterday that 27 people were admitted to casualty.

"Three of the patients were admitted to hospital and the rest were sent home. The three that have been detained are in a very serious condition," he said.

Mr Thomas Jonga, the manager of Kubatana Beer hall, said the grenade was hurled at the counter, where there were nearly 100 people waiting to buy beer.

He said the incident happened at about 8.45 p.m. He was lucky to escape uninjured.

"The grenade was very powerful. It ripped a hole in the concrete floor. It damaged some of the brickwork on the counter, blew out three light bulbs and tore through the corrugated iron roof," said Mr Jonga.

A security officer at the beerhall, Mr Chenjerai Shana, was waiting by the counter when the grenade was thrown.

Bang

"There was a loud bang and people fell to the ground. After that people got up and started running away. There was blood everywhere. We did not see where the explosive had come from. Everyone was in a state of panic," he explained.

"I watched in horror as one girl, who works in the kiosk on the premises, was hurled onto the floor by the blast. She staggered up, started to run and fell down. Her face, right hand arm and her right leg were injured. She was covered in blood."

Mr Shana suffered injuries to both legs.

A police spokesman said yesterday that the make of the grenade was not yet known.

"But police investigation into the case are continuing. Our team is still at the site".

Attacks in Salisbury, Magondi TTL

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 16 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

A MAN was killed and 12 people hurt when grenade-throwers attacked three houses, and six shacks were burnt in political violence in the Salisbury area at the weekend.

Among those hurt in the incidents in Harare, Salisbury, and Chitungwiza, are four of the attackers, wounded when a grenade exploded before it was thrown.

Three people, including two of the attackers, are said to be in critical condition.

The man who died was Mr Marufu Tsande, who was killed in the Red Cross section of Seke, a Chitungwiza suburb, where six shacks occupied by war refugees were burnt on Saturday night.

The occupants of the houses and many of their neighbours have fled the area and are being looked after at the Patriotic Front's Salisbury offices.

The daughter of the dead man, Miss Maude Tsande, said he was attacked at a party on Saturday.

Speaking at a Patriotic Front Press conference, she said the attackers were shouting ZANU (PF) slogans.

The first of three grenade incidents on Sunday happened at a Seke house at 8.10 p.m.

Mrs Imelda Gwalazimba, the wife of the owner, said the house was under attack by stone-throwers for about four hours.

All the windows were smashed and the inside of the house was wrecked.

A police spokesman said a group of about 12 men attacking the house fled when stones were thrown back at them.

After chasing the attackers, the owner, Mr Aaron Gwalazimba, returned to the house to find four people lying hurt outside.

Mrs Gwalazimba said she and her two-year-old son had hidden under the bed and her husband and her brother, Mr Kesi Moyo, hid behind the door as the stones crashed through the windows.

Arrested

She said the attack ended when the explosion injured some of the attackers.

Other attackers went to the police station at St Mary's claiming a grenade had been thrown at them.

Her husband arrived at the police station while they were there and they were arrested, she said.

Mrs Gwalazimba said she and her husband were active members of the Patriotic Front.

The second grenade incident happened at the home, in Sanyanga Road, Harare, of Mr Bhunu Muchando, who said he was treasurer of the Shinga branch of the ZANU (PF).

Two grenades were thrown at the house while the family was asleep. No one was hurt.

The third grenade attack happened about 10 minutes later at the home of Mr Phillip Mahere in Pazarangu Avenue, Harare, about a stone's throw from Mr Muchando's house.

Mr Mahere, who is a PF branch secretary, said he was giving a party for his son, Samuel, who left for Britain yesterday, when a grenade exploded outside the house.

He said there were about 15 people in and around the house.

Among the eight people taken to hospital were his children, Josephine and Oziza.

He said there was panic and people started to run to neighbouring homes, unaware that they were hurt.

About 80 people, many of them injured, gathered at the PF Press conference. It was claimed that they had lost relatives, homes and property in attacks in the Seke area at the weekend.

Mr Kotsho Dube, an official of the party's publicity department, said ZANU (PF) had "unleashed a wave of unprecedented violence against other parties, especially the Patriotic Front".

Never Muchikwas (18) said he was chased by

ZANU (PF) supporters, who caught him and took him to his mother's house in Unit J section of Seke.

He and his mother were beaten up with iron bars and bricks, he claimed.

Mr James Samushongo said he went to investigate the attack on Mr Muchikwas and was assaulted and left for dead while on his way to report the incident.

He said he did not know any of his attackers, but they knew he was a PF supporter.

Mrs Esther Clayton said the same group chased her to the home of a ZANU (PF) supporter, where she was beaten and left lying on the ground.

The group returned and carried her to her own house.

She said eight of her attackers were her neighbours.

Mrs Dolly Zimondi said a group of people in her area on Saturday afternoon went around saying they wanted to kill all PF supporters.

Police Officer Killed in TTL

A POLICE inspector and an armed dissident have died as a result of a shoot-out yesterday between four dissidents and a Support Unit patrol in the Magondi Tribal Trust Land, 60 km south of Sinoia.

The policeman, Inspector William Gloss, was injured in the contact and taken to Salisbury's Andrew Fleming hospital, where he died yesterday afternoon, a police spokesman said last night.

In a separate incident on Sunday night a businessman was murdered by a group of armed dissidents in the Kanzamba business centre in the Umfuli TTL, about 60 km west of Sinoia.

Sinoia police believe the two shootings are not related. A spokesman said the same gang which murdered the businessman later shot and injured another man in a nearby kraal.

The Support Unit patrol was called out to Zambara business centre in the Magondi TTL yesterday morning to investigate a reported dissident presence.

The patrol traced the gang of four armed men to a nearby kraal.

"One of the dissidents opened fire on the police patrol and Inspector Gloss was hit in the arm, leg and back. The dissident was killed when the patrol returned fire and the other three escaped," a police spokesman said.

Shamuyarira Lays the Blame on PF

BLAME for the wave of political violence was last night placed by the Minister of Information on the Patriotic Front. The Minister, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, issued the following statement:

"Above everything else, the people of Zimbabwe want peace. The Government is sparing no efforts to create conditions of peace. All evidence from independent observers shows that it is the Patriotic Front that is trying to disturb the peace.

"Having lost dismally in the last general election that party is now trying to intimidate Zimbabweans to vote for it in the district council elections next month.

"In the last 36 hours alone, the Press and the police have reported that ZIPRA elements from Romeo assembly point were carried to Sinoia specifically to promote unrest and civil strife.

"They attacked our ZANU (PF) office in the middle of Sinoia on Saturday, then at about 9 p.m. on Sunday our offices in Chinhoyi township (Sinoia) were sprayed with fire from an automatic weapon. No one was injured and no serious damage was done to the building.

At 9 p.m. on Saturday, a man was abducted by six Patriotic Front men who stabbed him five times and tried to cut his throat. He is now recovering in a Salisbury hospital.

"He says the six men who carried him away were making derogatory remarks about the Prime Minister and ZANU (PF).

"In the Salisbury area, evidence of dress, literature, remarks made, even the weapons used, shows that it is ZIPRA elements that have unleashed violence on the innocent population.

FALSE

"The Patriotic Front has never held a meeting in the Salisbury area to put its case to the general public, but resorts to injuring people peacefully drinking their beer or sleeping.

"We call upon all Zimbabweans to dismiss the false allegations of ZAPU (PF) and to be vigilant in tracking down all those elements trying to disturb the peace.

Those responsible for the grenade attacks of last weekend must be exposed and brought to book. We should unite to defend the peace and to uphold the people's wishes and their verdict.

"We must make it clear to all defeated political parties that violence on peaceful Zimbabweans will not be tolerated; and that no one will come to power except through the ballot box. The police are requested to take stern action without favour or partisanship."

President 'Horrified'

PRESIDENT BANANA said last night he was "horrified" at what he described as the "brutal and senseless attack" at a beerhall in Chitungwiza on Saturday night in which 27 people were injured.

The President, who was interviewed on television, spoke of the need for a state of peace, unity and good government in Zimbabwe.

The country now enjoyed relative peace, he said.

There were still "isolated incidents of violence", but he was confident that the Government, in the process of maintaining law and order, would respond appropriately.

Before long it would be possible to eliminate the individuals who were trying to create panic.

"We need unity among all our people. All of us must strive towards fostering a sense of unity among our people.

"Therefore, any tendencies towards things like tribalism, regionalism, sectionalism and racism must be destroyed to bring real peace to Zimbabwe," the President said.

Credit must be given to the forces of law and order and to the "remarkable way in which the people have responded to the Prime Minister's call for reconciliation". Iana quotes the President as saying.

"Ours is a people's government, and the people must be seen to direct affairs and be seen to shape the economic destiny of the country.

"It is a government that is highly capable and we are also fortunate to have a leader in Comrade Mugabe who is not only capable and dynamic but perhaps one of the greatest statesmen of our time."

REPORTAGE ON POLITICAL VIOLENCE, GOVERNMENT COUNTERMOVES

Mugabe, Nkomo Meet

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 pp 1, 6

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, discussed with the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Nkomo, the outbreak of politically motivated violence throughout the country at a meeting on Monday.

Sources said yesterday the leaders talked about ways of stopping the violence which they both fear could escalate as the district council and local government elections draw closer.

Clashes have occurred between rival supporters of ZANU (PF) and the Patriotic Front in Salisbury townships and in Sinoia, but police reported yesterday that peace had returned to Salisbury's local government area.

As leaders of their respective parties, which are partners in the national front Government, Mr Mugabe and Mr Nkomo are said to be both committed to the elimination of inter-party strife.

The Minister of State in the Prime Minister's Office, Mr Emmerson Mnangagwa, who is in charge of State security, is understood to have attended the talks on Monday.

Observers believe the Government will soon issue a stern warning to unruly political party supporters that tough action will be taken against those who breach the peace.

Dr Nkomo was reported as having left his home yesterday evening for a meeting, thought to have been a second session with the Prime Minister over the law and order situation.

IMPROVED

The improved situation in Chitungwiza, the scene of two grenade attacks last week, was confirmed by a council official yesterday.

He said there had been two reports of trouble — an abduction and the chasing of people by an Army vehicle — which, on investigation, had been found to be without foundation.

The "abducted man" had been traced and the Army vehicle found to have been on patrol in the township, said the official. In two former troublespots — Harare and Mufakose — police reported an uneventful Monday night.

This was supported by political party officials who said they had not received any reports of disturbances since Sunday night's attacks in which one man died and 27 were injured, three seriously.

Cover-up Tactics Alleged by PF

THE Patriotic Front yesterday accused the leaders of ZANU (PF) of lacking control over "a large number of ZANLA fighters."

Claiming there was "mounting confusion" within the ZANU (PF) hierarchy, the Patriotic Front, in a statement by the publicity and information department, said leaders of the dominant party in Government had resorted to lying as an instrument of government.

"The impression created by some Ministers is one of a government turned against itself, plodding in a maze of confusion and lack of policy; and apparently out of touch with the urgent needs of the people."

ACCUSATIONS

The statement came after accusations by the Minister of Information and Tourism, Dr Nathan Shamuyarira, that the PF was responsible for the wave of politically-motivated violence sweeping parts of the country.

The party leaders had also adopted "cover-up tactics", including blaming victims for being victimised, said the PF statement.

Turning to the media, the statement alleged information adverse to ZANU (PF) was being suppressed. "Atrocities by ZANLA and ZANU (PF) supporters have been swept under the carpet" because radio had become "an extension of the department of information of ZANU (PF)".

When the Press reported some of the atrocities and events unfavourable to the majority party, it was threatened with banning or censorship.

The bodies of four "unarmed ZIPRA cadrés" abducted at Harare Musika last week were later found buried in shallow graves near Assembly Point Foxtrot after the victims had been shot through the head, claimed the statement.

It went on to say there were areas in the eastern districts which were inaccessible to both the police and journalists because ZANLA had declared its supremacy there.

Ministers were making "reckless statements" without regard to unity and the creation of a foundation for solving the social, political and economic problems the country was facing, the statement added.

Violence Condemned

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 6

[Editorial: "End Violence"]

[Text] HORRIFYING, brutal and senseless. These were terms used by the President to condemn the outbreak of political violence that has already resulted in a toll of death and injury.

There have been claims and counter-claims about who is to blame, but, in such circumstances, it is difficult to establish where responsibility lies.

The essential now is that the violence must end. Surely, Zimbabwe has suffered enough during the bitter years of war.

There seems little doubt the new conflict is connected with the local government elections to be held in November and, unless very firm measures are taken now, the prospects for those elections are grim.

There are, however, even more vital issues involved. A continuance of faction fighting will not only obliterate the fine efforts made so far towards reconciliation, but will do harm to Zimbabwe's image in the world community in which we have so recently taken a place.

The two major participants in the war of liberation, ZANU (PF) and the Patriotic Front, must recognise the danger

We ask the leaders of the parties to defuse the tension while the violence can still be described as "isolated". If they fail to do so, the future is bleak.

As the President wisely said: "Any tendencies towards things like tribalism, regionalism, sectionalism and racism must be destroyed to bring peace to Zimbabwe."

Police Attacked

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 19 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] A grenade was thrown at a police vehicles yesterday when a crowd tried to stop the arrest of a man at the Manedi beerhall in Seki Township.

A spokesman said the police were called at about 5.30 p. m. to the Manedi beerhall where a man was said to have torn a T-shirt off a PF supporter. On trying to arrest the man the police were deterred by a crowd.

The man was later arrested and put in one of the police vehicles when a standby riot police unit was called to the scene. The crowd tried to rescue the man from the vehicle, resulting in the police having to use teargas.

A device, believed to be a grenade, was then thrown at the vehicle. The police spokesman said there were no injuries.

He appealed to the public not to try to deter the police from carrying out their legal duties.

Most families who had fled their homes in Red Cross township in Chitungwiza after a wave of political violence yesterday went back to their homes as relative calm returned to the area.

There were only a few women still squatting yesterday at the ZANU (PF) office in Zengeza where scores had taken refuge.

Officials at the office said that most people had complied with the request by three Cabinet Ministers who rushed there on Wednesday that they go home as measures were being taken to protect them.

The women at the office said they had gone back to their homes as requested, but left again after allegedly being threatened.

Party officials said the visit of the ministers had done a lot to calm emotions which had been building since the fighting.

The ministers were Mr Eddison Zvobgo (Local Government and Housing), Dr Nathan Shamuyarira (Information and Tourism) and Mr Kumbirai Kangai (Labour and Social Services).

Rioters Sack Party Office

VIOLENCE broke out in Tshabalala, Bulawayo, yesterday over the enrolment of lodgers in the coming local government elections.

Police vehicles were stoned, police saved eight people being chased by an irate crowd, the Tshabalala ZANU (PF) office was ransacked, and a crowd invaded the suburb's municipal offices to tear up application forms.

Three people have been arrested and police expect to make more arrests.

Police were called to the scene at about 9.45 a.m. yesterday when a crowd of about 200 gathered at the Tshabalala shopping centre.

About 100 people, mostly women, stormed the municipal offices adjacent to the shopping centre and tore up forms used by lodgers applying for votes in the forthcoming elections.

Part of the crowd then moved on to the nearby ZANU (PF) offices where rioters smashed furniture. Eight people were chased by the crowd, three were assaulted and police vehicles were stoned.

Asked to comment, a police spokesman said the injured — two men and a woman — had "only superficial injuries".

One police vehicle was "very slightly damaged"

The unrest continued late into the evening as a crowd of about 200 PF supporters roamed the suburb.

Riot police armed with rifles and batons arrested several people, and one man wearing a ZANU (PF) T-shirt was caught by the crowd and had boiling water poured over him.

Mugabe Comments on Inter-Party Strife

POLITICAL education and awareness, coupled with restraint in the public statements of leaders, could prevent the wave of politically motivated violence in the country.

This is the feeling of the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, who commented in Parliament yesterday on inter-party strife.

The violence, he said, was politically motivated. That meant there was a political leadership behind it and that leadership ought to go to the people and calm them down.

"Let us guard against statements which promote division, which lead into acts of violence. Let us be calculating in what we say," Mr Mugabe said. "Let us observe peace, let us observe the law and give the necessary direction to the people who elected us."

He said neither side was guiltless. "Let's not dodge it. Both sides are guilty of some hypocrisy in this matter."

Appealing for unity and understanding, he advised that there were statements made which caused division and infuriated others, causing them to react.

Mr Mugabe was giving replies to the defence debate during which some Patriotic Front MPs complained about statements by some Ministers threatening to "crush" others.

He urged all leaders to avoid statements which created insecurity, and appealed to parties to meet at party political level, drink together, and treat each other as friends.

Although recognising their differences, Zimbabweans should cease to be hostile to one another. By giving political support by way of statements conducive to peace, leaders could encourage people in assembly points to work towards the same goals.

Pledging his commitment to work towards reconciliation, Mr Mugabe said political differences should not turn people into enemies. "There should not be any further violence. Why should we continue to kill each other?"

The Prime Minister said it was a tragedy that any more lives should be lost now that the war was over.

PF Official's Home Attacked

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 20 Se. 80 p 3

[Text] A SMALLARMS attack was launched on Thursday night on the home of a Patriotic Front official in the Pangani Mine, Filabusi, housing area.

A Filabusi police spokesman said yesterday that no one was injured in the attack launched at about 9 o'clock. The house was hit several times and a car parked outside was set alight.

The occupier, Mr Siphambaniso Dube, chairman of the PF's Pangani branch, said he was asleep when the firing started. "I heard the bullets hitting the house and coming through the window," he said.

"I rolled on to the floor, then jumped out of the window at the back and ran to the office.

"I could hear the bullets hitting the car. There was an explosion and the car caught fire," he said.

A Pangani mine policeman, Sergeant Major Johnson, said he saw two men near the ration store firing at the house. They fled from the mine after the brief attack.

Two mine constables found a 14-year-old girl, named Treasure, hiding in the house. They took her to the mine office and looked after her for the night.

The shooting was heard by the police in Filabusi, a couple of kilometres away and a reaction force of 11 immediately formed and set off for the mine.

The police spokesman said 39 cartridges were recovered.

The incident occurred a day after a vehicle carrying ZANU (PF) supporters was ambushed as they returned from a political meeting at Mahole, near Filabusi.

Mr John Mbedzi, a party official, claimed the ambush was launched by ZIPRA men from the nearby Operation Seed farm at Silalabuhwe.

Police said the ambushers had not been identified. Investigations were continuing.

PM PUTS BRAKE ON MILITARY PROMOTIONS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 19 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] Promotions in the army have been discontinued until a new Zimbabwe National Army has been formed, the Prime Minister and Minister of Defence, Mr Mugabe, told Parliament yesterday.

There are, therefore, no plans to appoint a successor to General Walls, who was dismissed as head of the Joint Military Command on Tuesday, until that exercise is completed.

Mr Mugabe is happy with the present arrangement whereby the four members of the Joint High Command--ZANLA commander Mr Rex Nhongo; the commander of ZIPRA, Mr Lookout Masuku; the army commander Lieut-General Sandy McLean; and the commander of the Air Force, Air Vice-Marshal Frank Mussell--are "working on the basis of equality".

In his reply to queries and issues raised during a debate on the defence vote, the Prime Minister said: "We would like promotions to take place only in the context of a single army.

"Until that exercise is complete, the arrangement whereby they (Joint High Command members) are working on the basis of equality should continue."

Since General Walls went on leave in June, pending retirement in December, there has been speculation that Mr Mugabe might invite a Commonwealth military man to head the army before a Zimbabwean is appointed later.

The Prime Minister touched on a wide range of defence issues yesterday. Defending the planned movement of guerillas from assembly points to Chitungwiza and Entumbane, he asked:

"Where do we want these sons of the soil to live--permanently in the bush like animals?"

Instrument

Mr Mugabe made the point strongly that guerillas were not to be excluded from urban areas while those they fought against in the war were accepted.

"We are not going to discriminate against them. They are the instrument that brought about Lancaster. The treatment we have given them so far is unfair."

The Prime Minister has asked the Joint High Command to present to him a "satisfactory plan" to ensure discipline will be enforced in the temporary accommodation to which guerillas are to be moved.

The long-term plan, he explained, was to house them in military barracks where their arms would be properly stored and released to them when necessary.

He criticised some elements of the police force, saying he had received "very disturbing reports from all over the country about the conduct of some members".

"The teargas-minded policeman has no room, in my mind, in our force," he warned, and referred disapprovingly to the incident on Independence night when police fired teargas in Rufaro Stadium.

Some members of the police had tarnished the name of the Minister of Home Affairs, Dr Joshua Nkomo, and his own by claiming they were performing unpopular acts on the instructions of the Minister and himself, Mr Mugabe said.

Ordered

Saying there were elements in the force which must transform, Mr Mugabe told cheering MPs that the police had been ordered to cease raiding shebeens and harassing hawkers. But he did acknowledge that police moves against them had been correct in law.

The Prime Minister spelt out the dual role for the Army as security and production and announced that a programme to integrate ZANLA and ZIPRA forces with the RAR was being worked out.

Because of initial problems of a lack of infrastructure, not more than nine battalions of ZIPRA and ZANLA would be integrated by the end of the year.

While accepting there had been problems caused by some guerillas in assembly points, Mr Mugabe felt only a minority "not anywhere near 1 000", compared to about 35 000 guerillas still in APs, had been involved.

He identified three causes of the incidents--provocation, boredom and indiscipline, and added: "I think rather than denigrate them, it is time we paid them compliments for their behaviour."

RF CONGRESS RESOLUTIONS REPORTED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] BRANCH members of the Rhodesian Front have come up with some hard-hitting resolutions for consideration at the party's national congress in Salisbury on September 27.

They attack the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, for "undermining existing and future medical services" with his "offensive behaviour and insulting language".

The congress will also be asked to deplore "the present state of lawlessness in Zimbabwe" while calling on the Government to enforce law and order "without fear or favour".

The nine resolutions to be discussed are that the congress:

● Deplores the present state of lawlessness and calls on the Government to enforce law and order without fear or favour.

● Is deeply concerned at the attitude of the Minister of Health which is undermining the existing and future medical services.

"His offensive behaviour and insulting language is threatening the high standards of the health service in this country."

● Deplores the flood of anti-white, anti-Western, pro-communist propaganda disseminated through the national broadcasting media which has done more to destroy good race relations established in this country than any other single factor.

● Is concerned that the high standard of services provided by the Government and statutory bodies in this country is being eroded by the Government policy of considering party before merit in the appointment of staff.

● Requests the Government to make real and positive steps to save the agricultural industry from collapse.

● Asks that the Government agree to retain the Agric-Alert system by the farming community until such time as the security situation renders it unnecessary.

"Thereafter, negotiations with the PTC should take place to integrate Agric-Alert with their present services, thus assisting the Government with its declared intention of improving communications throughout the country."

● While fully supporting the principle of reconciliation in the development of the country, does not accept that it implies that white Zimbabweans must meekly accept the denigration of his achievements and past. On the contrary, reconciliation implies the acceptance of the white man and his past.

● Appoints a national committee with powers to co-opt to determine the party's future policy and strategy.

● Seeks an assurance from its elected representatives that they will continue, in all aspects, to abide by the spirit and letter of the party's principles and policies.

RF's chairman Mr Geoff Kluckow said in Salisbury yesterday: "The resolutions should produce a lively congress at the Italian Club and we hope to see a good attendance of members."

EEC 'LOME' ADMISSION TERMS 'DISAPPOINTING'

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] THE terms of the European Community offer to Zimbabwe on its entry into the Lome Convention were described by British officials last night as "disappointing".

Details of the trade and aid deal between the Community and Zimbabwe were finally wrapped up by EEC Foreign Ministers meeting in Brussels.

But afterwards, the Minister of State in the British Foreign Office, Sir Ian Gilmour, referred to the offers — on beef, sugar and tobacco — as "a bit disappointing".

The proposed terms, which will form the basis of negotiations starting next month, are:

- An annual export quota of 8 100 tonnes of beef, tariff free;
- A sugar quota of 12 000 tonnes;
- And an unspecified limit on tobacco exports to the community.

The Foreign Ministers also agreed to make £65 million in financial aid available over four years.

Opposition from some EEC members, particularly France, led to the disappointing sugar quota.

A minimum of 12 000 tonnes has been fixed, but this may only rise to 25 000 tonnes, if there is a shortfall from other Lome Convention countries.

Because of the current animal health restrictions in Zimbabwe the beef exports may not start for about another two years — and the current Lome Convention expires in just four years' time.

No guarantees have been given for the future on the beef question--and if the weak market situation in the European Community continues there is certain to be opposition when this is raised again.

After persistent Italian opposition the nine Foreign Ministers agreed to limit tobacco imports to 80 percent of present levels.

If imports into the EEC go beyond this the Italians want safeguards for their producers.

Speaking after the daylong meeting, which was largely devoted to the Zimbabwean offer, Sir Ian Gilmour said that although many statements were made on the strategic importance of Zimbabwe these were not translated into action.

"It is essential for Zimbabwe to join Lome," Sir Ian said.

LOME CONVENTION TERMS CAUSE CONFUSION

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 3

[Text]

CONFUSION surrounds the details of Zimbabwe's accession to the Lome Convention and even the Government delegation to the Brussels talks, which has just returned to Salisbury is not certain of the latest position.

Headed by the Minister of Commerce and Industry, Mr David Smith, the delegation is waiting for official details from Brussels, amid a welter of reports giving different terms for the export of the country's beef, tobacco and sugar to the European Common Market.

A spokesman said yesterday that the negotiating team would probably have to return to Brussels at the weekend to sort out the proposals.

Reports have given varying figures for sugar exports ranging from 12 000 tonnes to 25 000 tonnes a year.

Similar differences have been given for the acceptance of the country's beef and tobacco.

Officials of the industries concerned are declining to comment until they know the exact terms. The Zimbabwe Sugar Association said it had been given conflicting reports.

European Common Market foreign ministers in Brussels yesterday agreed on trade and aid terms to offer Zimbabwe, diplomatic sources said.

The conditions will be negotiated between the two sides as terms for Zimbabwe's planned accession to the Lome Convention, reports Iana-Reuter

An aid package totalling U.S.$110 million for the four years the accord has to run was agreed, but was considerably less than what Zimbabwe sought, the sources said.

The accord between the EEC nine was delayed for several hours as Ministers wrangled over how much beef and sugar Zimbabwe would be allowed to send, and terms for its tobacco.

The Ministers agreed on a figure of 20 000-25 000 tonnes of sugar a year, the sources said.

On beef they set a figure of 8 100 tonnes to be reviewed after two years. Tobacco can come in from Zimbabwe without restriction under the convention rules. But at Italian insistence the EEC will seek a safeguard clause allowing it to take measures to protect its own production.

ADMISSION OF QC BLOM-COOPER MAY DELAY TEKERE HEARING

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] LAWYERS representing Cabinet Minister Mr Edgar Tekere, who is facing a murder charge, have posted notice that a British Queen's Counsel, Mr Louis Blom-Cooper, will seek admission to the High Court in Salisbury.

The notice, which appears on the Registrar's board at the High Court, says the application for admission will be made on October 15.

Mr S. M. Taylor, an attorney of Gill, Godlonton and Gerrans, the firm which posted the notice, said last night that it had not yet been decided if Mr Blom-Cooper would be instructed in the Minister's case, which is due to start on Monday.

"If it is decided to instruct him he would not be eligible to appear in the court until October 15 because in terms of the Advocates' Admission Act 30 days' notice of an application for admission must be given.

Mr Taylor said that in the event that Mr Blom-Cooper was instructed an adjournment would have to be sought.

Our London Bureau reports that Mr Blom-Cooper once described himself as "an excessive individualist and radical".

He has been refused a passport to South Africa, ordered out of Tanzania, and was persona non grata with Mr Ian Smith in the days of UDI. He has campaigned against capital punishment, intervened on the part of Pakistan's former leader Zulfikar Bhutto, and been in conflict with the Soviet Union authorities over his attempts to attend the trials of Russian dissidents.

Apart from this, his harassment of certain otherwise complacently accepted trial processes in Britain is as least as durable and impressive as his 28-year-old legal career.

MEMBERS OF ASSEMBLY PRAISE MUGABE

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 2

[Text] Black and white MPs united in the House of Assembly yesterday in praising Prime Minister Mr Mugabe for his diligence and success in handling Zimbabwe's problems. Congratulations poured in from all sides of the House during committee of supply consideration of the $6 455 000 Cabinet Office vote.

Wing Commander Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) said: "As one of the more outspoken critics of the ZANU (PF) and Government, I feel it would be more than churlish of me if I did not extend my thanks and congratualations on the manner in which he has come into office and deported himself since becoming Prime Minister of Zimbabwe."

Wing Commander Gaunt recalled a song from the musical My Fair Lady which asks "Why can't a woman be more like a man?" he asked: "Why can't the Prime Minister's Cabinet Ministers be more like him?"

There was a hearty round of applause when Mr Andre Holland (RF, Mazoe/Mtoko) said he believed that behind every successful man there was a successful woman, and paid his respects to Mr. Mugabe's wife, Sally.

Mr Holland commented on the Prime Minister's "dignity and charm", which he said had won the country many friends all over the world.

Mr Dennis Divaris (RF, Kopje) said he knew the Prime Minister worked nearly 24 hours a day and added: "We on this side of the House will strive our best to try and make his term of office a success and ensure that he never has cause to complain that we on this side are trying to intimidate him or force him to do things he does not wish to."

"Giving honour where honour is due," Mr Henry Elsworth (RF, Midlands), said Mr Mugabe had surprised the world, and certainly the people of Zimbabwe, with his reasonableness, the command with which he had taken office, and the confidence with which he carried out his duties.

Mr Paddy Shields (RF, Bulawayo Central) said Mr Mugabe had given confidence where it was most needed, to the man in the street.

Mr Richard Cartwright (RF, Hatfield) offered his support and that of his constituents for Mr Mugabe's efforts to maintain peace and prosperity in the country.

Miss Jane Ngwenya (PF, Matebeland North) thanked the Prime Minister for the "very high respect" he had shown the women of Zimbabwe by appointing them to high office in Government.

The Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs, Dr Witness Mangwende (ZANU-PF, Mashonaland East), told MPs to "practice what you preach". He said: "I hope that we will all strive, and strive hard indeed, to help the Prime Minister to achieve the objectives which he has set for this country."

The policy of reconciliation was a miracle. Dr Mangwende asked: "If this is not a miracle to some of you who have always regarded the other party as manhunters, if this is not a miracle, then what is?

"We have commun unity in agreeing that the Prime Minister is doing a wonderful job. We must transcend our agreement in practising what we have agreed on."

Many of the speakers contratulated Mr Mugabe on the economy of the vote for the Cabinet Office, up only $800 from $6 454 200 last year.

Miss Naomi Nhiwatiwa (ZANU-PF, Manicaland) praised the Prime Minister for the way in which he had transformed the country from one "torn by barbaric war and racial hatred" into one of peace.

She compared the atmosphere which he had created in Parliament today to the transfiguration of Christ on the mountain.

"Today we have spoken the same language as our comrades on the other side of the House," she said.

For the first time she saw the opposition as follow Zimbabwean citizens and not as the Rhodesian Front, she said. Miss Nhiwatiwa said she hoped this spirit would continue.

Miss Nhiwatiwa also congratulated Mr Mugabe for the way in which he had promoted women to play an important role in Government affairs; she said Zimbabwe stood out as an outstanding country for this reason.

Mr Albert Taderera (ZANU-PF, Victoria) said he found it "staggering" that a man who had been described by the propaganda machinery as a dictator and a marxist should have managed to "diffuse and defeat lies by truth".

Mr Mugabe thanked all the speakers who had "showered compliments and words of praise" for the role he had played in trying to unite people on the path of reconciliation.

On behalf of his wife, Mrs Sally Mugabe, he thanked MPs who had praised her for her supporting role.

The Prime Minister also thanked members on both sides of the House for their "constructive criticism and for the constructive way in which they had presented genuine grievances".

He urged all people to work together for reconciliation and peace in Zimbabwe.

Mr Mugabe said the Cabinet vote had not been increased "even though we feel we need to do so" because there were other areas of priority.

He assured Mr Andre Holland that any money spent under the $5.1 million Special Services vote (for Zimbabwe's "hush-hush activities") would be well used and the amount audited.

"Government must be satisfied that the funds are well-spent," said Mr Mugabe.

ASSEMBLY PRAISES, RAPS MUGABE, SENATE HITS HEALTH MINISTER

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 5

[From the House of Assembly, Senate reports]

[Text] THE Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe, was praised and criticised in turn by Rhodesian Front MPs for his decision to move former guerillas from assembly points to Chitungwiza, when the $233,2m. defence vote came before the House.

Mr Andre Holland (RF, Mazoe - Mtoko) congratulated Mr Mugabe for "doing something positive about the assembly points". But he wanted assurances that the move would be "orderly and conducted in the finest traditions of the armed forces".

But Wing Commander Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) said he was "absolutely terrified and horrified" at the decision.

"I view with absolute horror the move of 17 000 armed troops of whatever denomination or faction to a densely, highly populated area such as Chitungwiza," he said. "If this move takes place and unless the strictest discipline is enforced the lifestyle of civilians in the surrounding areas will be absolute hell."

Wing Commander Gaunt said he believed the security situation in Zimbabwe was as bad as it had ever been.

"The life of the individual has not been eased to any marked degree, if at all," he said to cries of "nonsense".

Wing Commander Gaunt said there had been grenade attacks, use of weapons and policemen beaten up. In some cases murders had been committed and the perpetrators had gone into the assembly points "where the police dare not go".

Wing Commander Gaunt said he believed the stage had been reached when "absolute and positive action" must be taken by the Government and leaders of the security forces to control the various armies.

He said he believed it was "highly regrettable" that Mr Mugabe had not taken the opportunity to back the forces of law and order during his visit last weekend to the troubled assembly point X-Ray at Mtoko.

"I believe we are in very grave danger of the Government and the people of this country dividing and the consequences are too dreadful for law-abiding citizens to contemplate," he told MPs.

On the integration of the armed forces within the regular army, Wing Commander Gaunt asked the Prime Minister what progress had been made so far and whether the Government's target of December 1980 for completion of this was likely to be met. If not he asked what the alternative timetable was likely to be.

Earlier Mr Holland said the biggest problems facing the country were the assimilation of the three separate armies and the existence of the assembly points. He said it frightened people and scared off investors.

Mr Holland said he did not agree with those who said the move of former guerillas to Chitungwiza would result in "chaos and the complete breakdown of society". He thought the move was right and he supported it.

He said the present "clumsy arrangement" had been partly caused by the British who had "typically got out and left the rough stuff to us". Another factor had been the death of the former ZANLA commander Josiah Tongogara.

Mr Holland said he represented farmers who had sunk everything into this country and were determined not to leave now. He hoped that by this time next year there would be a united army.

"This is undoubtedly one of the most stabilising influences we have," he told MPs.

Several black MPs spoke on the plight of guerillas cooped up in overcrowded assembly points for months on end, and asked the Prime Minister what plans had been made for the early removal of these men.

Mr Stephen Nkomo (PF, Matabeleland South) also asked what moves had been taken to help guerillas demobilised from the camps, but left with no employment or educational openings and little money.

He said some of the former guerillas had been promised jobs or education, but had been compulsorily demobilised with neither.

Dr Swithun Mombeshora (ZANU-PF, Mashonaland West) stressed the need for a strong national army to counter any threat of invasion by South Africa.

"South Africa has stated very clearly that if and when it considers there is any breakdown of law and order it will move in," he told the House.

Mr James Bassoppo-Moyo (ZANU-PF, Victoria) agreed that Zimbabwe was threatened by the possibility of a military invasion from South Africa, and urged the Prime Minister to build a big military airfield at Fort Victoria as a defence against this.

He also called for promotions for blacks in the army, a question also raised by Mr Nelson Mawema (ZANU-PF, Victoria) who suggested former guerilla commanders be given formal military status. He suggested both commander Rex Nhongo and commander Lookout Musika be made lieutenant-generals.

On a motion by the Minister of Transport, Mr Ernest Kadungure, the Committee of Supply reported progress before Mr Mugabe replied to the questions raised. The House adjourned until today.

Gaunt Expresses Fear

WING COMMANDER Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) who was last week described as a "baby elephant" by the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, was yesterday called a monkey by ZANU (PF) whip Mr Nelson Mawema, in the House.

"I have been called an elephant and now a monkey — I wish they would make up their minds," Wing Commander Gaunt protested angrily to the chairman.

Wing Commander Gaunt had said he was "absolutely terrified and horrified" by the prospect of 17 000 former guerillas being moved into Chitungwiza and Mr Mawema had interjected: "Get out then, you monkey".

Wing Commander Gaunt asked that Mr Mawema should be ordered to withdraw the remark, but Mr Mawema claimed that he had said: "Sit down, you man from Wankie".

ZANU (PF) members laughed and applauded.

When Wing Commander Gaunt retorted: "Not only are we dealing with ignoramusses, we are dealing with liars as well", he was ordered to withdraw his words.

Wing Commander Gaunt was involved in an earlier clash with Mr Mawema when the House began debating the $233.2 million vote for the defence portfolio, held by the Prime Minister, Mr Mugabe.

Wing Commander Gaunt expressed grave fears of the consequences of divisions being deepened between Zimbabwe's people by current security problems and Mr Mawema interjected: "Do you want to engineer an uprising".

Looking in the direction of Mr Mugabe, Wing Commander Gaunt protested: "To engineer an uprising." "That is the sort of stupid, ignorant ridiculous remark that causes more trouble than anything else".

Bleak View of Farming Prospects

A BLEAK picture of Zimbabwe's agricultural prospects was painted by several white MPs in the House. A private Member's motion, proposed by Mr Esmond Micklem (RF, Northern), and seconded by Mr Henry Elsworth (RF, Midlands), called on the Government to take urgent steps to halt "further deterioration" in the agricultural industry.

The motion also appealed to the Government to give "definite undertakings to the industry which will ensure that this country will be able to meet its own food requirements", and asked for more generous terms for farmers in compensation and sales tax.

Mr Micklem told the House that clear "danger signals" were evident when looking on Zimbabwe's future as a producer of wheat and beef.

Hampered by "ponderous methods of price negotiation", farmers and ranchers had cut back on output and entered serious and rising levels of debt.

Wheat farmers, said Mr Micklem, had seen no real increase in prices for their product since 1965, and the beef industry was at "a very, very critical stage" because of the unprecedented slaughter of breeding stock.

He said the importance of wheat production was illustrated by rapidly rising consumption — more than 10 percent a year — and he implored the Government to ensure Zimbabwe maintained the status of an exporter of this food.

The beef exporting industry, he said, was also seriously threatened. And he expected that even local consumers would face a critical shortage by the end of the year.

Seconding the motion, Mr Elsworth said the agricultural industry in general was in trouble in this country.

He told the House the beef industry had reached a "crisis point" with the breeding herd shrinking by about 25 percent in a few years to only 780 000, and with the likelihood that two of the country's cold storage works would have to be closed.

With more people with more money to spend, the demand for beef was likely to rise rapidly "but this beef is just not there", he said, predicting a "massive shortage" by next year, and a possible "general collapse of this once-great industry".

Mr Elsworth said it would take the country about seven years to reach capacity production of beef again, and suggested that one of the problems confronting the industry was that ranchers received only 50 percent of the retail value of their stock, while butchers, who sometimes handled carcasses for only a few days, got 40 percent.

The cost of maize for use as cattle feed was prohibitive, he added, and suggested struggling farmers be awarded compensation to keep them on the land, and relief from some forms of sales tax.

Mr Des Butler (RF, Eastern) called on the Government to give "urgent consideration" to the food problem.

Mr Andre Holland (RF, Mazoe/Mtoko) suggested Government get together with farmers' unions to discuss an all-hazards insurance policy to cover farmers.

Wing Commander Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) said it was absolutely essential for the Government, to make a clear statement on its compensation policy.

Salisbury Hospital Nurses Praised for "Excellent Work"

RECENT remarks made by the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, at the Andrew Fleming Hospital were sharply criticised in the Senate when the debate on a take-note motion on health policy was resumed.

Senator Ken Fleming said the charges made against the nurses were totally unjustified. The nurses were second to none and now there was a danger the country might lose the services of some of them.

He, congratulated the Minister on introducing a free health service for the lower income group, but warned that he would have difficulty in providing for the more remote areas. He hoped the Minister was making provision for adequate finance.

Large numbers of workers would be required for the clinics and rural hospitals. Basic training could also be given to women in a kraal area to deal with simple illnesses and administer first aid.

Senator Fleming welcomed the Minister's intention to bring the nganga and other traditional healers into the country's health structure.

He believed their knowledge and usefulness would be greatly increased if they could be given instruction in Western medicine and tropical diseases. The formation of the Zimbabwe Traditional Healers' Association was a step in the right direction.

He urged that the present educational standards for entry to the medical school should be maintained and nothing done to lower the quality of future doctors and nurses.

Senator Fleming protested against the Minister's threat to forbid the building of private hospitals, which he regarded as interference with individual rights. No Government money would be involved and the health services would benefit by the provision of more private hospitals and nursing homes.

Senator Lou Ankers also protested about the Minister's speech to the nurses on September 12 and described the Minister's remarks as "slanderous". He went on to praise the nurses for their work.

He told the House he understood the Minister's criticism arose because two friends of his who had been injured in a car accident in Mozambique were brought into the Andrew Fleming Hospital.

After being treated in the casualty department they were moved to a regular ward. They had regarded the accommodation as inferior and had complained to the Minister.

In spite of his criticisms, he wished the Minister well in his difficult task, urging him to avoid making provocative remarks which could only arouse antagonism.

Senator Chief Musikavanhu congratulated Dr Ushewokunze on the progress he had achieved in introducing free health services and said this would go far to win the trust and confidence of the people, especially the poor and the displaced.

Chief Musikavanhu felt that Dr Ushewokunze's plans for health at "village level" were realistic objectives.

Chief Musikavanhu asked the Minister to explain how those earning more than $120 a month would be charged for health care, and how they would be identified by the staff dispensing the services.

Senator Blasts Ushewokunze

BLACK Senators reacted with outrage when Senator Michael Oatt claimed the Minister of Health, Dr Herbert Ushewokunze, had a past conviction for receiving stolen property and had been struck off the medical rolls.

Senator John Shoniwa, actin leader of the Upper House, protested: "That has nothing to do with the debate," and another black Senator shouted: "That is outrageous."

Senator Oatt, a high-ranking police officer until the beginning of this year, made the allegations and then asked: "Is it for these reasons that he (Dr Ushewokunze) is carrying out a witch-hunt?

"Are these actions part of a personal vendetta against the profession that trained him?"

Senator Shoniwa interjected: "He doesn't like racialists, that is all."

Senator Oatt claimed that Dr Ushewokunze had behaved "like a rogue elephant" in his tours of Ingutshene Mental Hospital, Gwelo Hospital and Salisbury's Andrew Fleming Hospital.

"He seemed preoccupied with theft in Gwelo," claimed Senator Oatt. "I wonder whether it is because the Minister himself stands convicted of receiving stolen property . . ." The rest of the Senator's remarks were drowned by angry interjections.

"Is it because he was once struck off the rolls?" Senator Oatt alleged.

Senator Oatt said that if Dr Ushewokunze persisted in undermining the health services, precious skilled men would quit the country.

Senator Shoniwa commented angrily: "For every blackmailer who leaves this country I can bring you five good people from the U.K."

Senator Oatt claimed that Dr Ushewokunze's actions "indicate a lack of discipline in the ruling party", and he appealed for him to "mend his evil ways".

TEKERE'S LAWYERS WIN POSTPONEMENT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 23 Sep 80 pp 1, 2

[Text]

THE TRIAL of Mr Edgar Tekere was postponed until November 3 when the High Court, Salisbury, was told yesterday the defence had run into difficulties in preparing its case.

A court packed with spectators and journalists heard that defence counsel Advocate Chris Mercer had withdrawn from the case and that the defence legal team had financial problems.

Mr Justice Pittman was told an application for him to recuse himself would be made, but that it would not be on a personal basis. The judge raised a point of etiquette, saying it was unusual for the court to be given notice of a recusal application through "the daily Press".

He agreed to the application being submitted to him in writing on or before October 20, and if it involved all the judges in the country he would discuss it with "others of my brethren".

The judge warned the accused that no further applications for postponement would be granted unless some "entirely novel crisis" arose.

Throughout the hearing, which lasted about 90 minutes with a short adjournment. Cabinet Minister Mr Tekere, who is charged with the murder of Mr Gerald Adams, and with attempted murder, sat impassively in the front bench of the public gallery.

Beside him were his seven bodyguards who face similar charges.

Advocate Nick McNally, brought into the case only hours before the start of the hearing because of the withdrawal of Mr Mercer, began the proceedings.

Mr McNally said: "My instructions in this matter are to apply for a postponement. I have no further instructions in the matter."

Addressing Mr Justice Pittman, who sat without assessors, he said: "I understand you have been given some notice of this application and I apologise for the inconvenience that will be caused if the application is granted.

Difficulties

"The position is that the defence has had difficulties in preparing its case. Counsel has withdrawn from the case and I have been involved only since this morning.

"There have been financial problems. English counsel is not available at the moment and will not be available until the end of October."

Asked by the judge to suggest a date for the trial, Mr McNally said: "November 3, and that continuation of bail be extended until that date as they stand at present.

"There is one other matter merely by way of giving notice, partly because there has been mention of this matter in the Press. My instructions are that although the defence will be ready to proceed with the trial on November 3 there will be as advised on that date an application for recusal of your Lordship.

"I am not instructed in any detail in the matter of this application. I am merely stating it at this moment to give notice.

"It is an application which does not concern you personally. You may have seen speculation in the Press that a foreign judge be appointed to hear the matter as is possible in terms of the Constitution.

"I merely give notice of the application in this case and I am not aware of the full background to it.

The Director of Public Prosecutions, Advocate C. J. Glaum, said: "The State is ready to go to trial but I would have liked the matter to commence at the earliest possible date. In the interests of arriving at a definite date I would be prepared to agree to November 3.

"One matter that does cause me concern is the possible application for recusal. As a result of this postponement I will have one important witness on a year's study course in Britain and I will have an important witness in South Africa who will have to be brought back with the agreement of his new employer.

"You can appreciate the inconvenience to him and his employer, to bring him back here only to find that no trial takes place because of a recusal.

"You are also aware that I have more than 40 witnesses on my list whom I wish to call and all of those would have to be recalled.

"I would ask for any application for a recusal to be made before November 3 so that one can be sure that the trial will be held on that date.

"If there are any of the accused, who because of their financial standing, are unable to brief counsel, the Attorney General is in a position under the Legal Subsistence and Representation Act to issue a certificate which affords legal aid to the accused, if they make out a case that they are not in a position to brief counsel.

"There is also the procedure whereby the judge himself can grant legal aid."

Asked by the judge what date he would suggest for the recusal application, Mr Glaum said: "I would prefer a fortnight. You appreciate that it would only be your lordship to recuse himself and I gather this may be something of a general nature.

"I am assured by Mr McNally that it is not a personal qualification, and that would suggest to me that any local judge would be unacceptable to the defence."

[passage indistinct]

Mr Justice Pittman: "I must also point out that it is not only the persons in this case who will be inconvenienced.

"There are all the other accused persons whose trials have been put back. These are cases which are going to be dislocated if the postponement is granted.

"I think it may be of use to the accused to be told that they are not only causing inconvenience to the court staff and all the persons involved in this case, but also that they are causing unfair treatment to other accused persons whose trials have been set down.

"The application for recusal would have to be made on October 20."

Mr McNally: "There is a difficulty. I am instructed that the accused very much wish counsel of their choice to make that application for recusal and that counsel, despite the fact that an application for his admission has been made for October 15, will be in the West Indies on that date.

DIFFICULTY

"In the circumstances we would have to ask that the recusal hearing be on November 3 and that the trial be a fortnight after that. The difficulty is that the counsel of the accuseds' choice will simply not be able to be here."

Mr Justice Pittman: "I appreciate the unusual circumstances of this trial have made the observance of ordinary etiquette and behaviour if counsel difficult to observe.

"But it is worth noting that when a recusal is asked for it is normal to approach the judge in private and to give him a clear statement of the grounds of the application which is to be made.

"The judge can then, without embarrassment to anyone, including the structure of the judiciary, consider the merits of the application and he would normally only persist with the appointment, to preside over the trial if he felt there was no substance whatsoever in the application.

"It is unusual, to say the least, for the court to be given notice of this through the daily Press instead of in a confidential manner as I have mentioned."

Mr McNally: "I can only say that I have given notice as far as I am concerned in public this morning on the clear position that it is not a personal matter."

RELEVANCE

Mr Justice Pittman: "I am not apportioning any blame in this matter. I hope that something like this will be followed by the persons making such an application.

"That has relevance because even if counsel whom the accused wish to represent them is not available on November 3 there is nothing to prevent him from drafting grounds of recusal and submitting them to the court.

"Only if the court decides that they are unjustified and the application is refused because they do not appear to have any substance then the court would say, 'No, I will wait for you to make the application in court'.

"If the grounds of the application are forwarded to me something like a fortnight before November 3 then the difficulties you have mentioned about other witnesses could perhaps be cut. Would you like to consider that?

SUBMITTED

"I am suggesting that there be an order that any application for recusal be submitted in writing to me and that the matter be dealt with privately by normal etiquette.

"I am only asking now that the application for recusal be submitted in writing on or before October 20 and that the trial be set for November 3, and that I am working on the basis that it is not a personal ground for recusal. If it is a personal ground it is a different matter.

"If there is no personal ground for recusal but a general one involving the entire judiciary structure then the grounds for such an application for recusal be submitted in writing. And if I consider that the application has substance I may find it necessary to ask the Attorney-General to give his views on the matter, but that can be done in writing too.

"If the application for recusal is successful and if based on the idea that there should be a wholesale recusal of all the judges in the country then it will become clear that I will be sitting on behalf of the judiciary as a whole and that the case will not proceed on November 3. However, I am merely giving you random thoughts on the matter.

"I would now like to take instructions on the matter and discuss with the Attorney General to find some way of fixing a trial date . . ."

After an adjournment Mr McNally said he wished to make a point in explanation in relation to publicity concerning the recusal application.

"My instructions are that the Press approached a member of the defence team on having heard a rumour that such an application was to be made and was advised that it was one of the matters being considered. It arose as only a matter of speculation on the part of the Press.

"The defence is ready to accept the suggestion made by the court that an application for recusal be made in writing on or before October 20."

Mr Justice Pittman: "The written grounds of the application must be given on October 20. I will then consider these grounds and if they are personal to me I shall indicate that . . .

DISCUSS

"If they are on general grounds, then if I think there is a prima facie substance in the application I will put it to Mr Glaum for any reply which he may wish to make and I will in a representative capacity discuss it with others of my brethren.

"If we come to the conclusion together that the application be granted — and I have no indication from Mr Glaum that he wishes to argue the matter — we will come to a decision and no doubt Mr Glaum will make arrangements for the trial on November 3.

"But if I say no, then of course the matter will simply be argued at the start of the trial. We will be faced with the possibility that the application will then be granted as I may be impressed by the verbal argument more than I was with the written argument.

"Is it now agreed that the matter be postponed to November 3 and if any application for recuse is to be made notification is to be given on or before October 20 in writing with the grounds to be set out in writing. Now is there any need for further notice of trial to be granted?

"If you consider it necessary you will give formal notice of trial for November 3.

"I must say that concessions have been made to the accused and I think it would be right to say that unless some entirely novel crisis has arisen an application for a further postponement is not likely to be successful on that date.

"The trial is to be postponed until November 3, bail conditions to stand until that day.

"If there is any application for the recusal of myself as the presiding judge — I do not think this refers to the assessors in any way — then the grounds for the application which is to be made on November 3, unless it is accepted beforehand, will be filed on or before October 20."

After the hearing was adjourned Mr Tekere's lawyers held a Press conference at which they spoke about their proposal to have Mr Justice Pittman recuse himself from the case.

The lawyers also showed the journalists a letter which they said had been received yesterday morning threatening Mr Tekere with death.

The lawyers said they had not yet had a chance to submit the letter to the police.

OFFICIALS SEEK TO EASE TENSION IN CHITUNGWIZA

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Text] By Gilbert Mawarire

THREE Cabinet Ministers yesterday visited Chitungwiza in a bid to ease tension following continued violence in the area.

The three Ministers—Mr Eddison Zvobgo (Local Government and Housing), Dr Nathan Shamuyarira (Information and Tourism), and Mr Kumbirai Kangai (Labour and Social Services)—rushed to Chitungwiza from Parliament after receiving a report of more violence.

Earlier in the day, police used tear gas on a crowd who staged an impromptu meeting.

A senior police officer at St Mary's Police Station told the Ministers the crowd demanded to be addressed by a ZANU (PF) official from 88 Manica Road and also wanted to send a delegation to the Prime Minister's Office to seek peace guarantees.

ZANU (PF) officials complained to the Ministers that the police action was unnecessary as the crowd was orderly.

The Ministers found scores of men, women and children squatting with their belongings outside a party office after fleeing their homes in Red Cross Township two nights ago after being harassed and having their homes stoned or fired at.

would have themselves to blame if they were shot by "people detailing" the ZANU (PF) office.

Armed police were yesterday guarding the office and patrolling surrounding areas.

Two people have died and scores injured in the fighting which has continued since Thursday last week.

The police told the Ministers that a number of arrests had been made and that investigations were continuing.

A school had been closed after two men who were being chased by about 20 people ran there to seek refuge, the police said.

The police told the Ministers that reinforcements had been called for from every station in the Salisbury South district.

"There has been a snow-balling effect with one incident triggering off another and if police were to leave the area, there would be hell."

Addressing the refugees, Mr Kangai asked them to go back to their homes as action was being taken to protect them.

"If there is any more trouble — we are from the bush — we will come and sleep here," Mr Kangai said.

Mr Zvobgo said: "This is a terrible situation. We cannot allow a situation where people are afraid to live in their own houses. We will make sure that law and order is maintained."

The Ministers reacted angrily when a police officer told them that they

About 80 police who were sent to quell one incident over the weekend had to leave the scene as they were badly outnumbered by the warring factions, the police told them.

● Several police vehicles were damaged and a man slightly injured when a crowd of about 100 people, gathered at a meeting in Zengeza 4, threw stones at the police yesterday morning, a police spokesman said last night. The crowd dispersed after the police used teargas, the spokesman said in a statement.

The injured man was Mr Martin MacDonald, employed by the ESC.

"Despite requests by the police to disperse quietly the crowd refused to do so and in fact grew up to a strength of about 400 people. The police then used teargas to disperse the crowd, which only dispersed at about 1.20 p.m.," the spokesman said.

ZVOBGO PLEDGES TO UTILIZE FORMER DCS

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] ALTHOUGH there would soon be no personnel left with the title District Commissioner, those who had held these posts would not be made redundant, but would be absorbed in the new consolidated Ministry of Local Government and Housing, Mr Eddison Zvobgo told the Senate.

Speaking at the end of a take-note debate on his Ministry's policies, Mr Zvobgo said former DCs had no need to panic as he was determined to ensure that all who wished to contribute to the nation's development would have the opportunity to do so. They would be absorbed as assistant secretaries in the Ministry.

Mr Zvobgo advised Senator chiefs that the September 15 deadline by which all chiefs were supposed to move back to their home areas was "flexible" but it made no sense for chiefs, who were receiving Government allowances, to be allowed to reside indefinitely in urban areas.

Mr Zvobgo hoped that as the threat from dissidents was removed, there would be no need for chiefs to employ messengers to safeguard their lives. It was not possible for his Ministry to continue to provide militia guards to chiefs.

The Minister said that although chiefs' messengers were paid only $16 to $18 a month, the personal bodyguards ZANU (PF) Ministers had with them received no pay at all.

He told Senator Chief Ndiweni: "They are doing better than those guarding the Prime Minister and Cabinet Ministers, because they do not earn a penny."

Mr Zvobgo said he wished it to be fully understood that Ministers' guards who had been employed ever since the Government came to power had not received a cent of the taxpayers' money.

NATION HAS OWN UNIQUE CULTURE, SAYS PRESIDENT

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 7

[Text] THERE was no need for the amalgamation of foreign and traditional cultures in Zimbabwe as the country had its own culture which was unique and authentic, President Banana said on Monday.

Speaking in a wide-ranging interview with the ZTV the President said that if the cultures were integrated there was the danger that Zimbabwe would have an adulterated culture.

"I think the emphasis must be on evolving a Zimbabwean culture that is adequate in itself," he said. "I have spoken on other occasions about the need for mental decolonisation and you cannot get that if you are going to indulge in the amalgamation of cultures."

This would create Zimbabweans with capitalist mentalities. This was what the blacks had been fighting against all these years, he said.

The President said he was satisfied the broad masses in Zimbabwe were now enjoying genuine political rights because the ZANU (PF) party in power had the support of the majority of the people.

"I have every confidence that this situation of democratic principles and democratic rights will be exercised and the situation will be maintained for all time."

Looking back at the five months in which he had been Head of State, the President said it felt like five years, considering the remarkable progress and achievements that the present Government had realised during its short span of existence.

Instead of creating a replica of the old order the Government wanted to bring about a situation in Zimbabwe where there was a united nation. The intention was to have people referred to purely as Zimbabweans, not as blacks, whites, Asians or Coloureds.

CAPABLE

Zimbabwe was fortunate to have a Government that was highly capable, he said.

Talking of his office, the President said he had enjoyed sharing with Government Ministers, the Prime Minister and the broad masses of Zimbabwe, in the activities of the country.

"I feel I cannot live in a cocoon," he added. "I have to participate, I have to take a full part in the administration of this country."

An effort was being made, he said, to bring in African character to Government House. Already sadza was on the menu there and people in traditional dress were being entertained. People from all walks of life had to be catered for.

OFFICIAL ACCUSES 'HERALD' OF PUBLISHING LIES

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 17 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] THE Deputy Finance Minister, Dr Oliver Munyaradzi, accused the Herald of publishing "blatant untruths".

"This is not going to be allowed to continue," Dr Munyaradzi, a member of ZANU (PF), warned during an adjournment debate. He said the newspaper was helping to destroy the Government's policy of reconciliation.

His view was contested by Mrs Ruth Chinamano (PF), who said there would be no peace in the country unless the Press was allowed to operate without intimidation.

RECONCILIATION

"There is no doubt that the Herald has been consistently trying to stir up trouble," the Deputy Minister said. If the spirit of reconciliation was being destroyed the blame "should go to the Herald".

There was laughter from black and white MPs when Wing Commander Rob Gaunt (RF, Highlands) interjected "... and the rest to the ZBC".

The Herald consistently went out of its way to create problems Dr Munyaradzi said. With a reference to Press censorship practised immediately after UDI, he added: "The fact that it has been allowed to continue publishing without blank spaces, or indeed blanked out completely, is something this Government should be proud of.

"This is not going to be allowed to continue for too long because we may have more problems than we can solve because of newspaper reports."

TRUTH

He was not suggesting the newspaper should support the Government or ZANU (PF), only that it "print the truth and nothing but the truth".

He became "incensed" when he read reports in the Herald that the Government did not have the support of the people and that the electorate regretted voting the Government into power.

This was "blatantly untrue", as were stories that the Government had only won the election through intimidation. "That's correct," Wing Commander Gaunt called out.

Dr Munyaradzi said: "Unless the local newspaper will try to give a lead and start reporting the truth and stop twisting the events that are happening in this country, we are forever going to have problems."

RESPONSE TO CIVIL SERVICE INCENTIVE SCHEMES DISAPPOINTING

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 19 Sep 80 p 3

[Text] THE incentive schemes introduced for members of the public service appeared to have encouraged many people to leave rather than to stay, the Minister of the Public Service, Mr Richard Hove, said yesterday.

About 10 percent of those eligible to benefit from the schemes had already tendered their resignations, which left the Government in a position where it was unable to plan its staffing requirements.

Opening the 62nd annual conference of the Public Service Association in Salisbury, Mr Hove said the effective running of the country was at the mercy of the civil servants.

He was disappointed so few people had given the new Government a chance to prove its good intentions. Considering it had been in power for only a short time, the Government had already achieved much, including advances in the public service field.

The Minister quoted as an example the legislation introduced to end the disparity between men's and women's salaries.

The situation in the public service which existed when the Government came to power would not be tolerated, said Mr Hove. The President had issued a directive to the Ministry to rectify the racial imbalance in the public service and this exercise was under way.

This was one of the most contentious issues facing civil servants, he said. It was totally incorrect that the career opportunities of whites would be affected by the policy of African advancement.

In fact "whites will, and have been, promoted," the Minister said.

However, the exercise was a complicated one and had taken longer than expected. This had affected the service in some areas but it was better to be slow and sure rather than make mistakes which would do the service "irreparable damage".

The Minister also praised the role of the Public Services Commission, which during the past few months had to surrender its independence to "political necessity".

He said the Government intended to retain a loyal civil service. H had been assured that the majority of civil servants would serve the Government loyally.

PROBE OF ILL-TREATMENT BY POLICE CONTEMPLATED

Salisbury THE HERALD in English 18 Sep 80 p 1

[Text]

THE Deputy Minister of Home Affairs, Mr Tarisai Zlyambi, said yesterday his Ministry was considering setting up "an impartial body that will go into the question of investigating reports from the public of ill-treatment by the police".
